favourable for its culture. He would have sold the opium he had seized, and thus realized three millions of money, instead of borrowing it from the presents of witnesses; or he would impose a duty on its importation which would yield him a large revenue. Even an ad valorem duty of 25 per cent. would yield a revenue of one million. Yet none of these things did he do, and it would be too much, therefore, to charge him with lasciviousness in the face of such facts. It was said that if the growth of the poppy was put an end to in India that it would be taken up by some other country. It was to be remembered, however, that it would be a long time before it could be produced in such quantities, and in the meantime we might expect an improved morality in China, and such an improved peace as would check the revival of the detestable trade. The noble lord thanked the house for the attention with which he had been heard, and expressed a hope that whoever might honour him by replying to his statements would answer him by facts. He could not help saying that perceiving this country, with one arm resting on the east, and the other on the west, and trampling in too many instances upon every notion of morality and justice, he would rather, if such was to be its future course, that we should withdraw ourselves within the circumference of our moral innocence, and descend at once to the level of a third-rate power.—Mr. Bagshaw seconded the motion relying upon the aphorism that that which was morally wrong could never be politically right. We were scattering poison and death amongst the Chinese, and neither the loss to the revenue nor any other reason could justify such a grievous infliction upon the human race. For the sake of the interests of commerce, for the sake of the people of China, and for the sake of the people of this country, he hoped the house would interfere to put a stop to the opium trade.—Mr. B. Baring said he feared that the growth of the poppy in India could not be put a stop to, for, if given up in the Company's territories, it would only give encouragement to a system of smuggling opium from the neighbouring states, which it would be as impossible for the East India Company to check, as it was impossible for the Chinese to keep the drug out of that empire. The effect of the monopoly was beneficial to India, for it confined the growth of the poppy to particular districts, in which districts opium was not consumed. He did not mean to say that the revenue should be maintained in opposition to every moral feeling, but it was most important that such an amount of revenue should not be given up, unless they were sure that doing so would be productive of a remedy for the evil. He only feared of putting a stop to smuggling on the coast of China was by inducing the Emperor of that country to legalise the introduction of opium, which on no one, except the insane, would think it practicable to exclude. Indeed there was no reason to anticipate that the next despatches from China would not contain a notification that the trade has been already legalised. The honourable gentleman concluded by moving, as an amendment, the previous question.—Mr. G. Seymour contended that the owners of the opium which was seized and destroyed in China had a just claim for compensation. He had travelled much in China, and had great intercourse with the people. He had, while so travelling, experienced less interference on the part of the police than he had done in many European countries. We were, unfortunately, unpopular in China, and more particularly in Canton, where the feeling against us amounted to hatred; and this feeling was far from being mitigated by the stoppage of opium. Indeed, it was so strong, that many people were of opinion that the Emperor could not hold his throne if he were to legalise the trade in opium. He was, therefore, desirous that this country should discontinue the traffic, before it led to a second war; and he hoped that Lord Ashley would be encouraged to perseverance by the example of Mr. Wilberforce upon a subject of equal interest.—Lord Jocelyn said he had himself witnessed scenes which fully substantiated the evils, physical and moral, which had been stated by Lord Ashley, and he should support the motion before the house would put an end to the trade in opium, he would support it; but he was of opinion that the monopoly actually checked the production of opium, although, for purposes of revenue, the Government of India had recently too much encouraged the growth of the poppy. Still, he felt that, both in commercial and financial point of view, we ought to hesitate before adopting a policy so decisive.—Captain Layard condemned the opium trade, and said that, though we had triumphed over the Chinese, we should not despise and insult them.—Mr. Hogg contended that no substitute could be found in the room of the monopoly of the cultivation of the poppy. That monopoly not only acted as a check upon the production of opium, but its revenue was greatly exaggerated. It was impossible to put down the smuggling of opium upon a coast so extensive as that of China, otherwise than by legalising the trade, which he hoped would be done before long by the Chinese government.—Sir E. Colebrook contended that in this case it was impossible to hold a middle course—the traffic in opium must be legalised or prohibited altogether.—Mr. Lindsay supported the view of the question taken by Mr. Hogg, and regretted he could not assent to the motion of Lord Ashley.—Mr. Hawes moved the adjournment of the debate, but on a division the adjournment was negatived by a majority of 118 to 26.—After some discussion upon the propriety of adjourning, Lord Sandon with some difficulty obtained a division of the house, and agreed in support of the motion of Lord Ashley, with the general spirit of which he entirely agreed.—Sir R. Inglis hoped that no one would vote on the question who had not heard the speech of his noble friend, Lord Ashley, whose proposition he most warmly supported.—Sir R. Peel said it behoved the House of Commons to weigh well the resolutions it adopted upon a subject so important as the present. The question was very different from a bill. In the case of a bill the house had many opportunities of expressing its opinions, but in the case of a resolution the whole question was settled by a single vote. Would the house, under such circumstances, declare that no poppy should be grown in India, when, by so doing, they would be only throwing the trade into the hands of the inhabitants of the Manilla Islands, and find even there that the evil would be multiplied instead of being kept under control. It was far better to leave the matter in the hands of Sir Henry Pottinger, who was not acting with the Emperor of China upon the subject, while the British Government was in favour of the suppression of the smuggling of opium into China, and had even recommended that it should not be introduced into Hong-Kong. With respect to putting down the monopoly to the growth of the poppy in the Company's territories, he did not think it was impossible to prevent the introduction of opium into India from the neighbouring states, it was the opinion of all the authorities on the subject that the best restriction that could be imposed was the establishment of the present monopoly. He only called upon the house to postpone its judgment, by not allowing the question to be put, in order that the whole matter might for the present be left in the hands of the Government.—After a few words from Mr. Acland, who opposed the motion, Lord Ashley replied, and withdrew his motion, in the belief that from what he had heard it might interfere prejudicially with the exertions making by the Government.—The motion was then withdrawn, and the house adjourned.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—Wednesday.

The house did not sit.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—Wednesday.

The house met at four o'clock. Petitions against the educational clauses were presented by Mr. Strutt, from Smally, in Derbyshire; by Mr. V. Smith, from Kettering; by Mr. G. Knight, from Bradford; by Mr. Hawes (61 petitions), from various dissenting congregations and Sunday-school teachers of Yorkshire, Kent, Surrey, Northampton, and Gloucester; by Mr. S. Crawford, 42 petitions from Rochdale and its neighbourhood; by Mr. Hutt, three petitions from Wrexham; by Mr. Wakley, from Dissenters of Somerset, from Wigan, from Yorkshire, and other places; by Lord Sandon, from Sn op.—The Health of Towns Bi l was, on the motion of Mr. Mackenzie, postponed till Wednesday, the 26th of April.—Mr. Ewart, in the absence of his hon. friend the member for Finsbury, moved the second reading of the Players of Interludes Bill. He hoped no opposition would be offered to the second reading of the bill, but that the discussion should be postponed till it went into committee. Mr. M. Sutton could not agree to the bill as it stood. While he admitted that the present state of the law was in some measure unsatisfactory, he did not think the remedy proposed was that which would best meet the difficulty. This bill, if it passed now stood, would take from the magistrates all power of granting licences for theatres. On the understanding that an opportunity to discuss the measure would be given at a future period, he would not oppose the second reading. The bill was read a second time, and committed for Wednesday, the 26th April.—Sir S. Herbert moved the second reading of the Admiralty Lands Bill, which was read a second time, and committed for the first Monday after the Easter recess.—The clerk at the table read a petition which had been received from the electors of the borough of Cambridge, complaining of the undue return of Mr. Fitzroy Kelly at the late election for that borough. The petition was referred to the committee of selection.—On the motion of Mr. Gaskell the Quakers' Witnesses Indemnity Bill went through committee; and the Sudbury Disfranchisement Bill was read a third time and passed.—The house then adjourned at five o'clock.

the Spaniards call them—"idols," and were once the deities of the departed people. These sculptured memorials have excited the enthusiastic admiration of the people in the United States: they have compared them to the early efforts of classic antiquity, and have gone so far as to give them an antediluvian parentage. In our opinion, however, they are of a very low character of art, and are of a comparatively recent period. We can sympathise with the extravagant joy of Jonathan in discovering an ancient and highly-civilised ancestry for his adopted country—of "ruins of temples which may have been historical when Solomon was laying the foundations of the first temple ever raised by the hand of man to the honour and glory of the true God. Ruins of palaces in which Phidias and Praxiteles might have gone to study ancient masters." But we believe that the prows of many of the canoes of New Zealand and the Polynesian Islands exhibit specimens of equal, and, in fact, very similar sculptures. There is nothing amongst them at all comparable to Persian, Egyptian, or even Norman art. The grand and distinctive excellence of these ruins, and that which most powerfully attests the mental energy and advanced civilisation of these people, is found in the grand proportions of their vast palaces and the elegance of their decorations; and, as Mr. Stephens forcibly observes, the whole presents "the spectacle of a people skilled in architecture, sculpture, and drawing, and, beyond all doubt, other more perishable arts, and possessing the cultivation and refinement attendant upon these, not derived from the Old World, but originating and growing up here without models or masters, having a distinct, separate, independent existence, like the plants and fruits of the soil, indigenous."

It appears that in the time of Cortez and Alvarado, who overrun the country and broke the sceptre of its proud nationality, the states of Central America stood upon "power's high pinnacle" unfading and undiminished. Herrera, the Spanish historian, says of Yucatan, "The whole country is divided into eighteen districts, and in all of them were so many and such stately stone buildings, that it was amazing; and the great wonder is, that having no use of any metal, they were able to raise such structures, which seem to have been temples, for their houses were always of timber and thatched. In those edifices were carved the figures of naked men, with earrings, after the Indian manner, and idols of all sorts." Of the natives, he says, "they flattened their heads and foreheads, their ears bored, with rings in them. Their faces were generally good, and not very brown, but without beards, for they scorched them when young, that they might not grow. Their hair was long, like women, with which they made a garland about the head, and a little tail hung behind. The men wore a roll, eight fingers broad, going several times round the waist, and had square mantles, knotted on the shoulders, and sandals made of deer-skins." The reader, as Mr. Stephens observes, almost sees here, in the flattened heads and costumes of the natives, a picture of the sculptured and stuccoed figures of Palenque and other places. Bernal Diaz, Gemara, and others who accompanied Cortez, bear corresponding testimony. The date of these ruins and of the great dynasties who founded them would appear, then, to range through the five centuries from A.D. 1000 to the period of the Spanish conquest. Their sudden extinction is one of the wonders of history; but, as a Christian people, we find its solution in that memorable prophecy of our faith, "the idols He shall utterly abolish."

The country is now under the dominion of half-a-dozen flimsy republics, which offer even less security to life, capital, or conscience than, as governments, they possess themselves.

GENERAL VIEW OF THE RUINS OF UXMAL, YUCATAN.

SCENE FROM THE OPERA OF "SAPPHO."

DRURY LANE.

Last Saturday evening this house afforded a triple novelty, to a most numerous congregation of its friends and patrons—a new opera; a new prima donna (Miss Clara Novello); and a new accession to its vocal force, in the person of the first English singer of her day—Mrs. Alfred Shaw.

The name of the opera—"Sappho"—was of itself sufficient to interest all who had been either classically acquainted with the story of the love-martyr of the Leucadian cliff, by some of her own "fervent fragments,"

Which still—like sparkles of Greek fire,
Undying, ey'n beneath the wave
Burn on thro' time, and ne'er expire!

or familiarised with it by the thousand pilgrim tourists of the day, who have described

The very spot where SAPPHO sung
Her swan-like music, ere she sprung (Still bolding, in that fearful leap,
By her lov'd lyre) into the deep,
And dying, quench'd the fatal fire,
At once, of both her heart and lyre!

The life and tragical death of the enthusiastic, the inspired, but unfortunate Lesbian, would have formed a magnificent subject for the burning genius of Byron, who, in Julia's letter to Juan, has unavowedly translated one of Ovid's imaginary epistles of Sappho to Phaon with all the intensity of feeling congenial to such a wild and impassioned theme.

Thus far have we been led to dwell, with associated feelings, on the interesting story of the mortal muse; but here we must take leave of its beauty and romance, to consider a thing which bears no further resemblance to it than a burletta does to the tragedy it desecrates, by preserving the names only of its dramatis personæ. Still, the heroine, however mutata ab illa, is drawn by the writer of the libretto as an impassioned character, and coloured by the author of the music with considerable warmth of expression and occasional energy. Of this more anon. Let us proceed to examine the merits of the fair debutante, and see whether her notions of the character incline to the model of antiquity or to the modern sketch; or, in fact, whether she have any notions or not beyond the vain conceits that she is the most finished vocalist in the world. Miss Clara Anastasia Novello is in her twenty-fifth year. She possesses a very beautiful and well-trained soprano voice, which, per se, is capable of procuring its fair owner a favourable first hearing; but we must regretfully exclaim, with the fox of Phædrus, "Quanta species non habet cerebrum!" and, consequently, she has not the power of making those lasting impressions which are more the effects of mental than physical endowments. Her enunciation is "clear—but oh, how cold!" Her bravura is neat, but unimpassioned; her graziosa not the "grace beyond the reach of art;" and her pathos—what? or where? Let echo answer! Still she possesses the instrumental part of good singing's requisites, and in characters of a less intellectual nature she will be everywhere found an acquisition. Her first song, "Morning has never dawned," was skilfully executed; but the uproarious manner in which she was called for at the conclusion of the first act reminded us of a speech of Antigerides (the celebrated flute-player of antiquity), who, hearing one day, at a distance, a violent burst of applause bestowed upon a performer, exclaimed, "There must be something very bad in that man's playing, or those people would not be so lavish in their approbation." The noise of claqueurs is very different from the spontaneous furore of real admiration. In the second act, in which Mrs. Alfred Shaw appeared as Climene, judgment "was herself again," and hailed the great vocalist in a manner alike creditable to her and her hearers. The air, "My bursting heart," was given with indescribable beauty, in the very soul of song, and was most enthusiastically received. The beautiful duet of "Sweet tears," between the soprano and contralto, was the gem of the evening, and was most deservedly encored. Mr. Phillips sustained effectively the part of Alcander. Mr. Allen, in Phaon, left us nothing to wish for but a greater power of voice to be the vehicle of his pure taste and feeling. He was encored in "Justly the doom pursues me." The choruses were admirably trained; and some of the scenery, particularly Marshall's portions, most beautifully and classically executed. And now for a few words on the music of "Sappho." Its composer, Giovanni Pacini, Maestro Cavaliere, and director of Il Teatro Reale, at Lucca, has been long celebrated on the Continent as the author of many arias, remarkable for their peculiar pathos and sweetness; also for elegant fioriture or embellishing variations, which have received the adoption of the first singers of the day—amongst whom may be reckoned Pasta and Rubini. His opera of "Niobe" created furore, but his fame amongst his compatriots had not reached its zenith before the production of his "Sappho." En parenthese, we may observe that Miss Novello achieved more glory in Lucca, by her performance in this opera, than she is likely to do in the English adaptation of it at Drury. Pacini has not any very astounding qualities as a composer, but he possesses a very delicate and keen sensibility for his art; and, perhaps, would have exhibited a genius quite equal to his work, if the wild spirit of the ancient classic legend had not been too much milk-and-watered by the treatment of his maudlin coadjutor, the author of the libretto. What poets have sung, and Raphaels (we mean painters—but the terms are synonymous) have illustrated, should either be totally kept from "all eyes profane," or, if exhibited, shown in their full, pristine, and undeformed beauty. We do not much like the practice of introducing arias by long preluding symphonies; they distract the attention of the hearer from its chief object, the singer, which is a vice that should be "reformed altogether" in dramatic music. Some of the choruses exhibit Pacini as a learned contra-punto instrumentalist: and, perhaps, after all, some future justice done to his composition of "Sappho," as in the case of Donizetti's "Belisario," will vindicate his interpretation of the passionate Lesbian's character, and show that haud inexpertus scripsit.

CLARA NOVELLO AS "SAPPHO."

H. PHILLIPS AS "ALCANDER."

POPULAR PORTRAITS.—No. XXXVI.

CHARLES DICKENS.

It is possible to be a public man without being a popular one, and we have included some names in the series of our "portraits" that may be considered rather as coming under the former class than the latter. But no one will dispute the right of the gifted individual whose name stands at the head of the present sketch to be ranked as one of our "popular portraits." It is one of the advantages attending literary eminence that it may frequently be attained without entailing on its possessor any of that "envy, hatred, malice, and all uncharitableness" which too often awaits those who, by far different paths, have proved—

How hard it is to climb
The steep where Fame's proud temple shines afar.

They may have a pride in looking behind and beneath them on those they have passed, but they must also be conscious that they have not made a single step unaccompanied by the grudgings and envyings of their competitors. The contests of the bar and the senate induce, almost of necessity, an admixture of personal bitterness in the conflict; in the same degree as one must feel exalted with triumph must the other feel humiliated by the sense of defeat. But no such feelings need exist among the competitors in the field of literature. It is a wide one, affording room for many kinds of greatness—a boundless sphere in which may move many orbs all bright and beautiful, and yet differing in their brightness "even as one star differeth from another in glory." We, of course, speak of literature of the higher kind, when it is not turned to an instrument of political or party controversy, for then its nature is subdued to what it works in, and it becomes, not degraded, perhaps, but at least lowered. Great was the fame and high the position attained by Walter Scott, but we believe he had not one enemy; Southey has just passed from among us with the affection of all who knew him, and the regret of the far wider circle who knew him only by his works; and Charles Dickens is another instance of the ungrudging readiness with which the palm is yielded to that genius which can excite the admiration and waken the sympathies of all. Literary history presents few examples of a career, hitherto so brief, marked with such signal success; but what was suddenly acquired has been well maintained, and presents every right of continuance. "Todgers's Boarding House," in the last number of "Martin Chuzzlewit," is equal to any of the pictures that gave such universal celebrity to the "Pickwick Papers." The history of a writer is the history of his works, and in the present case they extend over so small a space of time, considering the effect they have produced, that our sketch must be very brief. His first efforts, we believe, were the "Sketches by Boz," which contain passages equal to anything he has ever produced, though they were not collected from the stray and fugitive channels in which they first appeared till the "Pickwick" had given "Boz" an English reputation that has since become European. To "Pickwick" succeeded "Oliver Twist," "Nicholas Nickleby," and "Master Humphrey's Clock," in which he departed from the plan of monthly publication, and brought out a number weekly. His return to the former plan may be taken as a proof that the weekly appearance did not answer. It was certainly objectionable; the quality of the work was not inferior, but the portions given were too small; there was always enough to provoke, and never sufficient to satisfy. It was like drinking champaigne with a tea-spoon. On the winding up of the "Clock" Boz took a year's rest, and in the interval took a trip to America, where he was fêted and caressed with a fervour scarcely to be expected from so "calculating" a people. Could they have anticipated some of the "Notes" he was about to put into "general circulation," their ardour might have been somewhat abated. Opinions were more divided on his book—work it can hardly be called—on America than on anything he has yet produced. As a whole it is defective, though there are many happy sketches of character in it. Boz is not only an Englishman but a Londoner, and the eye that is keen enough in the street becomes dim in the vastness of the prairie and the cataract; it is no fault of Boz's that Bevis Marks and Niagara will task two very different classes of faculties to describe adequately.

He is now bringing out his "Martin Chuzzlewit," which is progressing well; that "boy" at "Todgers's" is quite a gem in his way. We have omitted one or two works he has only "edited," not written; his name is on the title-page, to carry down a bookseller's speculation, but they are altogether unworthy of him. The trick is now so well known that the public can hardly be taken in by it again. The popularity of Dickens as an author is something remarkable; his works have been translated into every language of Europe. Some of Sam Weller's similes have put the French translators to sore shifts and expedients, but the Germans have managed pretty well. We have met with "Pickwick" in low Dutch on the banks of a canal in Rotterdam, and found "Master Humphrey's Clock" in high German in the heart of Switzerland. Business once called us to the comptoir of a German tradesman in the vicinity of Heidelberg, and on the desk beside the ledger was a well-read translation of "Nicholas Nickleby." We were curious to see what part of it had interested the man of trade, and (had the fighting students of the university tinctured the "philister" with some of their own combativeness?) he was absorbed in the description of the death of Lord Verisopht in the duel with Sir Mulberry Hawk; no discredit, we thought, to his taste, for it is one of the most vivid and impressive passages in the work. Who will deny that Charles Dickens is a popular author? In addition to his talent as a writer, Boz is an agreeable public speaker, and his addresses, whether from the chair as a president or in returning thanks for a toast, have always something pleasing in their turn of thought, or expression, or the illustrations he introduces. The effect is greatly assisted by the possession of a good voice, which, though rather thick, is strong and well-modulated.

We feel tempted to give his latest speech, made on Tuesday evening last, as chairman of the "Printers' Pension Society" dinner at the London Tavern. We do it the rather that our own report is the only record of it, for the morning papers have not given it; they were nodding over the columns of the "opium" debate. It is the speech in which he proposed "the Press," and is therefore not only interesting in itself, but is a fair specimen of his style as a speaker; he said,—

I now give "The Press," that wonderful lever Archimedes wished for, and which has moved the world! which has impelled it onward in the path of knowledge, of mercy, and of human improvement so far that nothing in the world can ever roll it back! The mass of the people, said Dr. Johnson very truly, in any country where printing is unknown, must be barbarous. Sir Thomas More, the best, and the wisest, and the greatest of men, however, before the press was established, died what was almost the natural death of the good, and the wise, and the great. Sir Thomas More so clearly saw into futurity, and described from afar off the stupendous influence of the press, that he went out of his way to set up a printing-press in Utopia, knowing that without it even the people of that fancied land would not bear competition in the course of years with the real nations of the earth. (Cheers.) If they looked back only for two hundred years, to that time when the Dutch citizen carved letters on the bark of the beechen tree, and took off impressions of them on paper as toys to please his grandchildren he little knew the wonderful agent which, in scarcely a century, was about to burst on mankind; what a strong engine in the course of time it must become, even in the land where the ruthless vices and crimes of the anointed ruffian who spread More's bloody pillow were to acquire his an immortality infamy. (Cheers.) I thank God that it has been so; from that hour no good has been devised, no wonderful invention has been broached, no barbarism has been struck down, but that same press has had its part to support, and never once has it let it go till it was done. If we look at our social and daily life, we shall see how constantly present the press is, and how essential an element it has become of civilised existence. In great houses, and in lowly huts, in crowds and in solitudes, in town and country, in the nursery of the children and by the old man's elbow chair—still, in some shape or other, there it is! Now it is an alphabet, with its fat, black capital letters—now in the form of whole words—now in the story of "Puss in Boots"—now as "Robinson Crusoe"—now as a tale of the Caliph Haroun Alraschid—now as a Landley Murray—now as a "Telemachus exultant"—then as a Virgil, a Homer, a Milton—now in the form of the labours of the editor of a popular newspaper: in some shape or other the press is constantly present and associated with our lives, from the baptismal service to the burial of the dead. I know that to some its power is obnoxious. There are some gentlemen of a patriotism so unselfish, that they would put the newspaper press of their native country on an equality of efficiency with that of another nation, which, so long ago as Benjamin Franklin wrote, was an unique, a distinct, and a singular thing. But as we have means of judging for ourselves, every morning and evening, of the newspaper literature, it is satisfactory to know that there never was a righteous cause but the same men have hated it; and there never was a disappointed man or a discontented patriot, anxious to pass upon a people determined not to recognise him as such, but has commanded the privileges of the press in the same crocodile's tears. With regard to the influence of the press on public men, I only leave you to judge from what public men often are even with the engine in full operation, what sort of characters they would be without it. I give you then, "the fountain of knowledge and the bulwark of freedom, the founder of free states and their preserver—the Press!"

As it has been said, truly, that there is no pleasure without some alloy so is the axiom verified in reference to the proprietors of the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS, whose natural and sincere gratification and gratitude at the brilliant success of their design, and the loud public approval with which it has been crowned, is at last, in some measure, marred by a drawback, which is nevertheless a source of pride in itself—and certainly a peculiar and unprecedented novelty in the history of newspaper literature. It is surely a new complaint, that public demand for any periodical should exceed the means of supply with commensurate rapidity—and baffle the most active energies and spirited enterprize to keep pace with the patronage so pleasingly created. Yet so it is with the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS; and "increase of appetite" has so grown by what it fed on that at last it is found—in the present state of printing machinery, and with the most perfect practical machine for art-printing in England impossible to work off within the allotted time of each successive week as many copies of the journal as the public eagerly demand. It is true that, by dint of extraordinary exertion, the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS has succeeded in supplying a circulation larger in amount than that of any other paper in the empire—but daily applications and experience have proved to the proprietors that this circulation would be more than doubled if it were possible to furnish a supply. This is an emergency which the proprietors are ready and anxious to meet; and, while they have sincerely to regret that any of their kind patrons should have been disappointed, or that their zealous friends, the newsmen, should from time to time have been tantalized by delay, have to announce their determination to track all the realms of enterprize in order to find the means of meeting the public wish, and of disseminating their journal as far as the most generous patronage would have it speed. They have, therefore, not lost one moment in plunging into a fresh and enormous outlay to this end, and they have now the honour to announce that they have contracted for the

upon a novel and beautiful model, and with a power equal to the rapid production of nearly

of the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS within the period now allotted to the working off of the number supplied. These new machines will be got ready with all possible speed, and in the meanwhile the proprietors have to entreat the patience of the public and the news trade—and to repeat the expression of their gratitude to both for the warm interest which has been taken in their behalf.

As, however, all golden rules have their exceptions, so within the last week it has been the lot of the proprietors to discover that some few tradesmen, unable to procure copies of their journal as fast as they required them, have forwarded to their subscribers other journals in its stead. This is a dishonest imposition, which they are determined to put down, and they here earnestly request any of their friends who may have been thus disappointed, to give them information without delay, in order that the fraud may be in every case attended by its proper punishment.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON, SATURDAY, APRIL 8, 1843.

There is a kind of ungraciousness about the manner and mode of dealing of the politicians of the United States—an ungainly assumption of independence—a betrayal of that sort of overreaching diplomacy of which the "smartness" greatly exceeds the "honesty"—in a word, an "ungentlemanly" spirit and temper, which more particularly finds vent and expression in reference to England and her maintained positions, and which does not confine its rudeness to mere snarling, but rather seeks to make it answer a national purpose, by extending it so far as the misinterpretation of a treaty or the false construction of a public act. Evidence that we are not misappreciating this vain and not unartful disposition of the trans-Atlantic mind may be found—and we much regret that the case should be so—even in the messages of the President of the States; and the recent tone which these documents have taken has created some degree of annoyance in this country, which, if it has not gone the length of disturbing the public mind into any apprehension of serious misunderstanding between the two nations, has nevertheless been productive of unpleasant jealousy and distrust, and is calculated to alloy much of the satisfaction and cordiality which the conclusion of the Ashburton treaty seems so happily to have confirmed.

It was in a former address to Congress that Mr. Tyler made a direct misrepresentation of the spirit and meaning of the eighth article of that treaty to Congress, endeavouring to screw it into a renunciation on the part of Great Britain of her right of search of suspected vessels; and, had the English Minister given the sanction of silence to that interpretation, America would have accepted and clung to it as indisputable and correct, and have made it the basis of a new advantage gained by Yankee "smartness" over John Bull diplomacy. Lord Aberdeen, however, did not suffer the former message to maintain its assumption, but addressed a note upon the subject to the British plenipotentiary, with an instruction that he should read it to the American Secretary of State. The result of that note is indicated in the last message of Mr. Tyler to Congress, which, together with official correspondence on the subject, arrived by the last packets from America, and has been since commented upon by a portion of the daily press.

We shall first present to our readers the substance of Lord Aberdeen's despatch:—

There was a statement in a paragraph of the President's Message to Congress, at the opening of the present session, of serious import, because to persons unacquainted with the facts it would tend to convey the supposition, not only that the question of right of search had been disavowed by the plenipotentiary at Washington, but that Great Britain had made concession on that point.

That the President knew that the right of search never formed the subject of discussion during the late negotiation, and that neither was any concession required by the United States Government nor made by Great Britain.

That the engagement entered into by the parties to the treaty of Washington, for suppressing the African slave-trade, was unconditionally proposed and agreed to.

That the British Government saw in it an attempt on the part of the Government of the United States to give a practical effect to their repeated declarations against the trade, and recognised with satisfaction an advance towards the humane and enlightened policy of all Christian states, from which they anticipated much good. That Great Britain would scrupulously fulfil the conditions of this engagement; but that from the principles which she has constantly asserted, and which are recorded in the correspondence between the ministers of the United States, in England, and himself, in 1841, England has not receded, and would not recede. That he had no intention to renew, at present, the discussion upon the subject. That his last note was yet unanswered. That the President might be assured that Great Britain would always respect the just claims of the United States. That Great Britain made no pretensions to interfere in any manner whatever, either by detention, visit, or search, with vessels of the United States, known or believed to be such! But that it still maintained, and would exercise, when necessary, its own right to ascertain the genuineness of any flag which a suspected vessel might bear; that if the exercise of this right, either from involuntary error or in spite of every precaution, loss or injury should be sustained, a prompt reparation would be afforded; but that it should entertain for a single instant the notion of abandoning the right itself would be quite impossible.

That these observations had been rendered necessary by the Message to Congress. That the President is undoubtedly at liberty to address that assembly in any terms which he may think proper; but if the Queen's servants should not deem it expedient to advise her Majesty also to advert to these topics in her speech from the throne, they desired, nevertheless, to hold themselves perfectly free, when questioned in Parliament, to give all such explanations as they might feel to be consistent with their duty and necessary for the elucidation of the truth.

It is upon this despatch that Mr. Tyler's new message to Congress is founded, and it has created some sensation both among those who preserve tranquillity, and those who would foment discord between this country and the United States. It must, however, be accorded, that Mr. Tyler has neither the same strength of argument nor intrenched dignity of position which are discoverable in the calm but resolved remonstrance of Lord Aberdeen. We still deem it our duty to put forward the leading points of his message:—

I cannot, says Mr. Tyler, forego the expression of my regret at the apparent purport of a part of Lord Aberdeen's despatch to Mr. Fox. I had cherished the hope that all possibility of misunderstanding as to the true construction of the eighth article of the treaty lately concluded between Great Britain and the United States was precluded by the plain and well-weighed language in which it is expressed. The desire of both governments is to put an end as speedily as possible to the slave-trade, and that desire, I need scarcely add, is as strongly and as sincerely felt by the United States as it can be by Great Britain.

Now, we may suggest that all possibility of misunderstanding the eighth article of the treaty alluded to was precluded until the American President evinced his determination to misunderstand; and the fact of his having done so upon so important a topic as the question of search argues little for his sincerity in co-operating with us to the extinction of slave traffic. Here, however, is an admissive doctrine in our favour, forming part of the message itself:—

To seize and detain a ship upon suspicion of piracy, with probable cause and in good faith, affords no just ground either for complaint on the part of the nation whose flag she bears, or claim of indemnity on the part of the owner. The universal law sanctions, and the common good requires, the existence of such a rule. The right, under such circumstances, not only to visit and detain, but to search a ship, is a perfect right, and involves neither responsibility nor indemnity.

This admission is perfectly palpable and distinct; but it is immediately followed with the glaring and quibbling inconsistency of the following paragraphs, the constructive art of which is still, however, too flimsy and transparent for deception:—

But, with this single exception, no nation has, in time of peace, any authority to detain the ships of another upon the high seas, on any pretext whatever, beyond the limits of the territorial jurisdiction. And such, I am happy to find, is substantially the doctrine of Great Britain herself, in her most recent official declarations, and even in those now communicated to the house.

These declarations may well lead us to doubt whether the apparent difference between the two Governments is not rather one of definition than of principle. Not only is the right of search, properly so called, disclaimed by Great Britain, but even that of mere visit and inquiry is asserted with qualifications inconsistent with the idea of a perfect right.

Now the inference here attempted to be set up is completely and most designedly fallacious. It seeks to imply us out of a maintained right, and to insinuate either that we shall concede or have conceded that which we are known to be resolved at all hazards to maintain, and our retention of which Lord Aberdeen's despatch declares to be indispensible. Mr. Tyler, however, comes to this at last:—

Denying, as we did and do, all colour or right to exercise any such general police over the flags of independent nations, we did not demand Great Britain any formal renunciation of her pretension. Still less had we the least idea of yielding anything ourselves in that respect.

Well, then, since America did not "demand of Great Britain any formal renunciation of her pretensions," that pretension remains in full force, and there ends the palaver for the moment, although the insolency and evasion of the American statesman are, from first to last, apparent and beyond dispute. The message ends with a sort of braggadocio threat of supporting the power of America upon the African coast with her whole naval force, and this has been construed into a warlike attitude by agitators at home.

For ourselves, we do not perceive the same grounds for uneasiness which others have descried, but we are not the less sensible of the half shuffling, half overreaching, disingenuousness which pervades the document, and which, we fear, is but too characteristic of the whole spirit of American diplomacy, and quite justificatory of remarks with which we commenced this article.

THE COMET.

When a wretched or ragged monomaniac wishes to distinguish his career by a small episode of murder, he does not vent his delusion upon an equal; he neither stabs nor shoots his companion who is wretched or ragged as himself, but he strikes at high game; as in the case of Bean, or Oxford, or Francis, he founds his immortality upon the greatness of his mark; he aims at a Queen or a minister at the least. Upon a somewhat similar principle, only with more atrocity and without the excuse of even constructive madness, the low and obscure press will sometimes endeavour to gain the advertisement of a bad notoriety, by lunging out with desperate attack upon journals of name, standing, and respectability, in the hope that the lie, slander, or moral murder, which they are committing, may provoke an indignant retort, in which the mention of the names of the offenders may give them all the disreputable eminence they desire. They would willingly endure the "handwriting upon the wall," provided that with the infamy denounced were registered also the title and whereabouts of the criminals. Of this brazen order of scamp-hood, an obscure mockery of imitation of the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS last week displayed a peculiar, though very impotent, characteristic, when it sought to obtain from us a mention of its name, at the expense of every honourable principle, by the publication of a slander, to which we now give all the publicity which the journal in question will fail through it (or, indeed, any other means) to achieve.—Ecce signum:—

Our contemporary, the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS, with its usual foresight in the anticipation of events, last week published a view of the comet as seen by their artist at Blackheath. We have reason to believe that the illustration was a second-hand one, engraved for a different occasion, and thrust into their columns, expecting the imposition would not be detected. At any rate, one thing is certain, that their artist pretends to have seen the comet on Blackheath at the time the astronomer of the Greenwich Observatory, who was watching for its appearance, had been unable to discover it.

We need not pause over the grammar of the matter, as the writer must have been as well prepared to violate that as any other principle. Our "Contemporary" and "their artist" may therefore fall into the same category of contempt which makes his falsehood as despicable as his English. The facts are simply these—and we only condescend to state them lest some respectable journal should unwittingly have the lie thrust upon it for quotation by the brazen impertunity of the liar.

The artist who made the drawing of the comet for the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS resides at Blackheath—had accidentally the advantage of beautiful astronomical instruments to assist him in the "sight"—has transmitted the drawing to our publisher, for inspection of the curious in such discoveries—and is corroborated in his accuracy by scientific gentlemen of high reputation. Moreover, the fact of the comet being seen on the night in question is confirmed by Herschel and a number of eminent correspondents of the daily papers, and the general accuracy of the engraving has been testified from several anonymous and disinterested sources. Lastly, the name of the artist—Sly—was affixed to the engraving; and as he informs us that the above calumny attacks his private character more than our public repute, we, at his request, leave the rest of the retribution of the calumniator entirely in his hands.

THE COURT AND HAUT TON.

The Queen and Prince Albert and the Queen Dowager attended divine service on Sunday morning in the Chapel Royal, Buckingham Palace. The service was read by the Rev. Mr. Vane, Deputy Clerk of the Closet in waiting, and the sermon was preached by the Bishop of Salisbury from Ephesians, chap. v. verse 8. The Royal dinner party at Buckingham Palace on Saturday evening included the Duke and Duchess of Bedford, Viscount Jocelyn, Lord and Lady Ashburton, and the Right Hon. Sir James and Lady Graham.

On Monday the Queen held a Privy Council at half past two o'clock, at Buckingham Palace. It was attended by His Royal Highness Prince Albert, and all the great officers of state. Her Majesty having been pleased to appoint the most noble James Duke of Montrose to be Lord Lieutenant of the county of Stirling, his Grace took the oaths appointed to be taken. The Queen having been pleased to appoint Colonel Hugh Baillie to be Lord Lieutenant of the county of Ross, the Colonel was also sworn into office. The Queen gave audiences to Lord Wharncliffe, the Duke of Wellington, Sir Robert Peel, the Earl of Haddington, the Earl of Aberdeen, Lord Stanley, and Sir J. Graham. The Royal dinner party included her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent, his Royal Highness Prince George, Lieut.-Colonel Bunsen, the Hanoverian Minister; le Chevalier de Brunow, Prussian Minister; Lady Fanny Howard; the Earl and Countess Delaware, and Lady Elizabeth West; Lord Q. Lennox, and Vice-Admiral Sir K. Brace. The band of the 1st Regiment of Life Guards attended at the Palace during dinner.

His Royal Highness Prince Albert rode out on horseback on Tuesday, attended by Colonel Bouverie, and visited his Royal Highness the Crown Prince of Wurtemberg.

On Wednesday the Queen and Prince Albert took an airing in an open barouche and four. Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Gloucester had a dinner party at Gloucester House. The company consisted of her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent, his Royal Highness the Crown Prince of Wurtemberg, the Netherlands Minister, the Wurtemberg Minister, the Duke and Duchess of Buccleuch, Lady Fanny Howard, Lady Georgiana Bathurst, Earl of Pembroke, Earl and Countess of Clanwilliam, Lord and Lady Jermina Eliot, Lord Claud Hamilton, Baron de Maucler, &c.

His Royal Highness the Crown Prince of Wurtemberg.—His Royal Highness visited the Duchess of Kent, on Saturday, at her residence, Clarence House, St. James's. The Crown Prince and suite went to the residence of Prince George, in St. James's Palace, at [illegible] to visit their Royal Highnesses [illegible] and Duchess of Cambridge, at Cambridge House, and [illegible] Duke and Duchess of Gloucester, at their residence, at Gloucester House. His Royal Highness the Duke of Sussex, at Kensington Palace. On Monday his Royal Highness held a levée at the state apartments, St. James's Palace, at half past two o'clock, for Wurtemberg Minister, was in all [illegible], at half past three, for the purpose of introducing the several members of the corps diplomatique who were present at the levée. The illustrious prince afterwards gave a dinner party at Cambridge House, and attended by Baron Maucler and Count Zeppelin, dined with her Majesty the Queen Dowager, at Marlborough House, in the evening, where a distinguished party had the honour of joining the royal circle.

We understand there is not the slightest doubt but that his Majesty the King of Hanover fully intends to visit this country in the course of the ensuing month. It will entirely depend on the health of the Queen at what period of the month his Majesty will leave Germany, as it is said that it is the King's intention to defer his departure from Hanover until her Majesty's recovery from her accouchement. Various alterations are being made at the King's apartments at St. James's Palace, and a number of grants have been engaged. It is stated that the King will remain six weeks in this country.

Marriage in High Life. The nuptials of the Hon. John Charles Dundas, M.P., brother of the Earl of Zetland, and Miss Talbot, niece of the Earl of Shrewsbury, were solemnized on Monday last, at Talbot Hall, New Ross, Ireland.

The Marquis of Lansdowne is the nobleman associated with Sir Robert Peel, Mr. Rogers, and the artists named last week, as the committee to award the premiums for the Cartoons.

We understand the marriage of the Earl of Leicester and Miss Whitbread is to be solemnized on Monday next. It is not yet determined whether the ceremony will take place in town or not.

Health of Her Majesty.—All the arrangements have been made at Buckingham Palace for the interesting event in the Royal household, which may now be very shortly expected. The attendants have been all summoned to their posts, and the apartments assigned to the physicians have been prepared in case of a sudden emergency.

Hyde Park.—The rides and drives, on Wednesday, were most fashionably attended, notwithstanding the showery state of the weather. Her Majesty and Prince Albert, in an open carriage and four, with outriders, drove through the triumphal arch at half-past three, attended by Lord Charles Wellesley, equerry in waiting, on horseback. Her Majesty was looking in excellent health and spirits.

A Cabinet Council was held on Wednesday afternoon at the Foreign office. It was attended by Sir R. Peel, the Duke of Wellington, the Lord Chancellor, Lord Wharncliffe, the Duke of Buccleuch, Earl of Aberdeen, Lord Stanley, Sir J. Graham, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, Earl of Haddington, Earl of Ripon, and Lord Fitzgerald. The Council sat an hour and a half.

METROPOLITAN NEWS.

THE LORD MAYOR'S DINNER TO HER MAJESTY'S MINISTERS, &c.

On Wednesday the Right Hon. the Lord Mayor gave a sumptuous dinner to Her Majesty's Ministers, and a great number of the nobility, at the Mansion House. The numbers present were about 150, and amongst the company were Sir Robert and Lady Peel, Sir Henry and Lady Emily Hardinge, Lord and Lady Wharncliffe, Earl and Countess of Jersey, Lady Clementina Villiers, Earl of Liverpool, Earl and Countess Delaware, Earl of Ripon, the Lord Chancellor and Lady Lyndhurst, Lord and Lady Ashburton, Lord Brougham, Sir James and Lady Graham, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, the Duke of Buckingham, the Duke and Duchess of Norfolk, the Speaker of the House of Commons, the Governor and Deputy-Governor of the Bank of England, the Governor and Deputy-Governor of the East India Company, &c. &c. &c. The gate exhibited on the occasion cost nearly £100,000.

The usual loyal toasts having been disposed of the Lord Mayor said he had now to propose a toast which he had every reason to think would be drunk by all present with the greatest possible good-will. He was about to propose the health of his right hon. friend on his right hand (Sir R. Peel), who had come that evening amongst them in despite of his varied and multifarious engagements elsewhere—who had come from the usual place of business (the House of Commons) which he frequented so assiduously, and he had come, seconded to meet the citizens of London on this occasion. He was quite sure that the citizens of London were always pleased and happy when the Ministers of the Crown possessed the respect and confidence of the citizens. He was sure that there would be no display of political feeling on this festive occasion. And satisfied he was that this would be the general feeling of the company when they had the pleasure of meeting the right honourable baronet, who held office, he believed, as much to the satisfaction of a majority of the people. He gave the health of Sir Robert Peel.

Sir Robert Peel said he had determined to follow the excellent example which had been set him by his right honourable friend the Duke of Wellington, briefly but sincerely, acknowledge his gratitude for the honour which had been paid to him. He had, in the course of his public life, received so many marks of the confidence and the good-will of the citizens of London towards him, that he always rejoiced in the opportunity of visiting the city, and in making a public acknowledgment of his gratitude; and he could assure the Lord Mayor that he never made a smaller sacrifice than when he exchanged the labours of the House of Commons for the princely hospitality of the Mansion-House of the city of London. He quite agreed with the Lord Mayor that upon this occasion all party and political feeling ought to be extinguished; and he did hope that, whatever might be the shades or differences of political opinions which separated them—whatever regret at the severity of the conflicts which they knew in Westminster, this was no occasion on which they would be observed in the city of London. He, perhaps, assumed an authority which was not properly conferred upon him, but he was about to propose a toast which, he was sure, would be responded to with the kindliest feelings by those present who were strangers to the city. He begged to return, on behalf of the ladies and gentlemen now present, their cordial acknowledgments to the Lord Mayor and the Lady Mayoress, for the kind consideration and attention with which they had presided over the whole arrangements, and for having made this entertainment not only one of magnificence, but one of the most agreeable kind that he had ever met with. He believed that it was likely they would have the advantage of the company of the Lord Mayor for a longer time than that of the Lady Mayoress, and he would therefore take the opportunity of giving a toast, which he was sure would meet with unanimous applause. He gave "The health of their amiable hostess the Lady Mayoress." (Great cheering.)

The Lord Mayor returned thanks in behalf of the Lady Mayoress, who, he assured the company, was never so happy as when entertaining so many distinguished guests.

The next toast was the health of the Lord Chancellor, who in return proposed the toast of the Lord Mayor. The Lord Mayor then proposed. "Lord Brougham, and the bar." Lord Brougham said he had long been connected with the citizens of London, and one of the proudest features of his career, to which he referred with pleasure, was that he had the honour for the last 30 years to receive constant marks of their kindness, their courtesy, and their condescension. They had been pleased to enrol him, moreover, as one of their citizens—as a member of that corporation the first in the world—to which corporation he upon all occasions ever had wished, and ever should continue to wish, and to the last hour of his life would continue to wish, all happiness and prosperity—for, as being the very prop and stay of the prosperity of England, it had been the cradle of British liberty. For this reason, then, he was proud of his connection with the corporation of London. He hoped they would go on improving; and (if the word were permitted, and because it was considered a term of wish) reforming, as well as improving, and that he should live to see that as there was no greater body corporate in the world, so there was no body more entire y exempt from the very possibility of exception. He begged the Lord Mayor to allow him to return thanks for the great kindness with which he had proposed his name as connected with that renowned and illustrious body of which it was the pride of his life to be a member. He proposed "The Speaker of the House of Commons." "Sir James Graham and the other members," and several other toasts, were then given and responded to, and the company did not separate until a late hour.

The Printers' Pension Society.—The annual festival of the Printers' Pension Society took place on Tuesday evening at the London Tavern. The society was originated about sixteen years ago by a committee of working printers, and has gradually attained to its present rank and importance amongst the numerous charitable institutions of the metropolis. Its object is seeks to accomplish is the relief of the decayed printers and their widows by means of small annual pensions. At this moment there are about fifty pensioners each receiving £26 per annum. The number of stewards, about 300 gentlemen sat down to dinner; Charles Dickens, Esq., presided. Among the gentlemen present connected with literature, art, &c., were C. Mansfield, R.A., Esq., T. Landseer, Esq., R. R. M'Lan, Esq., Thomas Hood, Esq., F. W. N. Bayley, Esq., Douglas Jerrold, Esq., Sir William Heygate, R. Taylor, Esq., the Treasurer, &c. The chairman in the course of the evening addressed the company with considerable warmth and feeling, and in do ng so pointed out the peculiar claims of the printing fraternity upon the public gratitude and support, with great benefit to the society in a pecuniary point of view, as was apparent from the subscription list, which was filled up almost entirely at the table. Robert Bell, Esq., proposed the health of the chairman in an appropriate eulogistic speech. "The Press," and "The Extension of General Education," were amongst the toasts given, as was also the health of Thomas Hood, Douglas Jerrold, and the authors present. Thomas Hood acknowledged the compliment for the authors, and Mr. F. W. N. Bayley for the press; and we refer our readers to the speech of Mr Dickens, in proposing the toast, which will be found in the notice accompanying that gentleman's portrait. "Mr. Mansfield and the Arts" was drunk and duly honoured. Amongst the subscriptions announced were the following:—R. Bell, Esq., two guineas; Dr. Sheridan, two guineas; T. Landseer, Esq., two guineas; C. Dickens, Esq. (additional), five guineas; D. Jerrold, Esq., five guineas; Mrs. Colburn, five guineas; the Illustrated London News (by the Editor), five guineas. The total amount announced was £783 9s. 6d. The stewards on the occasion were T. Hood, Esq., D. Jerrold, Esq., Henry Ingram, Esq., R. Bell, Esq., R. M'Lan, Esq., and others well known in the printers' profession, and the world of literature and art.

Seventy Garden Theatrical Fund Dinner.—The anniversary dinner of this society took place on Wednesday, at the Freemasons' Tavern. Many of the staunch friends and promoters of the interests of the drama were present, and not fewer than one hundred and fifty gentlemen sat down to an excellent dinner, which was presided over by his Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge, in the absence of his royal brother, the Duke of Sussex, the President of the Asylum, who, many of our readers are aware, is receiving dutiful and constant attention at the Covent-garden establishment were also present, and it is needless to add that, in such a company, many professional performers of distinguished merit rendered the evening one of the most delightful description. Not more than usually delightful, by the exercise of their vocal and instrumental musical qualifications. After the removal of the cloth, the usual loyal toasts were given from the chair, and were received with that enthusiasm which always the names of the members of the royal family are ever welcomed by the grateful objects of their never-failing munificence. In the course of the evening a list of subscriptions was announced, amounting to about £450. Her Majesty sent, as usual, 100 guineas, and the King of Hanover £50.

The Laureateship.—Our readers will be gratified to learn that her Majesty offered the office made vacant by the death of six pounds of money to Wordsworth, who gratefully declined the proffered honour on account of his age. Mr. Wordsworth, who is now seventy-three years of age, attended the funeral of his friend Southey, and is in good health for his time of life.

Booksellers' Provident Retreat.—On Tuesday last a numerous meeting of the leading booksellers and publishers took place at the Albion Tavern, Aldersgate-street, for the purpose of taking into consideration the most efficient measures to be adopted for the establishment of an asylum for aged and decayed booksellers, their assistants and widows, being annuitants of the Provident Institution, to be styled the Booksellers' Provident Retreat. The proposition met with the most cordial reception—a liberal subscription was commenced, and a provisional committee appointed to carry the intentions of the donors into effect.

Extensive Robbery at the Earl of Wilton's.—Intelligence was received at Scotland-yard, on Tuesday, that on the previous night there had been stolen from the country seat of the Earl of Wilton, at Melton Mowbray, Bank of England notes to the amount of £200, Bank of Grantham notes to the amount of £100, the numbers and dates of all unknown; an old-fashioned goblet, knife and spoon, and numerous other articles of silver gilt; a very small gold watch, about the size of half-a-crown, with a rose, in enamel, on the back; an immense number of silver pencil-cases, gold snuff-boxes, and other valuable ornamental articles; a small solid silver clock, last night by two, set round the face with brilliants, a silver Turkish inkstand and chain, such as worn by the Turks at their side. A number of the detective force were sent out to endeavour to apprehend the guilty parties.

POSTSCRIPT.

Friday Evening.

On Thursday the Queen and Prince Albert walked in the royal gardens of Buckingham Palace in the afternoon, and the usual routine was observed during the day.

Attempt to Shoot the Rev. Mr. Haydon.—The youth Sintzenick, who stands charged with attempting to fire a pistol at the Rev Mr. Haydon, in St. Paul's, was again brought before the Lord Mayor, on Friday, and remanded for a fortnight.

Bow-street.—Friday.—Mr. Albert Smith applied to Mr. Jardine, the sitting magistrate, for advice on the subject of a paragraph which appeared in the Morning Post a few days ago, in which the writer of an article in "Bentley's Miscellany" was pointed out as an object fit for assassination. As the matter was calculated to excite a breach of the peace, he thought it right to apply to the magistrate on the subject.—Mr. Jardine expressed his surprise at the terms of the article referred to, but said it was a matter of which he could not take cognizance.

Epsom Races, Friday.—The Trial Stakes; Flathooker, 1; Maccabeus, 2; Strekal, 3. Won by a neck.—Second Race; Sir Gilbert Heathcote's Hydaspes won the Handicap. 6 to 1 against British Yeoman—taken; 17 to 1 agst Sir Gilbert's Lot—taken.

FOREIGN.

The Paris journals of Wednesday arrived this morning. There is nothing in them of the slightest public interest, Spain.—We have received the Madrid journals of the 20th ult. The most important fact mentioned by them is the arrival of Don Francis de Paolo in the capital, for the purpose of taking his seat as a member of the Cortes. This circumstance excites great interest in Madrid, owing to the belief that the residence of the Prince there had been strictly forbidden by the Regent. As a deputy to the Cortes, however, his residence must now be sacred, for the Regent would not venture to enforce his authority against him in his character of a national representative.

Greek Independence.—The anniversary of the Greek Revolution was celebrated by a public dinner last night at the London Tavern.

PRINCE ALBERT'S LEVEE,

WEDNESDAY, 29TH MARCH.—THE NEXT WILL BE HELD APRIL 25TH.

The Gazette announcing that Prince Albert would hold levees "on behalf of her Majesty," being the first official intimation of the domestic solicitude which at present reigns in the Palace, a great desire was immediately expressed by the nobility and privileged classes to do honour to the invitation, by a numerous and stately attendance. The feeling was a natural one, and was largely shared by the loyal multitude who thronged the park and the precincts of the "goodly court of St. James's" on the first day of their celebration. It reached our own heart—and, notwithstanding Steele's celebrated invective on a public levee, "that the whole seems to be a conspiracy of a set of servile slaves to give up their own liberty to take away their patron's understanding," we resolved to do homage to the sovereign wish, and for the benefit of our readers were early and vigilant in our obedience. Our merits—the united merit of a hundred minds—despite the misgivings of our modesty, made the procuration of that dread certificate of caste, a ticket of admission, a labour of love, rather than a "hill of difficulty." But the getting of a suit of clothes—a court-dress a powdered periwig, a rapier, and, more than all, the gallant bearing which becomes them, was, on the emergency, a work less easily accomplished. The latter could be assumed as a native grace, but the starched and cumbrous costume of the Georgian era had in these dingy days to be sought for—to be partially made, partially bought, and partially borrowed. However, as our thoughts were above our buckles, these difficulties by the way were gradually overcome. They have been borne by others. "As Prince Eugene," says Swift, "was going with Mr. Secretary to court, he told him that Mr. Hoffman, the Emperor's resident, said to his highness that it was not proper to go to court without a long wig, and his was a tied-up one. Now, says the prince, I know not what to do, for I never had a long periwig in my life, and I have sent to all my valets and footmen to see whether any of them have one that I might borrow; but none of them had any." We comforted our dignity with these words, and having made ourselves perfectly masters of the well-ordered etiquette of the court ceremonial, we in due course resigned ourselves to the guidance of a coachman, as splendid in his costume and heraldic appointments as ourselves. Soon the old embattled gate of that palace which an attendant on Christian the Seventh of Denmark said was "not fit to lodge a Christian in" appeared in sight; the old scutcheon-like clock at its summit struck two, and in a few minutes we had passed the guard of honour, the police, the iron-gate, and were "put down" at the eastern door of the corridor which forms the south side of the great quadrangle, or, as it is more commonly called, the "Colour-court." There we were received by the Queen's Marshalmen, and about a dozen footmen in the royal state liveries, the former bearing their batons of office, and the latter light white wands tipped with the British lion. At this door the junior nobility, the second and succeeding orders of clergy, lord lieutenants of counties, naval and military officers, members of the liberal professions, &c. &c., are received; while the haute noblesse—the old hereditary peers of the kingdom, the dignitaries of the church, the judges, the ministers, the ambassadors, the Lord Mayor of London, those who from their rank have what is called the privilege of entrée—of being the first at a levee to enter the royal presence—are admitted by a door at the west end of the palace. The royal family enter by the Colour-court, and the Queen by the garden gate in the Park.

GUARD-ROOM.

Proceeding along the southern corridor, which is furnished on each side with settees for the accommodation of visitors, we crossed the southern corridor, and reached the foot of the great staircase leading to the state apartments. On the landing were placed some picked troopers of the Horse Guards, under arms, and in their state costumes. This staircase leads to a gallery which runs north and south, communicating at one end with the Chapel Royal, and at the other with the palace, or, as it was called, the "Manor-house," erected by Henry VIII. on the site of the hospital of St. James. On reaching the gallery we were conducted to the Guard-room, and led in stately guise between a double rank of those jolly halberdiers, or Beef-eaters as they are popularly christened after a corruption of their original appellation of Buffetiers, or keepers of the buffet and banquet appurtenances. The effect of this room was rich and striking, and, considered in relation to the palace, most appropriate. The walls are covered with fanciful groups of antique weapons, and the furniture and andirons of the chimney-corner are of a corresponding age and quaintness. Passing this room, we entered the Tapestry Chamber, an apartment consecrated by many precious historical associations. Here the stately pageant-loving Henry, casting aside the nobility of his early manhood, became a slave to the fascinations of his peerless bride, the unfortunate Queen Anne Boleyn, of whom a sad memorial remains in the carved stone mantel-piece, which incloses a device formed of her own initial tied by a true lover's knot to the initial of her inconstant lord. Here Elizabeth, and James, and Charles gave audience to their ministers and the ambassadors of foreign states; and here, too, the sovereigns of the House of Brunswick, on the death of their predecessors, are received by the privy council, sworn into their regal office, and from its capacious bay window proclaimed and presented to the people. On the present occasion it was filled by footmen, yeomen, and official servants of the ceremony; and near the window sat the notorious "Court Circular," a gentleman whose duty it is to write down the names, as they are declared aloud by the usher, of all persons passing to the levee. Leaving the Tapestry Chamber, we entered Queen Anne's

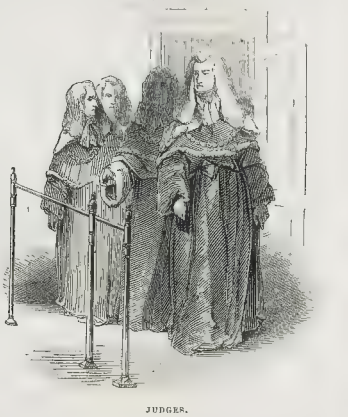
CABINET MINISTERS.

Room, the first of the four great state apartments which occupy the long range of brick building which fronts St. James's Park. In this room, which is very spacious, and richly decorated with florid gold ornaments, the second-class company assemble, and wait the presentation and retirement of the entreé company. The scene, at such a moment, is one of great interest and splendour; the gorgeousness and variety of the costumes, the singular badges and insignia of official distinction, the venerable figures of men bending beneath an age of national service, the fiery glances of the young nobility, mingling with the dignified courtesies of conventional existence, or the sweeter charities of related life, combine to form a picture which no pen or pencil can adequately describe, and which no country but one of settled institutions, great wealth, and great social intelligence can exhibit. We felt, as we gazed on its admiring groups, that Great Britain is not a thing of yesterday, and that her Majesty might well be proud of the homage of its people.



JUDGES.

On the breaking up of entrée levee, we were introduced to the Anti-Drawing-Room. At the upper end of this room are three doors leading into the Throne-Room, the approach to which, on levee days, is by the one on the left hand, and the egress by the one on the right, from which a brass hand-rail leads by a side door to the Long Gallery. On entering this room, which is embellished in the same style of cumbrous magnificence as Queen Anne's, we proceeded at once to the Throne-Room. This is truly a noble apartment, impressing the mind at once with the seal and semblance of royalty, and vastly superior to anything of the kind in Buckingham Palace. It is richly hung with crimson silk, the walls decorated by battle pictures and regal portraits, the floor splendidly carpeted, and the straight lines and square arrangements of the general ornaments finely relieved by a chandelier of extraordinary size and varied decoration. At the upper end stands the throne, larger in dimensions than either of those in the House of Lords or Buckingham Palace, and altogether more massive and stately in its proportions and embellishments. The chair, however, for her Majesty's use is less than those in ordinary service, and the stool is of miniature dimensions. On entering the Throne-Room for presentation, a beautiful but less striking picture than we had anticipated presented itself. The preliminary splendour of the great pageant had in some degree weakened the effect of its concluding scene, and besides this, the actors were greater men, and could afford to dispense with many of the paraphernalia of the less exalted members of the court. The beauty of the royal group was of a simpler, but, perhaps, for that very reason, of a more permanently impressive character. On the left-hand side of the room, next the central window, stood Prince Albert, attended by his houshold, and the élite of the entrée nobility; and at the upper end of the room, on each side of the throne, the Royal Family, their attendants, and the gentlemen-at-arms. Our task was now approaching its termination, but its greatest lesson had to be learned; within two minutes we should have claimed the royal acceptance of our homage, and have retired from the presence. But as we had nothing to disturb our equanimity, and, as "perfect love casteth out fear," we, with a serenity matched only by the passionless countenance of the Prince, permitted a noble friend to introduce us, and it being our first presentation, we had the honour of kissing the protecting hand; and then, according to the courtly ordinance, we rose, and meekly bowing reverence, received the confiding smile of his Royal Highness, and retreated by backward steps and slow, from the friendly audience.

The costume of the various officers and retinue of her Majesty adds not a little to the magnificence of such scenes at court as our engravings represent. At this levee the Prince was dressed as a field-marshal, and most of the Ministers appeared in the Windsor uniform. That of the Gentlemen-at-Arms, who attend upon all state occasions, in the same apartment as her Majesty, had somewhat the appearance of a general officer's uniform. The liveries of the footmen were gorgeous, from the quantity of gold lace which covered them. Nearly all the state attendants were armed with rapiers or court-swords.

PRESENTATION AT COURT.

As the Honourable Corps of Gentlemen-at-Arms forms the Royal Body Guard upon all state occasions, and adds greatly to the effect of its spectacles, we have collected some particulars concerning it. It was established during the reign of Henry the Eighth, in the year 1509, and composed of fifty gentlemen, styled Gentlemen Pensioners, who were principally sons of the nobility, each gentleman being obliged to keep two horses: they were commanded by a captain, who was a peer (their present captain is Lord Forrester), and had four other officers, a lieutenant, a standard-bearer, a clerk of the cheque, and the King's harbinger. In the reign of William the Fourth the name of the corps was changed from Gentlemen Pensioners to Gentlemen-at-Arms. Half of the number are in waiting at the Palace for three months at a time, changing every quarter of a year; eight of these gentlemen attend every levee, and twenty-five at each drawing-room; while upon such occasions as royal marriages, christenings, and funerals, the whole forty attend. They also bring up the first course of dishes for the royal table at the coronation, and the King confers the honour of knighthood on the senior gentleman. The whole corps attend at an Installation of the Garter, as well as at Guildhall when the Sovereign dines with the corporation of London. Each gentleman bears an axe, the officers have silver sticks, the captain a gold one: they are presented to them by each King or Queen upon their coronation.

The gentlemen formerly attended the King upon going to battle. So late as the reign of George the Second, on the 5th of December, 1745, when, the rebels having advanced to Derby, the King gave orders that his standard should be set up on Finchley-common, the gentlemen were ordered to be in readiness with their horses, servants, and arms, to attend upon him.

The harbinger is the courrier en avance, and precedes the Sovereign one day, to announce the coming of royalty, and to prepare bed and board for the Royal Body Guard. Whatever palace was visited, the corps used to attend; but of late years they have only been summoned on state occasions. The gentlemen are styled esquires in their warrants, which place them on a par with captains in the army. The officers wear a field marshal's feather in their caps, and attend with their silver sticks in the Presence Chamber, and also at the foot of the throne in the House of Lords, and at the Palace when the Queen receives addresses.

On this day of high festivity the courts of the palace were occupied by the bands of the 1st and 3rd Foot Guards and the mounted band of the Horse Guards. The latter wore a most royal aspect; but the great silver kettle drums, valued at five hundred guineas each, and placed under the special guardianship of a couple of soldiers with drawn swords, were the objects of general wonder and admiration. These drums are of great power, and gave an effect of touching solemnity to the prayer of "God save the Queen," with the celebrated variations by the Duchess of Kent.

PHILHARMONIC CONCERTS.

The second concert for the season took place on Monday evening last, and was much more numerously attended than the previous one: indeed, the room was most densely crowded. The following was the programme of the occasion:—

ACT I.

Sinfonia, in C minor, No. 5	Haydn.
Rec., "And he journeyed," } Air, "But the Lord is mindful" }	Miss S. Flower ..... Mendelssohn.
Concerto, Pianoforte, Madame Dulcken	Chopin.
Scena (from "Faust"), "Love how mighty,"	Miss Rainforth Spohr.
Overture, "Der Berggeist",	Do.

ACT II.

Sinfonia, "Eroica"	Beethoven.
Rec., "Tis raging noon," } Air, "Distressful Nature," }	Mr. Hobbs ..... Haydn.
Duetto, "Eluben a te fertile" ("Semiramide"),	Miss Rainforth and Miss S. Flower ..... Rossini.
Overture, "Les Deux Journées"	Cherubini.

Leader, Mr. T. Cooke. Conductor, Mr. C. Potter.

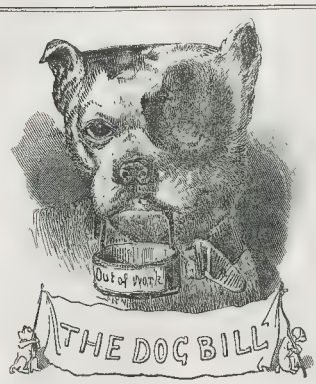
It must be, however, unwillingly confessed that the instrumental music of Haydn begins to "wax faintly" on the ears of those who are in the habit of being startled, almost stunned sometimes, by modern orchestral combinations. Not so with his vocal, which "was not for an age, but for all time!" The sinfonia was finely performed; but we could not but regret the divorcement of those two orchestra-turtles Dragonetti and Lindley, however ably the place of the former was supplied by (almost his rival) Howell. Miss S. Flower's beautiful voice was very happy in Mendelssohn's recitative and air from St. Paul; we wish this young lady would not rely so much upon her physique. Madame Dulcken performed a new concerto in F minor by Chopin, in a most brilliant and effective manner; quite recovered, we should say, from the accident which prevented her from playing at the last concert. The composer was more indebted to his fair representative than to his own genius, for the work is more crabbed than elegant. She was rapturously applauded, particularly in the Adagio. Miss Rainforth gave the scena from Faust with most excellent intention, and occasionally with great truth and energy. Spohr's romantic overture, "Der Berggeist," was finely performed: it is a piece of the most fanciful poetry—a musical phantasm, from beginning to end—"a thing of beauty" which will be "a joy for ever!"

Act II. commenced with the instrumental giant's sinfonia "Eroica," which had ample justice done to it by this fine band. There is a closeness in Mr. Cooke's style of leading which (to borrow terms of another art) admirably harmonizes the accessories of his picture. Mr. Hobbs sweetly and chastely gave the recitative and air from the "Seasons," and the duet from "Semiramide" was very charmingly sung by Miss Rainforth and Miss S. Flower. The concert terminated with Cherubini's effective overture, which was condemned to the vile office of (as organists say) PLAYING OUT the discriminating congregation.

SUDDEN DEATH OF MRS. HONEY, THE POPULAR VOCALIST.—We have to record the death of this lady, which took place at her residence, No. 149, Albany-street, Regent's-park, on Sunday evening, at eight o'clock, from the effects of violent inflammation, induced by over exertion in her profession. Mrs. Honey's last engagement was at the City of London Theatre, and her final appearance there was on Saturday, the 25th of March. She was the daughter of Mrs. Young, an actress of some repute, now engaged at the Eagle Saloon. The deceased was in her twenty-sixth year. Mrs. Honey has left two children, one ten and the other three years old.

The Inverness Courier contains the particulars of the following strange circumstance which occured at Brora, last week. Early in the morning a boat was driven into that place nearly full of water, and an idiot boy the only person on board. The poor lad could give no account of himself, but could speak both English and Gaelic. Mr. Hoon (Brora) kindly took charge of the helpless youth, and made inquiries in all directions respecting the owner of the boat, when it turned out to be a fishing-boat belonging to a crew in Burghead, that had been safely moored in the harbour. The lad had loosed the moorings on Sunday, and entering the boat, had been drifted across the Firth, a distance of forty miles.

The Earl of Rosslyn, master of the royal stag-hounds, has resolved to "do away" with the annual Easter hunt, with the royal hounds, owing, it is said, to Easter falling so late, and the consequent forwardness of the season. The hunt has existed through the reign of several sovereigns.



DOG-DAYS IN APRIL.

WITH FLUCTUATIONS OF CANINE DESTINY.

FYTTE I.—ANTICIPATORY LAMENT.

ON THE CARRYING OF THE DOG-CART BILL BY THE COMMONS.

No work! Alas! we're not a mettled race,
Nor mettled racers, 'cause of this new law;
Artists have got the best of us—we are Allowed no longer in the streets to draw!

Artists once painted us when we were going;
Now they must paint us when we are no go!
They used to dash off all our shafts and wheels;
Now they can only take our shafts of woe!

Artists can trace; but we, alas! poor dogs,
Are cut out of the traces altogether;
Once we reign'd—rain or shine—(that's whether or no!)
But now it's no in every kind of weather.

Ah! once we bore our ponderous carts of meat,
But now they deem it is not meet we should;
It's very clear we're going to the bad,
And that, alas! with nothing to the good!

No matter to what breed we may belong—
Spaniels or poodles, terriers, hounds, or harriers—
It's clear the bill they've carried pigeons us,
By placing us beyond the pale of carriers!

We used to carry cats' meat—dogs' meet too—
Ten thousand cats and dogs our daily trackers,
Who then would mew (oh Muse!) and bow (oh row!)
To see our knack of running from the knackers!

Now they have taken all our harness off,
Yet saddled us with mischief, we opine;
Your common schoolmasters cane two or three,
But they're not happy short of the ca-nine!

You say we are no longer fit to drag
(Like Turkish drag-o-man)—we're sickly! Hark!
Well, then, we'll throw away our common food,
And to avoid consumption—take to bark!

You've ruined us! It's well to talk of bark;
But we've a more intoxicating sign:
You have so grieved us by your horrid act,
That we shall all be dead of too much whine!

We never overthrived with what we did,
But now no trade at all you let us don;
We never were particularly fat,
But now we've nothing left to lean upon!

Give us a settlement—some gentle place
Of equal sweet repose for dog and bitch:
Perhaps you would send all the race apace
Into the quiet workhouse of Houndsditch!

Or meekly hint, with nothing more to do,
That emigration suits us out of hand;
And, with more point than pointers often 'claim,
Bid dogs in general go to New-found-land!

But we say no! Aggrieved—abused—beset—
Our indignation common anger flogs:
If we must go, ten thousand pounds we bet,
Our grand asylum is the Isle of Dogs!

FYTTE II.—JUBILEE IN POSTSCRIPT.

UPON THE THROWING OUT OF THE SAME BILL BY THE LORDS.

Hurrah!—our bill's thrown out, and we have now
Got a carte-blanche as usual; we can drag!—
Dog's meat is still the go; and poor "bow-wow"
Is robbed no longer of his right to fag!
Meanwhile our joy Old Cobbett's thanks affords,
And sings, "Thank heav'n—we have a House of Lords."

THE PROJECT OF AËRIAL LOCOMOTION REFUTED.

"Pigs may fly, but they are very unlikely birds."—Old Proverb.

In our description, last week, of Mr. Henson's contrivance for navigating the aerial regions, we stated our conviction that the plan would not answer. We now purpose to show why it will not answer, and it is our intention to be so explicit that every man, woman, and child, content to lend us five minutes of their attention, may be able to see that the plan is a delusion. The bubble, we have all along felt, requires only the impact of a few grains of common sense to bring about its explosion, and we strongly suspect that we are destined to be the instruments of that happy catastrophe.

The power for sustaining the machine in the atmosphere resides exclusively in the great rectangular frame of canvass or silk extending across the machine, and which constitutes, in fact, an immense kite, the effect being virtually the same whether an inclined plane impinge upon the air or the air impinge upon an inclined plane. Now it is undoubtedly true that if this inclined frame be forced through the air at a great velocity, it will lift or sustain a considerable weight, nor is there any theoretical limit to the weight which may thus be sustained any more than to the force a man may exert by a lever, with which, if long enough and strong enough, he may move the world. But the question resolves itself into this—What weight will a given size of kite sustain at a given angle and given velocity, and what power will be necessary to produce that velocity? If the ship and kite, steam-engine, boiler, fuel, &c., were without weight aërial navigation might, no doubt, be accomplished with ease; but such, unfortunately, is not the case, and the question of its present practicability is determinable solely by a reference to the weight the kite can lift, and the propulsive efficacy which may be derived from such a weight of fuel and machinery. If 500 horses' power were necessary to propel the frame against the wind at a given velocity, and the frame at that velocity could not sustain a greater weight of machinery than five horses' power, the machine could manifestly no more ascend or continue up than a single horse could carry one of the pyramids.

The force with which air impinges upon any flat surface at different velocities is very well known. At a velocity of 30 miles an hour the pressure on a square foot is 4·429 lb.; at 40 miles an hour, 7·873 lb.; at 50 miles an hour, 12·3 lb.; and at 60 miles an hour, 17·715 lb. The resistance the kite will experience must of course be proportional to the angle of inclination, and may be expressed by the sine of the angle, or by the dotted lines in the figure—the resistance being, of course, increased as the angle is made greater. But the sustaining power also varies in the same ratio; and, if the velocity and angle be such that the pressure on the sine be 13,000 lb., the sustaining power will be about 6500 lb. Taking, then, the velocity of 60 miles per hour—a moderate velocity for a machine that is to reach India in four days—we shall find that to impel the kite, so that it may sustain a weight of 6500 lb., will require a power of about 700 horses! A horse power is well known to be equal to 33,000 lb. raised through one yard in a minute, and 15,000 × 1760, the number of yards in a mile, which gives allowance for the obliquity of impact, and ÷ 33,000 = 701 horses' power. In other words, to enable Mr. Henson's machine to go up he must first have succeeded in putting a horse-power engine, with its boiler, water, condenser, and fuel for a long voyage, into a weight of 10 lb.! When this is done, a flying machine is the least of the wonders we shall see. Every umbrella will be transformed into a Pegasus, and walking-sticks will advance with many horses' power. The aërial locomotive will then go up, and, we rather suspect, not till then.

In the preceding estimate we have supposed the ship, vanes, kite, passengers, and provisions to be absolutely without weight; but, inasmuch as these accumulated weights would necessarily greatly exceed 6500 lb., the engine and boiler would not only require to be without weight, but actually to gravitate upwards: in other words, the machinery would require to be such, that even while it was stationary it would require a certain force to retain it upon the earth. We are heartily ashamed at the public toleration of such a project even for a moment; and we can well conceive how foreigners may laugh at our credulity, or how, six months hence, we may laugh at ourselves.

We have refrained from analysing Mr. Henson's statement relative to the weight of his engine, chiefly because it is so manifestly visionary as to carry its own refutation. If, however, we were to accept his proposition that a 20-horse power engine might be made with a weight of 600 lb, still his machine could not go up; for 700 horses' power being requisite for propulsion, the weight to be lifted, even according to Mr. Henson's own showing, of 600 lb. for 20 horses' power, would be 600 multiplied by 35 = 700 being equal to 35 times 20—which is equal to 21,000 lb., while the utmost weight the kite can lift, with the area and velocity assumed, is only 6500 lb.

THE FASHIONS.

Paris, Rue Chaussée d'Antin, April 4, 1843.

MON CHER MONSIEUR,—The breath of spring is hastening, with rapid strides, to supersede our winter fashions. That, for the several days past, an unexpected alteration has been observable at our balls and grand parties in the dress of our Parisa fashionables; still, however, we have not entirely laid aside our warm clothing, though the fashion of wearing it is somewhat altered. In our streets and public promenades cashmeres, casimeres, and other solid fabrics, are constantly to be met with; and the well-known taste of our fair Parisians has never been more remarkable than at the present moment in adjusting them to the peculiar requirements of the season. Allow me, then, to notice three or four of the dresses I have met with in my morning's walk as a justification of my remark, premising, always, that the ladies who wore them are noted for good taste, and the general elegance of all their appointments. I will cite, in the first instance, a robe in green casmere, figured in spots upon the front of the skirt; a plain corsage, made high, without band at the waist; and likewise embroidered in spots, and with sleeves perfectly plain. Another robe was in dark cashmere, with the skirt united to the corsage, which was high, draped cross-wise—that is to say, from the epaulette to the middle of the front; the sleeve plain, ornamented at the top by a bais of similar stuff, and with buttons in passementerie. A third robe was of black mohair, ornamented at the skirt, with three high flounces covering about two thirds of the skirt. The corsage was high, plain, and brought to a rounded point; the sleeve plain. A fourth, and which, to my taste, was the most becoming of all, was a gros de Naples robe, with grey and white stripes, the skirt of which was trimmed with three rows of flounces of the same material, the spaces between each flounce being about the width occupied by the flounce itself; corsage high on the shoulders, and open in front, gathered at the shoulders, and plain towards the waist; double pockey sleeves, rounded and edged with a frill of stuff. Nothing could exceed the effect of this costume, which was at once new, elegant, and piquante.

Our full dress costumes have, as yet, experienced no very remarkable change; perhaps the fashions of them would be best understood by a description of the dresses actually worn at a late ball given by Madame de L., whose réunions have been so récherché this winter. Perhaps we ought to put in the first rank that worn by the amiable hostess herself, which consisted of a Pompadour robe in jonquil damask, with a plain skirt, the front of which was hemmed with two deep falls of English point lace; the second, which was made shorter, was rounded on each side of the hem in front, and attached to the first by two bouquets of roses, the one placed at the bottom of the skirt, upon the border of the fall of lace, the other upon the middle. The corsage was worn off the neck and pointed, and with short sleeves. Two other toilettes still deserve mention: the first was a robe of grey cut velvet, ornamented at the bottom of the skirt with four little biais of the same material disposed in festoons, and looped up by silver cords, and terminated by tassels; the corsage, which was off the neck, was brought to a point in the form of a heart, bordered by an edging of silver fastened to the front, and terminated by large silver tassels. The other was a robe with a double skirt, of which the first was of black velvet, trimmed with a deep fall of black lace, serving as a border for a puffing of black satin, which surrounded the skirt. The second skirt, of violet satin, was very short, and open on each side towards the waist; a fall of lace ornamented the bottom of the skirt, and just reached far enough to meet upon the first fa; the opening of the skirt was trimmed with an ornament of black passementerie; the corsage, of violet satin, was worn off the neck, pointed, with a basis, without being cut off at the shoulder, and thus forming a berthe, the sleeves were short and plain, of black velvet, and with second open sleeves in satin. The effect of this last dress was really magnificent. I hope soon to have much more to communicate to you, for, as the season advances, we may expect to see a greater variety in our fashions, and I trust they will, make up for the barrenness of my late epistles.

HENRIETTE DE B.

THE SUFFOLK-STREET EXHIBITION.

In resuming our account of this exhibition we may again observe, that it is impossible, in the space we are able to devote to subjects of this nature, to notice every work which may be deserving of commendation. No doubt there are many works possessing claims to notice, and boasting of those qualities which best distinguish art, which have escaped our observation; but to such we feel assured the discriminating taste of the public will not fail to award their just meed of praise. In continuation of our notice of the oil paintings we may direct attention to:—

No. 165. "Devonshire Scene." J. W. Allen. A large and finely-composed landscape; but whether a particular view in Devonshire, or an original landscape composition, does not appear. It is, however, a beautifully-coloured view, has a great air of reality, and certainly possesses all the leading characteristics of Devonshire scenery.

174. "A View near Henley-on-the-Thames." T. Tennant. This is another landscape, exquisitely painted, in which we may say that some of the finest qualities of landscape-painting are discernible. The careful observer will perceive in this piece the good arrangement of the masses, the nice balance of light and harmony of colour, and an agreeable freedom of execution, which yet admits of minute detail, and allows a proper expression to be given to every part of the landscape.

186. "A Scene in the Middle Ages, suggested by a Visit to Haddon Hall." A. J. Woolmer. This is a sketch full of fancy, conceived somewhat in the spirit of Watteau, but it is injured by a loose and indecisive mode of execution, a defect which vitiates most of this artist's works.

201. "Going to Water." J. Tennant. For warm, sunny, and transparent effect this landscape stands unrivalled in the exhibition. In its composition it is extremely graceful. The animals which are introduced in the foreground are painted with judgment, and the whole picture is clear and pure in its colour. In its treatment it strongly reminds the beholder of some of Cuyp's luminous landscapes.

212. "A Mill in Devonshire—Cloudy Weather." J. Wilson, jun. This is a very sweet landscape, with somewhat of a Ruysdael effect. The sky is remarkably successfully painted.

227. "London, from Greenwich Park." J. B. Pyne. Landscapes form the greater portion of the pictures in the present exhibition, and we are not sure but they include the greater portion of the talent displayed. This view of London is a picture of very large dimensions, and of considerable merit. The view of the metropolis, as might be expected, occupies but a small portion of the canvas, the rest being a representation of Greenwich Park. Of this work we may say that, while it possesses good local colouring, its main defect is want of force, which is especially evident in the foreground.

249. "An Old Mill on the River Ouse." H. J. Boddington. Of this landscape we may say that it presents a fresh, lively, and natural effect, and that the distant parts are treated in a very masterly manner.

250. "Portrait of Mrs. Stevens." W. Patten. The first impression created by this portrait is unfavourable, on account of the vulgarity of the attitude, but on a further inspection it will be found to possess some fine colouring and soft and fleshy execution.

265. "Morbid Sympathy." E. Prentis. This is an admirable satire on the perverted taste of the present day, which sympathises with notorious criminals, and it is painted in Mr. Prentis's happiest style. The subject is divided into two compartments. In the first we have a view of a house with an open door, from which a ruffian, with all the lineaments of turpitude on his countenance, is stealing. The spots of blood on his garment show that he has been a party to no light crime, and the convulsive grasp he gives the railings indicates the disturbed state of his sensations. In the second compartment we find him a prisoner in the condemned cell at Newgate, of which Mr. Prentis has given us a very accurate portrait. Here the criminal appears to be the subject of curiosity and sympathy of an elderly gentleman and two ladies, one of whom has pinned a white camellia in his bosom, which by the purity of its colour makes him look a greater villain than before. This group is admirably composed, and the story is told so well that it is impossible to mistake its meaning.

279. "Rebecca presenting a Casket of Jewels to the Bride of Ivanhoe." T. Clater. An interesting group, not so much remarkable for expression as for the admirable painting of the draperies, which in colour and texture vie with nature.

298. "A Scene from 'Boccacio.'" A. J. Woolmer. In this imaginative composition there is much to admire and much to condemn. In regard to its rich contrasts of colour it stands with few rivals in the exhibition, but it has the same defect of indecisive execution which is visible in all this artist's works. There is also something faulty in the perspective. It is hardly possible the building in the background could be so high.

320. "Portrait of the late Monsieur Louis Pouchée, born January 18, 1736, at Rouen, Normandie, and died in London, February 17, 1843, in his 108th year." The late Madame Soyer. This is the most remarkable portrait in the exhibition. It is said to be the last piece of painting executed by the late Madame Soyer. It is certainly one of her most successful portraits for character and fine colour.

321. "A Scene from 'She Stoops to Conquer.'" A. T. Darby. The scene is that where Marlow, on being formally introduced to Miss Hardcastle, is overwhelmed with mauvaise honte. The story is well delineated on canvass, the attitudes of the principal figures well chosen, and the drawing correct.

343. "A Subject from Chaucer." A. J. Woolmer. Another poetical composition, presenting the same merits and the same defects as those formerly noticed. The same may be said of No. 438.

360. "Entrance of Leith Harbour." J. Wilson. A very pleasing view, with a fine, natural effect of colour.

388. "Heart of Oak." H. J. Pidding. A sketch, full of nature and character, of an old Greenwich pensioner. The colour and general effect are excellent.

396. "Going out to a Wreck." J. Wilson. This is, perhaps, without exception, the grandest and most effective composition in the Gallery. It is a sea-piece, somewhat in Backhuysen's style, with a life-boat going out to a wreck. The effect is bold, and the proper spirit is well sustained throughout the whole picture, with the exception, perhaps, of the parts in the foreground, which appear to want force. The sky and water are admirably painted, and convey, very forcibly, the idea of the presence of a storm at sea. The vigorous handling in this marine piece is much to be admired; in fact, it gives it its principal charm.

422. "Pogano, and Church of S. M. della Salute, Venice." C. F. Tomkins. This is not so good a painting as the little piece formerly mentioned, No. 41. It is neither so bright in effect, nor is the light so well concentrated. The distance is not painted with sufficient tenderness.

444. "Portrait of the Hon. Mrs. Keith Stewart." F. Y. Hurlstone. This is rather an elegant portrait; the expression refined without being affected. It is painted in too low a key of colour.

450. "Nature and Art." J. W. Allen. A playful composition. Some children having found their way into an artist's study, are making free with his brushes and colours. There is a great deal of nature in this little piece, and the interior and all the accessories are well painted.

462. "Village School." J. B. Pyne. An interesting group is assembled before the school-door. The landscape is exquisitely painted.

467. "Dogana da Mare Ossia di Transito, Venice." J. Holland. This is one of the best painted Venetian views in the Gallery. It is bright, clear, and forcible.

535. "The Empress Pheophans begging her husband, Leo X., to delay the execution of Michael, the Parygian." H. Johnstone. This is a most singular painting, and seems to be an imitation of the Greek paintings of the middle ages. It is certainly not in the least in accordance with the taste of the present age. It presents violent contrasts of colour, stiff and ungainly attitudes, and expressions serious without much meaning.

567. "Spanish Muleteer Boys," from the life. F. Y. Hurlstone. This study from the life is, on the whole, very successful. The group is composed with much simplicity. It reminds the beholder of Murillo's studies of Spanish character; but it will be found to be wanting in the delicate pencilling, the soft and fleshy touch, and the refinement and sentiment which distinguish that celebrated painter's works.

573. "A Flower-girl of Seville," from the life. By the same, is subject to similar criticism, with the addition that it is in parts marked by negligent drawing.

In the room containing the water-colour drawings and miniatures, we observed some very clever views by J. Holland, which equal, if not excel, his efforts in oil-painting; and we also particularly noticed:—

612. "May Day." A. D. Fripp. A group of children celebrating May-day, which, though at first not very attractive, increases its interest upon further examination. In the happy faces of the children may be traced the lineaments of innocence and nature. But on the other hand, it may be observed that the grouping is without art, and that the colouring can boast of no scientific arrangement.

627. "Prospect-walk, Hampstead." J. Rider. This is a spirited and well-coloured drawing.

639. "Dolly dressing for the Ball." Miss J. Blackmore. A very meritorious production, and one which shows that the fair artist is no mean proficient in the higher qualities of art. The story is told with much ingenuity, and the general treatment of the picture very pleasing.

656. "John Anthony, Esq." H. Wilkin. We noticed this as being one of the best of the miniatures exhibited.

Among the specimens of sculpture exhibited in the Gallery, of which there are only seventeen in number, we observed

No. 735. "A Greek Warrior in Ambush." P. Park. An heroic statue, the size of life, full of energy and spirit, conceived in a pure and classic taste. The muscular development is correct, but perhaps the lower extremities are somewhat too slight in form compared with the massive character of the upper portion of the figure.

737. "Lucy Fielding—part of a Monument." E. Papworth. A recumbent figure of great elegance of form.

738. "His Royal Highness Prince Albert." R. W. Sievier. Decidedly the best likeness we have seen of his Royal Highness. It is beautifully modelled, and the sculptor has preserved the refinement of expression of the original, as well as the literal details of his features.

743. "Hero guiding Leander." W. C. Marshall. A graceful and well-modelled composition.

With these remarks we must close our notice of this exhibition, which we have great pleasure in repeating reflects high credit not only on the members of the Society, but on all who have contributed to it.

SIR GEORGE HAYTER'S HISTORICAL PICTURES.—After an almost incessant application to the picture of "The House of Commons which assembled in the year 1833, after the passing of the Reform Act," this artist has completed his laborious work, and it is not too much to say that he has produced a picture which faithfully records a great national event, and which transmits to posterity the portraits of nearly four hundred contemporaneous public men, many of whom have occupied for some years a great space in the public eye. All these persons have sat for their portraits, and the studies of their heads and features are, together with the picture itself, displayed on the walls of the Egyptian Hall as an exhibition of no common interest. The picture as a work of art is full of forcible effect and good colouring, an excellent management of perspective, and perfect truth of representation. The treatment of a difficult subject has been treated in a manner which overcomes the difficulties and makes the painting pictorial. In the same room with this picture are displayed the well-known pictures of "The Trial of Lord Cochrane," which the Lady Dover has kindly lent to the artist, and the still better known picture, "The Trial of Lord William Russell," which the Duke of Bedford has allowed to be removed from Woburn Abbey, besides several other pictures, including an original portrait of the Queen, painted by Sir George Hayter, by command of the King of Prussia.

CONCERT.—We have pleasure in directing public attention to a concert announced by Mr. Allcroft for Wednesday the 12th inst., at the MUSIC HALL, Store-street. To indicate the attraction of the performance, we need only mention the names of some of the principal performers to supply our readers, viz. the Misses Birch, Mrs. Alfred Shaw, Miss Novello, Miss Dolby, the Signors Sapio, Benzi, Henry Phillips, and the inimitable John Parry. The solo performers are Dulcken, Bochsa, Richardson, Mori, and Blagrove.

NATIONAL SPORTS.

THE PRESENT SEASON.

Our popular pastimes have each "their seasons and their change;" the sporting winter and its appropriate engagements going out with March, while April, with its Easter holydays, serves as a fitting herald of the merry summer time and rural festivities. We have bade adieu for a space to hunting, shooting, coursing, and those amusements known more particularly as "field sports," and offer welcome to racing, yachting, rowing, fishing, cricket, and archery, the latter on the score of our gallantry. The turf will open for business on Easter Monday with the Newmarket Craven Meeting, when people will have racing facts to entertain them instead of betting fictions got up at Tattersall's to make them laugh at the wrong sides of their mouths. There are as many tastes as men, according to the proverb; according to us, those who go to Hyde-park-corner for fun ought to call it "below" for genuine, which is a polite version of Jack's opinion of amateur-sailing. Speaking of the latter popular pursuit (without entering into the history of yachting since Noah introduced the fashion), we may be allowed to state that, if its quality may be deduced from the quantity of its waterval, there will be goodly doings afloat in 1843. The Royal Yacht Squadron numbers 83 sail, the Royal Thames Club 67, even the Royal Western 43, to say nothing of the chippers that hail from the various Irish and Scottish ports. As for rowing, there are as many cutters, gigs, funnies, wherries, and nine-oarsmen for oars and sculls, on the Thames alone, as would make a bridge of boats from Dover to Calais. It is a truly manly sport, and would be a truly English one, if the crews would only leave straw hats and blue ribbons to the corps de ballet at the opera, and primrose kid gloves to the frequenters of its pit and boxes. Fishing is sure to flourish—and so are those who handle the rod, whether for the fly or bottom angling. Cricket, as Tom Hood would say, bids fair to go "a good bat;" and who can doubt but that archery will prosper, since it is patronised by the ladies, whom nature has made perfect in the management of bows (beaux). Thus have we shown that a gallant season is ensured to the lovers of good old English pastimes; and, having premised what pleasure has in store, as a makeweight we give the quotations from Tattersall's:—

The Standard of Thursday says that Mr. Wordsworth, in consequence of communications from Sir Robert Peel and the Lord Chamberlain, has accepted the appointment of Poet Laureate.

THE METROPOLITAN IMPROVEMENTS.—On Tuesday, by order of the Commissioners of Woods and Forests, the remainder of the houses on the east side of Castle-street, Leicester-square, were disposed of by auction, for the purpose of forming the new street which is to lead from Coventry-street to Long-acre.

COUNTRY NEWS.

COWES, ISLE OF WIGHT.—LAUNCH OF A SCHOONER—DREADFUL ACCIDENT.—On Monday last the schooner yacht Fury was launched at Cowes, to the great delight of a numerous company of spectators, amongst whom there were—the Marquis of Conyngham, John Lennox Gower, Esq., and several other members of the R Y S.; the Misses Ward, and many of our resident families. Miss Gower named the vacht. Thus far all went on well. In the adjoining yard, on a row above, dreadfully shattering it, and carrying away nearly the whole of his face and the front part of his head. The force was so great that it shot him at least six feet into the sea, to all appearance as if he had been thrown there with great force. The operator that (Mr. Lowther) who discharged the gun ran and jumped in after him, and on his rising, assisted to get him into a boat, but he was quite dead from the loss of blood; the water was quite dyed with it for a considerable distance. His name was James Richardson, only son of Mr. James Richardson, shipwright, who was an eye-witness of the unfortunate accident. The young man was very much respected, would have been out of his time on Wednesday, the 5th inst., and was to be married on Easter Monday next. A supper had been ordered for seventy of the men employed in building and fitting the vessel, but the dreadful death of one of their party of course put an end to their proposed entertainment. A coroner's inquest was held on the body on Tuesday, when a verdict of "Accidental death" was returned.

DURHAM ELECTION.—Mr Beaumont has been elected a candidate for the electors on Monday. The following was the state of the poll at the close:—

Dunganon	507	Bright	406

ROCHESTER.—John Richmond Ellis, the Irishman who has been in custody for some days on a charge of using treasonable expressions against her Majesty, and threatening to take the life of Sir Robert Peel, was removed on Wednesday, from the station-house to the county gaol at Maidstone, where he will undergo twelve months's imprisonment.

LEICESTER.—The proposition for removing the House of Correction to the county gaol, which would have created an expense of £25,000 on the rate payers, was on Monday last rejected by the Magistrates assembled at quarter sessions, at the Bell Hotel Leicester, by a majority of 14 to 9.

WINDSOR.—ATTEMPTED DUEL.—On Friday week, the mayor of Windsor having received information that a duel was to be fought next morning between Lieut. Dacosta of the Royal Engineers, and Assist.-Surgeon F. W. G. Calder, of the 2nd Life Guards (stationed at Windsor), warrants to apprehend the principals and their seconds were issued, and by eight o'clock on Saturday morning Mr. Calder and Lieut.-Colonel Melville Glennie, late of the 60th Rifles (the intended second to Lieut. Dacosta), were taken into custody. Lieut. Dacosta had left Windsor before the warrant could be served upon him, and the second of Mr. Calder was also non est. The parties, upon appearing before the mayor, did not attempt to deny that they were about to fight a duel; and the chief magistrate called upon them to find bail, each of them in the sum of £100, and two sureties, in each case, of £50 each, to keep the peace. A union, which had been in contemplation between Mr. Calder and Miss Dacosta, the step-daughter of Colonel Glennie, and the sister of Lieut. Dacosta, and which was lately broken off, is said to have been the cause of a hostile message having been sent to Mr. Calder by the young lady's brother.

IRELAND.

In Ireland very slight, and in themselves unimportant occurrences, frequently give rise to disagreeable if not dangerous excitements. Thus, within the last few days, the Irish press has been teeming with invective because the gentlemen who formerly supplied the Government with the mess-dishes has been deprived of the contract, and it has been given to a Scotch firm, who, it appears, from the spread of railways in England and Scotland, is able to supply the coaches (second hand ones of course) much cheaper. The Evening Mail, the Irish Conservative organ, makes the following comments in reference to this subject, but with what degree of truth or fidelity of colouring we are not prepared to vouch. "Ireland is not at this moment placed in ordinary circumstances; and any measure that goes to reduce her trade, or injure her manufactures, goes to add strength to the repeal cry, and to afford an additional argument to the demagogues of domestic legislation. The closing the gates of the factories of Messrs. Bourne and those of Mr. Purcell, which have afforded employment and given bread to hundreds, will be hailed as a God-send by Mr. O'Connell, who will unquestionably attribute the saving a farthing for the proprietors, or those who may be driven from employment, as will best suit his object of separating this country from England. The insane acts of violence which are every day adding to the already increasing the causes for agitation; and we tremble to think that a perseverance in the reckless course which they are pursuing will leave them, and that at no distant period, without a struggle, in the country arrested by those acts was their duty to support, and deep sad by those whom they cannot conciliate."

THE LORD MAYOR OF DUBLIN'S DINNER—CURIOUS INCIDENT.—The Lord Mayor gave a splendid civic entertainment in the Mansion House, on Thursday se'nnight, which was attended by the leading citizens of all parties. In the course of the evening Colonel Browne, commissioner of police (a brother of our late Mr. Hermann), some of the Police Magistrates," which abounds with allusions anything but complimentary to the bravery of the French. The gal ant colonel, who is a very kind hearted man, was totally unaware that the French Consul was seated very near him; but the company generally were aware of his proximity, and a very painful feeling was felt through the room at so untoward an occurrence. Some time after, Colonel Browne left the room to the table and delivered his explanation and apology; but truth to say, they were not felt to be necessary.

ATHLONE ELECTION.—The election for this borough commenced on Friday morning. The late member, Major Beresford, was proposed by Charles Handcock, Esq., and seconded by —— Sprowle, Esq. Dr. Cantwell proposed, and D. B. Reilly, Esq., seconded Mr. Colett. Major Beresford and Mr. Colett severally addressed the assembly. At the close of the poll the numbers stood as follow:—Mr. Colett, 113; Major Beresford, 106; majority, 7.

Inspector O'Connor and a party of the metropolitan police paid a series of visits, as unwelcome as unexpected, to several noted gambling-houses in Dublin, between each and three o'clock on Monday morning last. In South Frederick-street and Pit-street the police broke in the doors, and succeeded in securing the inmates, with all their stock in trade, dice, cards, money, &c. An investigation was instituted before the magistrates in College-street police-office—between thirty and forty of the frequenters of the hells thus unexpectedly stormed having been brought for examination.

CENTRAL CRIMINAL COURT.

The sixth session during the present mayoralty commenced on Monday, before the Right Hon. the Lord Mayor, the Recorder, Aldermen, the Sheriffs, Under Sheriffs, and usual civic authorities. The Grand Jury were briefly addressed the grand jury, and said, that although there were already nearly 300 prisoners for trial, many of whom were charged with very serious offences, still, happily, the calendar for the present month did not find that any legal difficulty was likely to arise which rendered it necessary for him to detain them with any lengthened observations with respect to the law in connexion with such cases. After a few remarks upon the state of the calendar, the Recorder remitted the jury to the discharge of their duties. The cases tried during the day were devoid of public interest.

WARRANTS.—SPECIAL COMMISSION.—At the sitting of the court on the morning the Recorder, Mr. Commissioner Bullock, the Sheriffs, Under Sheriffs, and Alderman Sir Chapman Marshall, took their seats on the bench. Proclamation having been made, Mr. Clark, the clerk of the court, read the commission which had been issued for the trial of James Dawson, on a charge of the murder of a man whose name is unknown, in a country beyond the jurisdiction of the Admiralty, and now within the dominions of the Crown of Great Britain and Ireland. A special grand jury was then sworn, and charged at considerable length by the Recorder, who explained the law of the case. At eleven o'clock the special grand jury returned into court, and presented a true bill for wilful murder against James Dawson. They were then discharged by Mr. Justice Cresswell. This is only the second special commission which has been issued under the provisions of the 9th of George IV., to try persons at this court, since the act establishing the jurisdiction of the Central Criminal Court; and it is rather a remarkable circumstance that for other cases for the trial of which a special commission was issued in the month of July, 1836, was alleged to have taken place also in the Island of Zanzibar. It will be found in Carrington and Payne's Reports, vol. vii., p. 668, Rex v. Mattos.

POLICE.

MANSION-HOUSE.—THE CHARGE OF ATTEMPTED ASSASSINATION IN ST. PAUL'S CATHEDRAL.—On Monday, Augustus John Field Sintzenich, the person who attempted to assassinate the Rev. Mr. Hadre in the cathedral of St. Paul's on Saturday last, and which was noticed in our late edition of that evening, was brought before the Lord Mayor for examination. The prisoner is under sixteen years of age. Mr. Bryerly, a barrister, attended for him.—Mr. Harde, a clerk in the Bank of England, stated that he was at St. Paul's Cathedral on Saturday last during divine service, and saw the prisoner there. The prisoner rose up when the clergyman was reading the prayer for the Queen, and drew a large horse pistol from under his handkerchief. The prisoner was in the choir, and witness ran towards him and said, "Seize him, he has a pistol." The prisoner raised the pistol, and witness saw a spark from the pan. He did not think the pistol was directed to the clergyman. The prisoner was at once seized.—Mr. Shackell, of No. 12, Fetter-lane, stated that he saw the prisoner draw the pistol from his handkerchief, and seized him. The prisoner said it was useless to hold him so tight, as he had no idea of running away.—Mr. Howton, of Lesson street, Waterloo-road, stated that he saw the prisoner raise the pistol, and tried to snatch it from him. There was a scuffle for the pistol between the prisoner and witness. The prisoner snapped the pistol, but it missed fire. He did not seem to be at all excited.—Master Gulling, a Christ's Hospital scholar, stated that he knocked the prisoner's hand down when the prisoner raised the pistol.—Mr. Wood proposed that he also struck the prisoner's arm when the pistol was elevated.—Mr. Lingard, one of the vergers of St. Paul's, stated that there were five or six shots of No. 6 in the pistol, and a very small quantity of powder. The powder and the shot were together, and there was no wadding whatever. There was no priming, nor had there been any in the pan, and witness believed the pistol would not have gone off.—The prisoner upon being asked by the Lord Mayor whether he wished to say anything, replied in the negative.—Inspector Lloyd produced the following letter, which the prisoner wrote to his brother at the station-house:—"Dear Brother,—I write to inform you of the situation I am in. I took it into my head to have a pop at the clergyman at St. Paul's, and I am now in a police-station in an alley that is at least six feet thick. Don't trouble yourself about it, as I did no harm; but be so good as not to tell papa and mamma yet, as it will put them out. My examination comes on on Monday next, at twelve o'clock, as I hear. I want you to come and see me on Monday next, as the old you have seen me. I hope I shall see you to-morrow; but it did exasperate me above a bit when I heard the fellow calling the usurper Queen, when I have lately discovered that James Stuart is my sovereign. Give my love to all, and tell them not to fear about me, and should you come to see me to-morrow, come by yourself. Your affectionate brother, A. S. T. SINTZENICH.—Fleet-street, enquire for the police-station."—In answer to a question from the Lord Mayor, the prisoner said the letter was his. He added that he had to deny that the pistol was snapped. Here an old cover of a writing-book was produced, with some of the prisoner's writing, asserting the right of the Stuarts to the throne, and denying the right of any other family to that distinction. It was subscribed, "A Stanch Jacobite." The counsel for the prisoner said he could prove the insanity of the prisoner, and suggested the propriety of the lord mayor's directing that the prisoner should be taken care of, under a late statute of the Queen. The Lord Mayor said he considered the case ought to go to a jury. The prisoner pressed the suggestion very strongly, and stated that the "lad had insanely imbibed ideas of the legitimacy of certain sovereigns, and would insist upon it that the Stuarts ought to be restored to the throne of Brunswick." The prisoner was strongly excited by the performance of Rob Roy at the theatre, and seemed to believe that James Stuart, a Scotch piper, had a claim to the crown, in consequence of blood descending from that unfortunate family. The prisoner entertained thoughts of raising the claim in favour of the piper. His principles were high church and state principles, and he constantly attended divine service. His opinion of the right of the Duke of Bordeaux to the throne of France was also strong. The Lord Mayor said a jury must determine the case; it was the duty of the magistrate to commit. He would, however, postpone the case for a day or two, in order to make more particular inquiry. The prisoner was then remanded until Friday.

CHARGE OF THREATENING TO SHOOT THE QUEEN AND SIR ROBERT PEEL.—ROCHESTER, APRIL 1.—John Richmond Ellis, who stood remanded on a charge of having threatened to assassinate the Queen and Sir Robert Peel, and whose case was mentioned in this paper last week, was brought up this day before the mayor, Edward Ommanney, Esq., Robert Clements, Esq., and J. Batten, Esq., two of the borough justices.—Mr. Prall, clerk to the magistrates, read over the charge against the prisoner and the evidence that had been taken on a former occasion, and inquired of the prisoner if he had anything to say?—Prisoner: I have not.—The Mayor: Prisoner, when you were before me, on Thursday last, I felt it my duty to remand you, and directions were given to communicate with the Secretary of State concerning you. The clerk will read to you the answer that has been received.—Mr. Prall then read the following letter:—Whitehall, March 31, 1843.—I am directed by the Secretary of State, Sir James Graham, to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 30th inst., forwarding copies of depositions taken before the magistrates of the borough of Rochester, relative to the utterance of a treasonable and threatening description, uttered by a man named John Richmond Ellis; and I am to inform you it appears to Sir James Graham, that it will be proper for the magistrates to require memself bound in the sum of £20, to keep the peace for twelve months.—The Mayor: Prisoner, have you any one to be bound for you? Prisoner: What bail might be required? I am sorry for what I have done; I had been drinking.—The Mayor said they should require the prisoner to find two sureties of £10 each, and himself in £20, to keep the peace for twelve months.—The prisoner, in answer to other questions, said that he had last worked at Gravesend, with his father, whose name was Richard Richmond Ellis, but was a gunsmith in the navy, and had been dead twenty-one years.—The Mayor inquired of the station-house keeper, Mr. Vine, how the prisoner had conducted himself during his confinement.—The station-house keeper said that during the time the prisoner had been under his charge he had been very quiet.—The court consulted for some time, when they announced that the prisoner must, having taken his case into their consideration, they revoked their former decision, and they therefore required him to enter into his own security of £10, and to find two sureties of £5 each, to keep the peace towards her Majesty and all her subjects.—Bail not being forthcoming, the prisoner was removed from the bar, escorted by the police.

ACCIDENTS AND OFFENCES.

Mr. Steel, a timber agent, was thrown out of a boat in the Thames, opposite Deptford, by coming in collision with a fishing-smack on Saturday last, and unfortunately drowned.

FATAL DUEL BETWEEN AT BLACKWALL TO B. FERRAND BUSFIELD, ESQ.—On Tuesday morning, at four o'clock, a melancholy and fatal accident occurred to B. Ferrand Busfield, Esq., late of Magdalene Hall, Cambridge, and who is nearly related to the members for Bradford and Harrowborough, and which terminated fatally. It appears that Mr. Busfield left town at an early hour in the morning, for the purpose of going upon a cruise in her Majesty's steam-ship Vulcan, a revenue vessel, which has been recently fitted out at Blackwall. He proceeded in a cab to the Brunswick Wharf, at Blackwall, and, upon arriving opposite the Brunswick Hotel tap, it was necessary to cross a bridge over the railway, which leads to a narrow path, communicating directly with the wharf. The cabman, on reaching the bridge, said he did not think he could proceed any further, and Mr. Busfield alighted, and walked along the path leading to the wharf, and immediately afterwards called to the cabman to proceed, and said it was all right. The cabman drove towards the wharf, and had just reached it, when he heard Mr. Busfield hailing the steamer moored directly opposite, and directly after a splash in the water was heard, and cries of "Help, help!" The cabman immediately raised an alarm, a boat put off from the Vulcan, and drags were procured, but Busfield's body was never seen afterwards. The commander of the Vulcan gave directions to the coatmen in the neighbourhood to continue their search for the body, and offered a reward of £10 for its recovery; but we have not yet heard that the body has been found. The whole of the deceased's property was removed to the Poplar station-house, where it now remains in charge of the police. The deceased was a young gentleman of promising situation. It is only a fortnight since that intelligence was received of the death of a brother of the deceased, who perished in Canada by drowning DESTRUCTION OF GREENWICH HOSPITAL BREWERY BY FIRE.—On Wednesday morning, about half-past one o'clock, a fire took place in the brewery of the Royal Hospital, Greenwich. In a short time the necessary engines had been spread throughout the neighbourhood, and within a few seconds elapsed before four of the college engines, as well as that belonging to the parish, were brought into play on the flames. About half-past two o'clock the London Establishment and West of England engines arrived on the ground, and afforded their powerful assistance; but, unfortunately, before the fire could be extinguished, the entire building, with all the necessary brewing utensils, were consumed.

SINGULAR DEATH.—An inquest was held on Tuesday before Mr. Carter, the coroner for Surrey, at the Duke of Sussex, Peckham New Town, respecting the death of ROSE ANN COTTRELL, which occurred under singular circumstances. The deceased child resided with its parents in PEAR PLACE, Peckham New Town. On Monday last she was in the hands of another child for the same time Mrs. Cottrell was pouring some boiling water from a kettle into a tea-urn. The poor child at that moment slipped from the arms of her sister, and in falling her head came in contact with the tea-urn spigot, and the contents were poured down over the deceased on the ground. She was most dreadfully scalded. The child died, after the most careful attention, from the injuries. Verdict, "Accidental death."

SINGULAR AND DARING ESCAPE OF A CONVICT.—On Tuesday evening a convict, whose name is stated to be Jeremiah Hemming, recently convicted of burglary at the Lancashire Assizes, made his escape from custody under the following circumstances:—It appears that, on Tuesday afternoon, the man Hemming and, several other convicts were being brought up in the custody of officers, in one of the open carriages of the Birmingham train, for the purpose of being sent to the hulks at Woolwich. Hemming was handcuffed, but not attached, as is usually the case, to any of his compeers in crime, but sat by the side of one of the officers, on the side of the carriage next to the down line. Just prior to entering the Wendover tunnel he was seen all right in his place, but on the arrival of the train at the London end of it the man was missed; he had jumped out of the carriage whilst passing through the tunnel, the train at the time going at the rate of between twenty and thirty miles an hour. On arriving at the Harrow station the officer gave information to the authorities of what had happened, and a special engine was immediately despatched with him back to the Watford tunnel, where it was expected they would have found the lifeless body of the man, but, after a diligent search, nothing was discovered but his hat; and, on inquiring of the policeman on duty near the tunnel, he stated that he had observed a man some time before, without a hat, but, believing him to be a workman on the line, he took no particular notice of him. The man has not since been heard of.

Θ. ΚΟΛΟΚΟΤΡΩΝΗΣ

THE LATE GENERAL COLOCOTRONI.

(As he lay in state at Athens on the day of his public funeral, 17th February last.)

Theodore Colocotroni, the most celebrated of the Greek chiefs, died of apoplexy, at Athens, on the 16th of February last, at the age, as is supposed, of 74. Previous to the breaking out of the Greek Revolution, in 1821, Colocotroni had acquired notoriety from his daring and sanguinary exploits as a leader of banditti in Greece. Thence he was compelled to emigrate by the Turks, when he entered the Russian, and, subsequently, the English, military service, in the Ionian Islands. It is generally supposed that Colocotroni was one of the organisers of the Greek Revolution; at all events, it is certain that on the first shot being fired, in April, 1821, he quitted his occupation as a butcher, in Zante, and crossed over to the Morea, where he at once became a leading chief, and maintained this position until the combined naval and military forces of England, France, and Russia destroyed the Turkish and Egyptian fleets at Navarin, forcibly expelled the Turkish and Egyptian land forces from the fortresses, and then delivered over the country to the Greeks. The independence of Greece being thus established, Colocotroni still continued a leading character; but, in consequence of his violent opposition to any settled form of government, especially that of the Greco-Bavarian under King Otho, and for various outrageous acts on his part, he was tried and condemned to death for treason, but his sentence was commuted into imprisonment, and he was finally pardoned, loaded with honours, and reinstated in the vast property he had violently acquired. On the day appointed for his funeral the body, arrayed in the full dress uniform, and all the orders worn by the deceased, was laid on an open bier, the face exposed, and was accompanied to the grave by nearly the entire population of Athens, including the garrison, the government officers, and the representatives of foreign powers, except the French minister. In estimating the public character of Colocotroni it must be owned that his violent passions, which occasionally led to acts of cruelty, rendered him rather a scourge than a benefit to his country; although there can be little doubt that his indomitable courage, great tact, and knowledge of the predatory kind of warfare suitable to the Greeks, joined with the renown of his name, and his close relationship to some of the chief families of the Morea, were mainly instrumental in preventing the Turks from putting down the revolution at its outbreak. The accompanying engraving (from a sketch brought to England by a gentleman just arrived from Athens) presents so faithful a likeness of Colocotroni that it will at once be recognised by any person who has visited Greece during the last twenty years.

NOTTINGHAM ELECTION—VIEW OF THE CASTLE.

The nomination took place on Wednesday morning in the Exchange Hall. At ten o'clock the respective candidates, Thomas Gisborne, Esq., and J. Walter, jun., Esq., entered the room, accompanied by bodies of friends, and immediately after it was most densely crowded. The usual formalities having been gone through, the Right Hon. Lord Ranclife appeared upon the hustings, and proceed to nominate his friend Thomas Gisborne, Esq., as a fit and proper person to represent the town in Parliament. He appeared before them, as he did in 1812, the zealous advocate of universal suffrage, annual parliaments, and vote by ballot; in fact, said his lordship, a decided Chartist. He also advocated the principles of free trade, and was glad that the hon. gentleman he had the honour to nominate entertained the same political sentiments, and was not (pointing to Mr. Walter, sen.) a political weathercock.—S. Bean, Esq. (President of the Complete Suffrage Association), briefly seconded the nomination.—T. B. Charlton, Esq., then rose to propose a candidate, who (he said) was every way worthy of the electors' approval: he meant John Walter, jun., Esq. Mr. Charlton endeavoured to make himself heard, but none but those immediately around him could hear what he said.—Mr. J. Parker seconded the nomination.—Mr. J. Sweet, seconded by Mr. Roberts, then nominated F. O'Connor, Esq.—Mr. F. Melville rose, and, being seconded by Mr. C. Wilcockson, nominated John Tyas, Esq.—Mr. Gisborne and Mr. Walter, jun., then severally addressed the electors, as did also Mr. O'Connor and Mr. Tyas.—Mr. Gisborne, in reply to a question by Mr. O'Connor, said he would vote for the People's Charter.—Mr. O'Connor and Mr. Tyas having withdrawn their names as candidates, a show of hands was taken, which was declared to be in favour of Mr. Gisborne. A poll was then demanded, and the proceedings terminated.—Close of the poll: Gisborne (Lib.), 1850; Walter (Con.), 1733; Majority, 117.

SPIRITS' SONG OF INVITATION.

FROM A MS. FAERY MASQUE.

CHORUS.

Hither! come hither, with us to dwell
In sylvan solitude:
Never—oh! never within our cell
Does grief or care intrude!
Never! never!

FIRST SPIRIT.

Mine is the task to find the flow'rs
That sweetest and rarest be;
I'll wander to even the star-lit bow'rs,
To snatch a bright wreath for thee!
Chorus—Hither! come hither, &c.

SECOND SPIRIT.

I know the haunts the wild-birds love,
I'll borrow their melody—
Their songs and the hum of the noontide grove
Shall mingle in sweets for thee!
Chorus—Hither! come hither, &c.

THIRD SPIRIT.

When the heat of the day-beam
Burns around,
The zephyrs obey my call—
Or e'en if they sleep,
I can cool the ground
With the mists of the waterfall!
Chorus—Hither! come hither, &c.—W.

PORTRAIT OF MR. TYLER, THE AMERICAN PRESIDENT.

In our leading article we have adverted to this statesman's last message to Congress, and embodied the leading points of that important document, which has occupied so much of public attention and remark. The excitement raised, with reference to its spirit and tendency, has created a sort of fictitious and momentary interest in the man who framed it, which, as far as our own readers are concerned, we may pictorially gratify with the illustration of a portrait.

NEW ZEALAND.

To Englishmen there can scarcely be said to exist a more interesting region upon the restless waters than the Australasian group of islands known as New Zealand. They are nearest to the antipodes of Great Britain; they are also the nearest westward to Van Diemen's Land and Australia; eastward to Chili, in South America; and northward to the Friendly Islands and the adjacent clusters of islands forming the great Polynesian Archipelago; whilst their southward boundary is the unexplored waters of the Southern Ocean.

In its detached position from the nearest continent, New Zealand resembles the British Isles, as well as in other respects of greater importance. Like them, surrounded by the sea, it possesses the same means of ready communication and rapid conveyance to all parts of its coast; and the same facilities for an extensive trade within its numerous bays and rivers. The temperature of the warmer latitude in which it is placed is influenced, or regulated, as in Great Britain, by the invigorating sea-breezes; and the whole line of coast abounds with fish. In addition to these natural advantages, the numerous harbours of New Zealand afford a safe and central rendezvous to the immense shipping trade of the whole southern Archipelago.

New Zealand consists of two large islands and a small one, each separated by a narrow strait, besides innumerable surrounding islets that rise out of the bays which frequently indent the coast. The group extends in length, north to south, from the 34th to the 48th degree of south latitude; and in breadth, east to west, from the 166th to the 179th degree of east longitude. The extreme length exceeds 800 miles, and the average breadth is about 100 miles. The native names of these islands not being very well adapted for European pronunciation, "North Island" has been substituted for "Eaheinomaure," and "South," or "Victoria Island," for Tavai—"Poenammoo." The smallest tract is called "Stewart's Island." Their surface exhibits a world in miniature. The northern island is the smallest, but has the finest soil and boldest features. Chains of mountains run through North and South Islands, and in the former rise from 12,000 to 14,000 feet, and are buried for two thirds of their height in perpetual snow; and their drainage, falling in foaming cataracts, is received into numerous rivers that water in their course the most fertile and enchanting valleys, alternating with vast tablelands and plains. In their forests they have trees that rival the tallest pines of Norway, and often rise from 85 to 95 feet high without a branch, and sometimes 12 feet in diameter; whilst others rise 140 feet. North Island contains volcanoes, extinct and active. Coal and lime have been found in abundance, as well as iron equal to that of Biscay—the richest iron known; and mica indicates the proximity of gold. Besides the stupendous timber-trees already mentioned, there are others of inferior growth. The myrtle is abundant, as well as a tree whose stem only produces leaves, used as a substitute for tea. Indigenous to the country are wild celery, wild parsley, and flax; luxuriant grasses and ferns; and the natives cultivate potatoes, turnips, cabbages, a species of yam, and a few fruits. Of animals, the rat has been seen, but no snakes: horses, cattle, asses, the dog and pig have been introduced; the latter being more completely domesticated in New Zealand than in any other country. The birds are mostly small, as the parrot, pigeons, cuckoos, the kingfisher, mocking-bird, &c. European poultry have been successfully introduced. Fish abound in all the rivers; insects swarm in swampy situations.

Thus, New Zealand is, altogether, a favoured country. "The huge glaciers and plains of snow which cover the higher regions, the mighty torrents which pour down from them, forming stupendous cataracts; the lofty woods which crown their middle regions; the hills which wind along their feet, decked with the brightest vegetation; the bold cliffs and promontories which breast the might of their southern waves; the beautiful bays, decked with numberless villages and canoes—all conspire to present a scene which even the rude eye of the navigator cannot behold without rapture."

PROVISION HOUSE.

The natives are of a different race from those of New Holland, belonging rather to that Malay race which predominates in the South Sea islands. They are tall and well formed, many of the upper classes being above six feet high: they have large black eyes, and generally straight hair; but that of some of the females is curly: they mostly tattoo their skins. It is remarked by an intelligent author as a disadvantage in New Zealand that there is no king over the whole group, nor even over one of the larger islands. The people are governed by a number of chieftains, each, indeed, a sovereign over his own narrow territory. A desire to enlarge their remains, increase their power, or gratify revenge, leads to frequent wars, strengthens jealousy, keeps them from forming any common bond of union, and precludes the adoption of a general or consistent plan for spreading among them the benefits of civilization. Annexed is a portrait of Epemi, a chief of Port Nicholson, in North Island: he is tattooed, wears the native robe, and carries a long spear; but most of the chiefs are familiar with the musket, and their strength is counted not by men but by muskets. When equipped for war they remind us of Sharon Turner's remark made a few years since:—"it is probable that the present state and people of New Zealand exhibit more nearly than any other the condition of Britain when the Romans entered it nearly eighteen centuries since."

The native huts were formerly composed of rushes wattled, thatched with strong-bladed grass and lined with palm-leaves. Near the settlements the sides are now of weather-board; they are rarely above 5 feet in height, it being considered unlucky to have anything suspended above the head; but they frequently reach 16 feet in length, with a portico or verandah at one end. The gables are ornamented with grotesque carving, usually painted red. The only opening is square, closed by a sliding panel. Furniture they have none: a few rushes for a bed, a calabash for water, a small box or basket for ornaments, a cooking pot, and hatchet are their only domestic utensils. In fine weather, however, the New Zealander rarely either cooks, eats, or sleeps in his house, but under a low shed in the open air. The cut in the margin represents a taboo store, or provision-house, at Otumatua Pah, Cape Egmont, North Island. Meat stores are attached to most huts, and in large villages are of greater size, and much more elaborately carved and ornamented than the dwellings. They are tabooed, or rendered sacred, by a kind of incantation muttered over them by a priest or sage.

In our next paper we shall glance at the progress of colonization in New Zealand, and illustrate one or two of its best sites. The inquiry, always one of extreme attraction, will, doubtless, receive an accession of interest from the proposed adoption of a Government system of colonization, in a memorial to Sir Robert Peel, signed by the most influential men of all parties in the city of London.

ENGLAND AND FRANCE;

OR

THE SISTERS.

A ROMANCE OF REAL LIFE.

By HENRY COCKTON,

AUTHOR OF "VALENTINE VOX," "STANLEY THORN," ETC.

CHAPTER V

THE WEDDING DAY

To experienced persons it will be altogether unnecessary to say, that the pleasurable anticipations mingled with apprehensions which set tranquil sleep at defiance, form the chief characteristic of the night which immediately precedes the marriage, while to those who have had no experience in the matter, it will be amply sufficient to observe that Caroline, Lucrece, Sir Arthur, and Charles were throughout the night exceedingly restless.

The world has often heard of persons having been somewhat too late at the church on these interesting occasions, and the want of punctuality then is really unpardonable in the extreme; but the world probably never heard of any one whose serious intention it was to be married, having absolutely slept beyond the time. Certainly Caroline and Lucrece were not exceptions in that respect, nor were Sir Arthur and Charles; for they all rose particularly early on that auspicious morning; and so did Greville, by virtue of the unexampled thundering which Frederick made at the door of his chamber, precisely as he was dropping, in the most comfortable manner possible, into his usual second sleep. Of this, however, he could not approve, but when he eventually did make his appearance, the party sat down to breakfast with countenances beaming with quite as much joy as could on such an occasion have been reasonably expected.

To ladies, the marriage morning is seldom one of unmixed happiness, at least their happiness seldom appears to be pure—they look thoughtful, anxious, nay even mysterious—in a word they are placed in a novel position, and don't know at all what to make of it. True it is that Caroline occasionally smiled at the well pointed jests of Sir Arthur, while Lucrece looked at Charles with an expression indicative of confidence being united with hope; but they were not joyous: they were not gay: anxiety seemed to be struggling with gladness, which struggle created a wish to be calm.

At ten precisely the bridesmaids arrived, and having been duly presented to the bridegroom, gaily withdrew with the brides. They had scarcely, however, retired from the room, when a carriage and four drove up to the gate, and the next moment Lady Grange alighted.

"Why, Greville!" exclaimed Sir Arthur, "here is your sister!"

"Why, at what time could she have left town?" said Greville. "Well! things must take their course. I suppose I'm to go and receive her. She surely cannot have been in bed at all!"

THE SISTERS.

And this was a highly correct conjecture, for on her return from a ball about five, a letter was placed in her hands, which informed her that the marriage was to take place that morning, and which coupled with other information she had received, induced her to start off at once.

"My business is with Sir Arthur," said her ladyship haughtily, on entering the house.

"I'll tell him so," said Greville, opening the door of the front parlour. "You wish to see him alone?"

"Alone. And tell him, moreover, that the business is of importance, and may affect him deeply."

Greville delivered this message to Sir Arthur, who naturally wondering what it could be, proceeded at once to the room.

"Sir Arthur," said her ladyship, with appropriate solemnity, "although you deeply wounded my feelings the last time we met, I have far too high and too sincere a respect for you not to feel affected by any loss you may sustain, or to use every exertion in my power, with the view of averting any calamity with which you may be threatened."

"I of course feel flattered, Lady Grange; but what has happened?"

"I heard of it only this morning at Lady Rupert's; but conceiving that your immediate presence in town would be of infinite importance, I ordered my carriage and hastened down here with the intelligence, burying in oblivion all that had occurred."

"I beg to assure you that your politeness is appreciated; but what on earth is it?"

"Bolands, I believe, are your bankers?"

"They are."

"You have, I fear, an immense amount now in their hands?"

"It is rather considerable!—twenty thousand pounds, perhaps, securities and all."

"Of course you have heard nothing about them?"

"I heard that they were tottering: I had a letter to that effect the morning after my arrival here, and did start off to see about it; but I altered my mind."

"Then unless you immediately go up to town, Sir Arthur, all will be lost! They actually stopped payment yesterday."

"Indeed!—that's a sad job—a sad job; but, as they have actually stopped, why my presence in town will be useless."

"Oh, but I understand from parties who are conversant with these things, that it will be of use, of great use; that in fact by doing so at once, the probability is that seen now you'll save all. Therefore enter my carriage, and return with me immed iately ;—I feel convinced that all may yet be saved."

"The parties who indulged that conviction, Lady Grange knew nothing whatever about it. But as allow persons must talk, and when they do, they must, of course, talk nonsense."

"But do you not think, that by going up immediately, something might be done?"

"I assure you, Lady Grange, that I can now do nothing in it, and if even I could, I am far too deeply and too agreeably engaged to day, to attend to anything of the kind. For the interest and the trouble you have taken, I consider myself under a great obligation, believe me, and I hope to have frequent opportunities of proving to you how strongly I feel it; but under existing circumstances nothing shall induce me to cherish any thought of an unpleasant nature, having made up my mind that this day shall be in reality the happiest of my life. And now, Lady Grange, I have a favour to beg of you—a great favour—my, the greatest favour you have the power to confer. You have arrived most opportunely, exactly in time; and you will pardon me for observing that you look as if dressed for the occasion. Now for heaven's sake be so schint, and which for Caroline's sake I would on my knees beg of you to grant, is, that you will banish from your mind whatever angry feelings her opposition to your will may have indulged, and in the spirit of forgiveness, generosity, and affection, accompany us forthwith to church."

"To church! Then am I to understand that you are really about to be married to that creature?"

"Lady Grange! I believe that I have said before, that I do not regard her as a child; but if even I did, she will be within an hour my wife."

"It is—am it be possible!" Sir Arthur?" You just now spoke of generosity—yes, generosity was the word; how strangely opposed are our precepts and practice! be you generous!—give her to me man whom she loves!"

"And you," enquired Sir Arthur, with the most provoking calmness, "whom may you imagine him to be?"

"What, can you have been so blinded by your passion for this child; is it possible that this paroxysm—for it is nothing more—can have veiled your eyes with a film so thick, that you have not been able to perceive that she really loves Charles!"

"Oh, Charles:—He is the man! Lady Grange, did Charles ever propose for Lucrece?"

"Why, certainly," replied her ladyship, somewhat confused by the question, "he did once, in sport."

"Oh, only in sport'—and you in sport virtually forbade him the house."

"But his affections were transferred to Caroline!"

"No, Lady Grange, they were not transferred; he still loves Lucrece, and will have her. But let us not dwell upon this, come, let me entreat you to grant me this favour!"

"Never!"

"Is it impossible for me to prevail upon you?"

"It is!—never will I countenance anything so monstrous."

"I am to understand this to be your final answer? You are firmly resolved not to go?"

"I am. firmly!"

"Then," said Sir Arthur, rising, "I must take my leave." And, bowing profoundly, he quitted the room.

Her ladyship then rung the bell, and when the servant appeared, sent up for Lucrece.

"Oh, if I could but have got him into the carriage," she exclaimed, pacing the room and biting her lips, "all would have been well; all should have been well;—my plans could not have failed. But it is all over—all's settled now. Still I'll away them, if I can do nothing more!—Lucrese, my love," she added as the poor girl, trembkingly entered. "My dear child!—my good girl!—I perceive that you are excited, and I cannot wonder at it. This is no place for you, dear! Really, such horrible doings are sufficient to turn one's brain. But compose yourself; there, be sure that I will not desert you! You are all to me now, Lucrese, all; I have no one else now on whom to place my affections; they are my love, centred in you. But come, dear, let us together leave this scene of wickedness, of unhallowed passion; let us leave at once; my carriage is at the gate, say, you are ready; let us prove to them how disgusting we hold their proceedings to be."

"Dear aunt," said Lucrece, "but I cannot go."

"I perceive. You have promised your sister—I cannot speak of her with patience, for she is utterly unworthy of the name—you have promised to attend her, but under the afflicting circumstances, ought such a promise to be fulfilled?"

"I have given no such promise," replied Lucrece.

"You have not! Come to my arms! I love you more dearly than ever. Of course you could not as a virtuous person be prevailed on to a marriage so hateful. Let us therefore leave the place dear, and show them——"

"My dear aunt, I cannot leave."

"Cannot leave! Why not? You will not attend her?"

"Still I cannot leave. I perceive you are not yet aware of the reason, and therefore, I'll explain: I go to church it is true, not as I have said to attend Caroline; but like her I go to receive my bridal."

"Oh! horrible! horrible! Is it a dream?—Am I awake? A bride! What the bride of Charles Cleveland? It cannot be. It must not be!—it shall not be!" Whereupon she rushed to the door, and locked it. "You know, my Lucrece," she continued, "you know that I will not suffer you to be sacrificed; you know that I love you too fondly to see you entrapped without a desperate struggle. But let me prevail upon you to leave this place: let me conjure you!"

Lucrece, who possessed not the spirit of her sister, sank upon the sofa, and wept.

The carriages now drew up to the gate, and the cry throughout the house was "Lucrece!" until the servant by whom Lady Grange had sent up her summons informed Greville and Charles that she was still in the parlour. To the parlour they went accordingly and knocked: no answer was returned. They tried to open the door: it was fast. They knocked again: still no answer.

"Lucrece, dear Charles," my dear Lucrece! open the door."

"I cannot, dear Charles, replied Lucrece.

Charles heard the voice, although indistinctly. "Mr. Greville," said he, "am I to break this door open?"

"Oh," replied Greville, "I've nothing to do with it: things must take their course."

In an instant Charles burst open the door, when Lucrece as once flew to him, and fell upon his neck. (See illustration.)

"Why what is the meaning of this?" demanded Charles. "Lady Grange, I call upon you for an explanation."

Her ladyship looked at him fiercely for a moment, and then turned with an expression of contempt

"That mild, gentle creature, Lady Grange," continued Charles, "you imagine you can tyrannise over and trample upon: but you are deceived. My poor girl," he added, addressing Lucrece, "do not tremble, my love: do not tremble: you are safe"

"I feel that I am, dear Charles," said Lucrece, clinging still more closely to him, "I am not alarmed.

"She shall not be entrapped:' cried Lady Grange fiercely, "she shall not be. I will protect her."

"She needs no other protection than mine," said Charles; and as he spoke, Lady Grange seized the arm of Lucrece, and attempted to force her away.

"What is this? what is this?" cried Sir Arthur, who at this moment rushed into the room. "Lady Grange," he added firmly, "I know your object well: it is to mar our happiness, but it shall fail. Do me the favour to step this way."

"You're not, she exclaimed, on finding her arms held. "How dare you lay a finger upon me?"

"Sit there, madam, there," cried Sir Arthur, having led her to a chair, in which he held her. "Charles, see the ladies into their carriages. Greville, do me the favour to accompany Charles."

"If you dare!" cried Lady Grange, as Greville with an obedient shrug was about to follow Charles. "If you dare! Alexander Alexander. Alexander!" Here her rage having exhausted her strength, her head fell back, and she fainted.

The servants were immediately summoned, and Lucrece who flew back on the run, superintended the application of restoratives, and wept over her aunt, and kissed her, and used the most endearing expressions with the view of bringing her back to a state of consciousness, but some time elapsed before reason returned, and when it had returned, Lucrece was unwilling to leave her: she was, however, eventually prevailed upon to suffer herself to be led to the carriage by Charles, and when Greville had placed his self also in the carriage of her own and desired his servants to pay her every attention, he and Sir Arthur joined the party and proceeded to church.

That Lady Grange had succeeded in annoying them was now, of course, abundantly manifest, but a scale could be forced by any one of the party, while the publication Lucrece looked wretched.

She should not have detained us," said Caroline, who was in the same carriage, "she would not have dared even to attempt it."

"I would also, for her ladyship was one of those am. He persons who, knowing no restraint themselves can tyrannise with safety, seldom fail to convert that knowledge into power

On their arrival at the church, they were received with great courtesy by the minister, and while the preparations were being made, Sir Arthur and Greville endeavored to raise the spirits of Lucrece. In this he partially succeeded; but, it having been decided that he and Caroline should have the precedence, while they were at the altar, Charles still remained with Lucrece, the vestry, effectually restored her cheerfulness by reverting in a joyous strain to the manner in which the consummation of their happiness had been end ured.

No intimation had occurred to the bride; and when the sisters had affectionately kissed each other, Lucrece and Charles, attended by Greville and the bridesmaids, quietly repaired to the altar.

During the ceremony there was so much firmness and fervour perceptible, that it was evident to all present that this was in reality an union of hearts The marriage they had just before witnessed had inspired them with feelings of an opposite character—not that there had been any lack of affection displayed—the display on the contrary had been greater—but solely because they gave the contracting parties no credit for sincerity or purpose or purity of motive. And really the unfavourable notice of such marriages of this description as we have remarkable—people will not believe that they spring from pure love; and this specious incredulity is confirmed by the young brides themselves, who will look embarrassed, who will seem painfully apprehensive of what may be thought or said, and who, in a word, will make it appear that they are not exactly proud of those to whom they are being united. On the occasion in question, this might not have been quite so strikingly apparent, had not the marriage of Charles and Lucrece so immediately succeeded, but as it was, the ladies especially, did not fail to draw rather unfavorable conclusions.

The ceremony ended, they returned to the vestry, when the necessary signatures were attached to the register, and Caroline had the felicity of being for the first time addressed as Lady Cleveland. They then took leave of the minister, by whom they were accompanied to the door, and left the church; and as they re-entered their carriages, the bells struck up a merry peal which had upon all an electric effect.

On approaching the hall, their thoughts, of course, reverted to Lady Grange, but as they found on their arrival that her Ladyship had left, they became quite gay. They did not however remain long here; having partaken of some refreshment while the horses were being harnessed to the carriages, the whole party started, as per arrangement, for Ashburn Lodge, the country residence of Sir Arthur, where, after a most superb dinner, they passed the evening together as happily as can be under the circumstances conceived.

THE REVENUE.

The quarterly revenue returns, made up to Wednesday last, have been published.

On the year ending April 5, 1843, as compared with that ending April 5, 1842, there is a total increase of income to the amount of £714,982 -the total income last year being £45,358,527, and for this year £46,078,810.

The quarter ending on Wednesday, as compared with the corresponding quarter of last year, shows an increase of £1,748,945—or from £8,720,539 to £10,469,477.

On the quarter ending on Wednesday, compared with that which closed on the 5th of January last, there is a decrease from £11,486,107 to £10,469,477. But it is right to notice that, on various accounts, the April quarter is usually less productive than that which closes in January.

The increase in the gross returns is owing to the large sum of two millions and a half produced by the income-tax, for in Customs and Excise, the two great items that mark the popular capabilities of purchase and consumption, we regret to observe a marked falling off.

On the year there is an increase—

From Income-tax, of	£2,436,988
Post-office	103,000
Miscellaneous	425,969
Imprest and other monies	354,913
Repayments of Advances	65,514
	£3,205,784

There is a decrease—

Stamps	146 790
Taxes	146,093
Crown Lands	62,500
	£2,490,801
Increase	£714,983

On the quarter, as compared with the corresponding quarter last year, there is an increase—

From Income-tax, of	£1,885,232

Miscellaneous	218,953
	£2,105,595

And a decrease—

THE MARKETS.

CORN EXCHANGE.—The arrivals of wheat of home produce up to Mark-lane having been very scanty during the present week, and the attendance of buyers on each market day on the increase, the demand for that article has ruled firm as, in most instances, an advance of 1s per quarter for both red and white samples, whue good clearances have been effected. In fine foreign wheat a large amount of business has been transacted, but no improvement has taken place in the currencies. The barley trade has ruled steady at late rates, but in malt very little has been passing. Oats have been in short supply and steadily demand, at a trifling rise in prices say about 6d per quarter. Beans, peas, and flour have gone off slowly at late quotations.

ARRIVALS. English: wheat, 1930, barley, 2730; oats, 2180; and malt, 3010 quarters; flour, 5910 sacks. Irish: oats, 10,660 quarters.

English.—Wheat, Essex and Kent, red, 42s to 48s; ditto white, 47s to 54s; Norfolk and Suffolk, red, 42s to 47s; ditto, white, 45s to 53s; rye, 34s to 36s; grinding barley, 27s to 29s; malting ditto, 30s to 32s; Chevalier, 32s to 34s; Suffolk and Norfolk malt, 46s to 50s; brown ditto, 40s to 44s; Kingston and Ware, 50s to 62s; Chevauer, 58s; Yorkshire and Lincolnshire feed oats, 17s to 21s; potato ditto, 19s to 23s; Youghal and Cork, black, 17s to 18s; ditto white, 19s to 22s; tick beans, new, 34s to 36s; ditto, old, 34s to 35s, grey peas, 36s to 38s; maple, 33s to 34s; white, 30s to 32s; boilers, 32s to 37s per quarter. Town-made flour, 45s to 48s; Suffolk, 38s to 40s, Stockton and Yorkshire, 36s to 38s per 280 lbs. Foreign. Free wheat, 50s to 58s. In Bond.—Barley, 23s; oats, new, 18s to 19s; ditto feed, 14s to 15s; beans, 30s to 32s, peas, 32s to 37s per quarter. Flour, America, 22s to 24s; Baltic, 22s per barrel.

The Seed Market.—There has been rather more business doing in clover seed this week at full prices; but in all other kinds of seeds next to nothing has been transacted.

The following are the present rates:—Linseed, English, sowing, 46s to 57; Baltic, crushing, 42s to 44s; Mediterranean and Odessa, 38s 6d; bamped, 34s to 40s per quarter, coriander, 10s to 18s per cwt; brown mustard seed, 10s to 11s, white ditto, 10s to 10s 6d. tares, 3s to 3s 3d per bushel; English rapeseed, new, £23 to £25 per last of ten quarters. Linseed cakes, English, £10 to £10 10s; ditto foreign, £7 to £7 10s per 1000; rapeseed cakes, £5 5 to £5 per ton

Bread.—The prices of wheaten bread are from 7d to 7½d; of household ditto, 5d to 6½d for the 4lb. loaf.

Imperial Weekly Average.—Wheat, 46s 2d; barley, 28s 6d; oats, 17s 4d; rye, 29s 6d; beans, 28s 9d; peas, 28s 5d.

Imperial Average of Six Weeks which govern Duty.—Wheat, 47s 7d; barley, 27s 10d; oats, 17s 3d; rye, 28s 6d., beans, 26s 6d., peas, 25s 6d per quarter.

Corn.—The market is quiet, but little variation can be quoted in prices: the low and ordinary sorts may, perhaps, be obtained on rather easier terms.

Tallow.—The market is flat, and it is now difficult to get more than 42s 9d for fine Y.C. on the spot; for arrival 42s 3d is the nearest price for the last three months' delivery.

Provisions.—We have little doing in any kind of butter, and prices are still nominal. Bacon is a mere drag, and the same observation may be applied to other kinds of provisions.

Coals.—West Wylam, 15s 6d, Hilda, 17s; Wharncliffe, 18s 3d., Lambton, 19s 6d; Stewart's, 20s 6d, Whitwell, 18s 6d; Caradoc, 21s 6d., Killoe, 20s 3d per ton. Ships arrived, 92.

Wool.—The arrivals of wool this week have been only about 600 packages. By private contract very little is doing, at barely late rates.

Hops.—Good colours are selling steadily; other kinds slowly, at prices varying from £3 to £5 per cwt., the latter figure being for Farnhams

Potatoes.—In consequence of the fineness of the weather, and the large supplies of green vegetables, the sale of potatoes is in a sluggish state, at from 4s to 7s per ton.

Oils.—This market is flat, but we have no alteration to notice in prices.

Smithfield.—We have had a very steady demand for most kinds of stock, and prices have an upward tendency. Beef, from 3s to 4s 2d; mutton, 3s to 4s 2d; lamb, 4s to 6s; veal, 4s to 5s; and pork, 3s to 4s per 8 lb., to the utter detriment of slaughtered meat for our markets, the general quality is firm, as the following quotations:- Beef, from 2s 8d to 3s 6d; mutton, 2s 10d to 3s 8d.; lamb, 4s to 6s 4d.; veal, 3s 10d to 4s 10d.; and pork, 2s 2d to 4s per 8 lb., by the carcass. ROBERT HERSKEY.

COMMERCE AND MONEY.

On the English Stock Exchange the improved state of the revenue from last quarter has naturally created greater confidence among the dealers in British public securities, and caused a further advance in their value. The funds are somewhat above 87 for money, and they have been sold as high as 87¼ for time. The premium on Exchequer bills has also risen to from 65 to 74, for no better employment can at present be obtained for the vast abundance of capital now seeking channels of investment, in the Money Market. The 3½ per cent. stock is nearly a fixture, in as far as price is concerned, under these circumstances; for the quarion now gains ground daily, that the Chancellor of the Exchequer will save an annual saving of eight hundred thousand pounds by the reduction of the interest now paid on them to three per cent. In the shares of public companies the abundance of unemployed money is producing favourable consequences, and causing higher prices to be obtained for those of undoubted character. In the Brighton shares the increase in the course of the week is about one pound, and even in those of the greatly depressed lines of Greenwich and Blackwall premiums are now made at rather higher prices. The nearest value of the London and Birmingham is £215, and £96 is the value of the Great Western. The South Western also are improving in value, but not so decidedly as to enable us to quote any advance since the last week.

On the Foreign Stock Exchange no great animation has been exhibited during the week, and the transactions have not been of much importance. Spanish Bonds continue to attract the attention of speculators, and the Three per Cents. have ruled at from 35¾ to 36¾ even on the last publication. The hopes now entertained of the ratification of commercial treaties between the two nations of the Peninsula and the United Kingdom form the foundation of these operations, for it is perfectly understood that the revenues of these two kingdoms must soon be very materially increased by a reduction of the existing import duties on British manufactured goods. Some business has also been done in Colombian and Mexican Bonds, the former at full prices, and the latter at a decline.

DOUGLAS JERROLD'S MAGAZINE

Were we single [illegible] new work, this advertisement would contain no syllable beyond the announcement [illegible], that) On the First of May will be published, price Sixpence, No. 1, of ILLUMINATED MAGAZINE.

EDITED BY DOUGLAS JERROLD.

Yes; we would content ourselves with the above laconic sentence, in the bigoted belief that an unique and radiant painting of the whole human countenance, in harmonious colours, future readers ever yet—so wayward is the human heart!—secured a reader past the expermenting Number One.

A prospectus may be likened to the mile-stone of kings and queens exchanged preliminary to marriage. It may present a fascinating picture of the future bridegroom, and so bring the parties together, but, once brought, their after good-liking must depend upon themselves. It is promising, however, that the similar does not be a throughout; inasmuch as the reader is only wedded to a book surely in an evil calls for startlable remedy; in that so long as the said book shall content him. Thus, we shall endeavour to portray the features of our future [illegible] with [illegible] accuracy that may be painted in this miniature advertisement, their welcome must entirely depend upon their own flesh and blood, and the best aspect that shall manage them.

And first, "to make our Life good." It has been said—"Ha! The Illuminated Magazine of course, 'twill be a [illegible] manuscript, illuminated, and painted figures!" No, it will not. Figures and objects are of value in their place, but, as illustrative of the text in its every variety of essay—narrative—history—of social right and wrong—of the tragedy of real life, as of its folly, its whim, its mere humorousness. There [illegible] to the word in its original, and not in its conventional, sense—though sometimes, we do be placed and steadily, and [illegible] literature may, it is hoped, reveal new graces by the pure light of art.

We have already almost noticed the literary contents of the work. Pens stained with honourable ink—nibs that have already "made the grave harmonious"—are employed for us. FINE ARTS.

CURTIUS.

Haydon's "Curtius." British Institution.
Landseer's "Lassie herding Sheep;" engraved by John Burnet, and published by Messrs. Henry Graves and Co., 6, Pall-mall.

Painters have not kept pace with poets in their delineations of animated nature. The passions of the "human face divine" have occupied the minds of artists to the exclusion of those powerful traits of feeling which the physiognomy of the brute beast, and his expressive actions, afford. The war-horse of Job, "pawing in valley, rejoicing in his strength, mocking at fear, and neighing in unison with the trumpet's charge," is a subject of the grandest description; but yet it has stood untouched for more than three thousand years. Virgil's description of the horse is delivered in a kindred spirit.—

> ——— At the clash of arms, his ear afar
> Drinks the deep sound, and vibrates to the war.
> Flames from each nostril roll in scattered state,
> His quivering limbs with restless motion fleet,
> O'er his right shoulder, floating fair and free,
> Sweeps his thick mane, and spreads his pomp of hair:
> Swift works his double sphere; and ear around
> Rings to the solid hoof that wears the ground.

But no painter that we recollect has ever caught a ray of its inspiration, or even honoured it with the small favour of a passing study.

A "VAGROM" RAM.

The ancient sculptors were, however, of another mind, and expended some of their noblest efforts on their illustration. The lions and sphynxes of Egypt, the horses of the Parthenon, the dogs and bears of Rome, rank with the highest productions of artistic genius. In later days Rubens made a noble effort to divert the labours of the pencil from their monotony. The mighty Flemish horse who bore the kings, the nobles, and the soldiers of his day; the lions and panthers of his Antwerp menagerie, and the stately bear-hunts of his royal patrons, have been delineated by him in every possible attitude, and treated with the highest historic power. Vandyke laboured successfully in the same field. In his equestrian portraits the horse possesses as much individuality as his master, and forms quite as important a member of the picture. His drawings of horses are even still more remarkable. Stubbs, after the lapse of one hundred and fifty years, was the next labourer in the field; but his pictures have little historic merit, and are often positively vulgar. To him succeeded Morland, and the generation of modern painters, who, with few exceptions, have confined themselves to pet likenesses of favourite domestic animals, to the total disregard of the poetic capabilities of their subjects.

It was, therefore, with much pleasure we made acquaintance with Mr. Haydon's picture of "Curtius leaping into the Gulf," No. 384 of the present exhibition of the British Institution. In this noble painting, which is of the life size, we have a portrait of a horse, which, in our estimation, takes its immortal place with those written portraits of antiquity which we have just quoted. Job fills and elevates the mind with images of grace and grandeur, but Haydon grasps and appals it by suggestions of both moral and physical sublimity. The horse has leaped into the chasm, and, as he sinks in its unfathomable depths, stretches forth his neck, and with his straining eyeballs makes a vain attempt to sound its thickening shades. The idea of a bottomless pit is realized; and the terror of the horse becomes in some degree shared by the spectator. The bold and novel conception of this picture unfits the judgment for a sudden estimate of its truth, and the first impression is that the drawing is exaggerated, and this opinion is still further heightened by its manifest abridgments of colour and chiaroscuro. Upon a more mature consideration, however, the drawing is discovered to be as perfect as the general conception is grand and appropriate. Colour and the graces of the art have evidently been regarded by the painter as secondary qualifications, and have been used only so far as seemed to be necessary to suggest the simple idea of that helpless terror by which every nerve and muscle of the gallant charger is convulsed. The composure of the rider in his willing self-sacrifice—a propitiation of the wrath of the gods—gives a solemn contrast and high moral value to the otherwise frightful character of the scene.

We hope to see more of these single-incident pictures from this accomplished painter. We consider them to be far superior to his larger compositions, which, however excellent they may be in parts, are generally so overloaded with prodigalities of academic drawing and unchastened exuberancies of fancy, that little more than the intention of the story is manifest. Dentatus Eucles and Curtius are, in our estimation, the works by which his great historic powers will be remembered.

The remarks we have made on Mr. Haydon's picture will partially serve as an introduction to Mr. Landseer's "Lassie herding sheep." This picture has been engraved by John Burnet in the painter-like style first practised by the brother of the painter, Mr. Thomas Landseer—a mixture of mezzotint and line, by which the rich impasto of the picture is admirably blended with those nice discriminations of texture which the line manner alone conveys. This peculiar style of engraving has, in the print before us, been carried by Mr. Burnet to a pitch of extraordinary perfection: the excellences of both modes have been preserved, with many intermediate ones resulting from their combination. The picture is perfectly translated, and no more perfect copy could be desired.

The print represents a tight Highland lassie pursuing the aboriginal occupation of spinning wool from a distaff, and at the same time tending a few "black-faced Scots" from whose forefathers the fleece may be supposed to have been derived. One of the little flock, a "vagrom" ram, tethered to propriety by his horns, struggles against confinement with a resolution which in an animal less proverbial for its meekness would look very like obstinate disobedience. A dog at the girl's feet raises his head at the stir, looks in apparent contempt beyond the offender's locality, and, happy in the conscious power of being able to suppress any serious breach of the peace, should his interference be necessary, is evidently preparing to close his eyes and resume his dozing slumbers. A wonderful air of contented quietude is given by this circumstance to the solitude of the mountain valley. The effect of the whole picture is eminently natural: it is a Scottish scene, and a Scottish scene only. No other country can claim kindred with it. The meek laborious girl, small and even elegantly made—a blessing to the land; the lowly cabin, turf-built and heather-clad; the sheep, fleecy-chested, square-backed, and solidly limbed; the massive hills, the flattened vale, the grey atmosphere—all these tell us of North Britain, and of a painter who is emphatically the painter of what he finds before him. We remember his talented father, "old John Landseer," telling us that when "Edwin" was a boy, he never permitted him to copy drawings, but took him on every leisure opportunity to the Hampstead fields, to generalize and draw the forms of living nature for himself. In this way it was our painter acquired that freshness, variety, and wonderful handling which have since distinguished his works, and which in so remarkable a manner characterizes the chef-d'œuvre before us.

ROYAL INSTITUTE OF BRITISH ARCHITECTS.—A special meeting of this institute was held on Monday last, at one o'clock, to present the medals awarded during the session, when his Royal Highness Prince Albert, patron, took the chair. Mr. Donaldson, foreign secretary, read letters from Henri de Lassaix, Signor Canina, Signor Alberto'li, and M. Debret, acknowledging some very handsome donations of books, &c. Mr. Cooper, honorary secretary, having read Bacon's description of a princely palace, Mr. Arthur Johnson was presented to the Prince as the author of the best design founded on that description, and received the Sonne medallion. In like manner his Royal Highness presented to Mr. Edward Chamberlain the medal of the institute, and to Mr. J. W. Papworth the medal of merit, for essays on synchronism, in connexion with architecture. Mr. Bailey announced the subjects for essays and drawings, for which the council proposes to offer medals next year, and then read a communication from Mr. Charles Parker, on the methods employed in constructing foundations in Venice, the soil of which city is of a nature to require the greatest care, and yet where failure is seldom if ever seen. Thanks having been voted to the author of the paper, Mr. Barry addressed the Prince in the name of the institute, and assured his Royal Highness that the remembrance of the day, and of the kind manner in which his Royal Highness had fulfilled its duties, would long remain in the memory of the members. The Prince replied:—"Gentlemen, it gives me great pleasure to have this opportunity of meeting you." The Prince examined the collection of casts and models belonging to the institute, and seemed to enter fully into all the matters which came before him. We cannot regard such a meeting as this was, and so presided over, other than as promising much good to the noble science which it is the province of the institute to advance.

BANK OF ENGLAND.—On Tuesday a special court of the proprietors in this corporation was held at the Bank of England, for the purpose of electing a governor and deputy-governor for the year ensuing, pursuant to the terms of the charter. The ballot commenced at ten o'clock, and continued till four, when the scrutineers, Messrs. Sutton and others, declared William Cotton, Esq., and B. Heath, Esq., to have been duly elected—the first as governor, and the second as deputy-governor for the year ensuing. The usual oaths having been administered, the court adjourned.

THE POLYTECHNIC INSTITUTION.—Dr. RYAN, the chemical lecturer at this establishment, has lately delivered a very interesting lecture on the manufacture of plate glass, in the illustration of which he was assisted by a vast variety of models, an apparatus of peculiar construction, and specimens lent for the occasion by the kindness of the Union Plate Glass Company, at Crabel Nook, near St. Helen's, Lancashire. The lecturer explained the whole process of casting, annealing, grinding, and polishing the plate, and gave a history of the art. He went into some details very important to the public as explanatory of the excise regulations by which the manufacture of plate glass is governed, and threw out some hints for alterations which it might be desirable to make.

THE WEATHER.—Copious showers fell during the greater part of Monday night and the whole of Tuesday; and, as there was little wind and an elevated temperature, they have done immense good to vegetation. We have the fairest promise of a splendid spring. The bud, the leaf, and the blossom have burst forth in all directions, "clothing the earth," as it is said, "with beauty," and showing the goodness of the Creator in a form which strikes home to the senses of the most indifferent beholder.

The Iris de Aragon contains the following account of a series of murders committed at Saragossa on the 23rd ult.:—"A labourer at the farm of Pueyo, near the river Huerva, murdered the five daughters of his master, and wounded the farmer himself as he was entering his house to repose himself after the fatigues of the day. The mother, who was absent when the murder was committed, fainted when she returned and saw the lifeless bodies of her children. The murderer succeeded in making his escape."

SCANDALOUS NUISANCE.—A practice has been much on the increase of late of hawking about the streets the most scandalous intelligence. Sometimes the intelligence is not only false, but also exceedingly mischievous. Yesterday, between four and five o'clock, several fellows went through the Strand, and alarmed the inhabitants by calling out the death of the Duke of Wellington. We learn that in the course of last week the death of his grace was hawked about in various other parts of the metropolis. The practice of hawking about false accounts of the deaths of individuals is most reprehensible, and the miscreants who resort to it ought to be called to account. Surely there are means by which this nuisance may be put a stop to.

THE PASSION WEEK.

We are not, this week, desirous of leading our readers into the theatre of political discussion; we would not seek to disturb the reposeful solemnity of a period when the influences of religion appeal most powerfully to virtuous hearts,—with the distracting tumult of worldly affairs—the busy and contending interests which fill up the measure of toil, and struggle, and ambition in the round of life. As the rulers of the land have thought fit to invest this period with a sacred character—to clothe it in the solemn beauty of religious awe—to close the temples of gaiety from the people, and open to them the prayer-sanctuaries of God—in a word, to set up the sign of the cross, and fill the national mind with one grand observance of Christianity—so would we have the spirit of this sanctity universally partaken, and its holiness unbroken by the storm and battle of political contention, which are evermore sweeping over the heart of the world.

We cannot forget that we are writing on the eve of the "Great Day"—the day of sacrifice and redemption—of agony endured for love—of death sealing salvation—and even from out of its very darkness opening to mankind the Heavenly vista of pardon, blessedness, and peace. Amid the many comforting thoughts, too, which are called up by the bright though melancholy history of the one mighty sacrifice for our eternal good—that of the holy efficacy of Christianity in its world-exercise, is among the fairest and best. Ever since the cross, which symbolised the death of the Saviour, shed radiance over the earth, it has been also the sign of civilisation and the progress of mind. Wherever the great creed flourished it worked out the ends and purposes of human wisdom in rescuing from barbarism, in annihilating slavery, in giving life-springs to truth and justice, in founding codes of laws and right, in protecting, in elevating, in blessing mankind. Charity seems to have nestled in its bosom; benevolence to have been sunned under its smile; humanity to have gathered a reflex from its glory; and brotherhood to have made kindred with its soul. On sea or land, by storm or sunshine, in pestilence or plenty, in far countries or at home, the fair visage of Christianity has blessed all things with its pure and chastened light, and Virtue has become its handmaid, and albeit, with the sweetest graces of humility, has shared its throne. Precisely all those circumstances of mental influence which have most tended to the greatness of nations have been of purely Christian sympathy, of purely Christian growth. Arts—learning—honours for intellectual excellence—rewards for good repute—have all sprung out of the one fertile soil, and attained to an almost religious beauty in their application to the aims and purposes of humanity. Once, in the far days of the ancients, the same influences promoted fame, or vain-glory, or great ambition alone; but since they became Christian, they have worked for the good of mankind, and wrought out an enduring philosophy which has its admiration and approval in the most unsullied fountains of the human heart. Christianity neither uses nor recognises any vice. No, but it has dashed the fetters from the limbs of the African slave, and snatched the Hindoo widow from her burning pile. It has spread the intelligence of virtue to heal the wounds of states, to quench the fires of revolutions, and to stem the blood-torrent of national as of individual crime. Its symbol—the cross—has been every where the sign of joy.

We are commanded to solemnize the remembrance of that "Good Friday" of which the present week involves the sacred anniversary. We abstain from political disputation, from worldly squabble, from every consideration of grievance or redress—but were we to overstep this simple boundary of reserve, and pass to the example of the moment, even a newspaper might dare to draw reflections of advantage from the marvellous lessons it casts forth. At once we see the mightiness of the sacrifice that divinity has made for man—the unselfishness—the humility—the generous abandonment—the unsullied love—the exalting faith, and honour, and virtue, and forgiveness of injury, which should constitute patriotism in the life of empires. Yet where do we find legislators treading, with such fair beacon light to guide them, in the same lovely path? Where do we find followed the example of simple sacrifice for common good? Now when the nation is distressed—when the poor are sorrowful and enduring—let Good Friday remind the rich and powerful that the sign of their own redemption points their duty to their fellow-creatures—and let prayers sow the seeds of blessings for the needy and the worn of heart. Let all join in aspirations for the general relief. The visitations of shipwreck and earthquake, too, have been fearful upon seas and lands. Then let the remembrance of the HIGHEST SACRIFICE teach Charity to spread her wings for the scenes of devastation, and pay back a poor instalment of its humble duty to the Lord.

In all things, in all walks and avocations of life, it would be well if THE DAY of the present week should work its religious influence upon the minds of all ranks of men—if it should spread an atmosphere of humility and engender a tone of grace—and rebuke sin and pride and power—and set up comfort and charity and love. Then, indeed, if this wish could find a public application—should we still more dearly and deeply rejoice in the coming of those Easter holidays in which the dazzling joy of the people finds vent in merriment and feast, and in which they recognise all the happiness their beautiful creed confers—the happiness of knowing that the resurrection of their Saviour has given them wings which it is ever in the power of virtue to spread for heaven!

WHITEHALL CHAPEL.—DISTRIBUTION OF HER MAJESTY'S MAUNDY MONEY.

MAUNDY THURSDAY.

It may be interesting to some few of the readers of the ILLUSTRATED NEWS to hear the origin of the term "Maundy Money" explained; but ere commencing we must be permitted to digress by stating that, in the Roman Catholic Church, it was the custom on the "Dies Mandati" or day of command, being the day preceding Good Friday, now called Maundy Thursday, for the religious to entertain and wash the feet of a number of poor persons (in accordance with the same act performed by our Saviour), after which alms were bestowed upon them of pieces of silver. A relic of that custom we preserve, and surely the most fastidious will not presume to find fault with a usage which is the occasion of much relief to the aged widow and those in need. On the day alluded to a certain number of poor men and women, of each the exact number of the years of our sovereign's age, attend divine service in the Royal Chapel, Whitehall, in the morning and afternoon. Bread, meat, and fish is distributed to them in large wooden bowls, and a procession formed of the Queen's almoner or sub-almoner, with other officers, who are decorated with white scarfs and sashes, and each carrying a bouquet of flowers; one of the officers supports a large gold dish or salver, on which are placed small red and white leather bags; the red containing a sovereign, the white the pieces (as in the engraving) termed Maundy Money. One of each of these bags is given to the persons selected to receive the royal bounty; they have likewise given to them cloth, linen, shoes &c., as well as a small maple cup, out of which previous to the termination of the ceremony they drink the Queen's health. There is something very imposing in this little formula, from the peculiar appearance of the yeomen of the guard in their antiquated costume, being that of the time of Henry VIII.

The Maunday Money is to the amount of a penny to each year of the Sovereign's age; presuming that he twenty four, there would be given to the value of two shillings. This, however, is not all bestowed in pennies, but generally in the following proportion: one fourpence, two threepences, three twopences, and eight pennies, and those pieces are severally impressed with the date of the year in which they are presented; but in the reign of George III. there was no rule as to the dates, and the Maunday Money in many instances was of a period some years anterior to the day of its presentation. These small pieces are, by an order of Government, declared current coins of the realm, therefore no one dare refuse to take them if they are tendered in payment; still they are not in reality intended for that purpose. As a proof of this, the new great recently issued will be found, on examination, to be from the die of the Maunday threepence—that is, the head side; but it has a different reverse, and is thicker, and of course of the weight of the Maunday fourpence. They are struck chiefly as presents for various officers attached to the Crown, as well as to others.

The King of England was formerly accustomed, on Maundy Thursday, to have brought before him as many poor men as he was years old, whose feet he washed with his own hands; after which his Majesty's maunds, consisting of meat, clothes, and money, were distributed amongst them. Queen Elizabeth, when in her 39th year, performed this ceremony at her palace at Greenwich, on which occasion she was attended by thirty-nine ladies and gentlewomen. Thirty-nine poor persons being assembled, their feet were first washed by the yeoman of the laundry with warm water and sweet herbs—afterwards, by the sub-almoner—and, finally, by the Queen herself, kneeling. These various persons—the yeoman, the sub-almoner, and the Queen—after washing each foot, marked it with the sign of the cross above the toes, and then kissed it; clothes, victuals, and money were then distributed. This strange ceremonial, in which the highest was for a moment brought beneath the lowest, was last performed in its full extent by James II., at Whitehall. King William left the washing to his almoner; and such was the arrangement for many years afterwards.

MAUNDY MONEY.

Thursday, April 15, 1731, being Maundy Thursday, there was distributed at the Chapel-royal, Whitehall, to forty-eight poor men, and as many poor women—the King's (George the Second) age being forty-eight—boiled beef, and shoulders of mutton, and small bowls of ale, which was called dinner; after that, large wooden platters of fish and loaves—namely, undressed, one large old ling and one large dried cod, twelve red herrings and twelve white herrings, and four half-quartern loaves—each person had one platter of this provision: after which were distributed to them shoes, stockings, linen and woollen cloth, and leathern bags, with one-penny, twopenny, three-penny, and fourpenny pieces of silver, and shillings—to each about four pounds in value.

His Grace the Lord Archbishop of York, Lord High Almoner, performed the annual ceremony of washing the feet of a certain number of poor in the Chapel-royal, Whitehall, which ceremony is done by the Kings themselves, in imitation of our Saviour's pattern of humility. For a considerable number of years the washing of the feet has been entirely given up, and, since the beginning of the reign of Queen Victoria, an additional sum of money has been given, in lieu of provisions.

In accordance with annual custom, her Majesty's bounty was distributed on Thursday to a number of poor men and women at the Chapel-royal, Whitehall. The Rev. Dr. Hodgson, Dean of Carlisle, officiated for the Archbishop of York, the Queen's Almoner, and was assisted in the ceremony by the Rev. Dr. Scath, Sub dean of the Chapel-royal, and the Rev. Dr. Vivian, of St. Paul's. The chapel was crowded with elegantly-dressed ladies. Sir George Smart presided at the organ, and played a voluntary as the procession entered the chapel, the money being borne by the Yeomen of the Guard. The recipients of the bounty, twenty-six men and twenty-six women, the number being regulated by the age of the Sovereign, were seated in the body of the chapel, and on the conclusion of the first lesson the Dean of Carlisle left the altar, and presented to each woman a small purse containing £1 15s., a pair of thick stockings and shoes, with four yards of broad cloth, was next given to the poor men; after which each pensioner received two leather purses, the one containing several small silver coins, and the other the sum of £2 10s. A Bible was then presented to each, and concluded with a prayer for the Queen. The ceremony was altogether of a very interesting character. On the death of the late King the number of recipients amounted to nearly one hundred and forty. By the liberality of her Majesty, none of these poor individuals have lost their bounty. Although no more than twenty-six of each sex are present in the chapel, the whole of the original pensioners are paid until they drop off by death. Some of the recipients have attained a great age, many are blind, and the whole are persons who have become reduced from a respectable sphere of life. The Right Hon. the Lady Mayoress was among those present.

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

FRANCE, PARIS, April 11, 1843. -(From our own Correspondent.)—The serious illness of M. Cunin Gridaine, the Minister of Commerce, has caused a great sensation amongst the hunters of portfolios, and many are the rumours afloat. The Moderate report that the King has decided on a total change of the Ministry; the Theorists, that M. Duchatel only will retire, that he will be replaced, with the consent of M. Guizot, by the mighty little man himself, the grande cause of Lord Palmerston, the redoubtable M. Thiers. Be assured all this is mere speculation. "I intend [illegible] few months," said [illegible] a few nights since [illegible] and I find that Guizot is really unpopular in the departments I will seriously entertain the question of a change of Ministry; till then," continued his Majesty, "do you occupy yourself in infusing a majority in the Chamber of Deputies."

There has been much movement in the diplomatic world. I am most credibly informed that a great difference of opinion exists between Lord Cowley and M. Guizot, relative to the last note delivered by Russia to the Porte; the Austrian and Prussian ambassadors have declared that their courts are determined on supporting Russia. Could any more convincing proof be required as to advance that France Metternich would have been more satisfied had the interests of Prince Michel been insisted on.

Duprez has been condemned by the Minister of Commerce to play the part of the Dauphin in Halevy's opera of Charles VI. Duprez has many enemies in Paris, and a cabal is getting up against him. Some of our musical journals clearly affirm that he no longer possesses a sufficient power of voice for the grand opera, and that he is compelled to labour to produce the least effect. I lately heard him, and with great pleasure; and you will soon be able to confirm the correctness of my judgment, when I declare that Duprez has as full a body of voice, freshness, and vigour as in the days when he was the idol of a fickle Parisian audience. Our fashionable elite salons are fast becoming the resort of singers from Paris, and our artists for a provincial campaign. Madame Patorbe, the protectoress of most of our young talented artists, gave her last musical soirée on Friday. It is worthy of notice the great patronage given to talent by persons of rank in Paris. It has a salutary and good effect, and tends to bring forth many an artist who otherwise would vegetate unknown; but who, thanks to such ladies as Madame Berlin de Vaux, Countess de Sparre, Countess de Merlin, Duchess de Caze, Madames Pauckoucke and Mer, have been enabled to brave the ordeal of public criticism and pave the way to reputation and fortune. It is remarked by most of our artists that a reputation gained in the salons of Paris insures success in every part of the Continent.

I am only doing an act of justice to an unfortunate, in recording a flagrant act of injustice, committed by the magistrates of Tours towards Mr. Conaty, an Irish gentleman belonging to a most respectable family, and who has hitherto enjoyed the fairest and friendship of all those acquainted with him. It would appear that on the 9th of December last Mr. Conaty and an officer of hussars, a M. Deshoudes, played écarté in one of the public rooms of Tours; the cards were renewed by Messrs. Septeuil, Bronnet, Mackonald, Gazette, and Houdsworth. After playing the whole of the night, Mr. Conaty won £120. At six o'clock in the morning M. Deshoudes proposed to play double or quits for the second pounte. Whilst the game was going on, M. Bourmer put his hand on the cards and declared they were marked. M. Deshoudes behaved in the first instance most honourably; he declared that he was satisfied that he had fairly lost the money, and offered to pay the money: but, persuaded by his friend, he subsequently declared that he would give it for the benefit of the poor. The affair soon made a noise in Tours, and Mr. Conaty was indicted for marking the cards. Notwithstanding the evidence of many highly respectable gentlemen, some of whom had come from Paris for that purpose, he was condemned by the Tribunal of Tours to two years' imprisonment. Mr. Conaty appealed against this decision, and, at the same time, the Procureur du Roi also appealed against the leniency of the sentence. The Tribunal of Blois having heard arguments on both sides, declared Mr. Conaty guilty, and sentenced him to two years' imprisonment, deprived him of civil rights during ten years, and placed him under the surveillance of high police. The latter punishment compels him to live in a town named by the police. Mr. Conaty has appealed to the Court of Cassation, and the report of M. Quesnault, the advocate-general, is in favour of quashing the judgment. The court will give its decision on Thursday next, and should it be favourable to Mr. Conaty, as in all probability it will be, it will be sent for trial in a department distant from Tours or Blois. It is the general opinion that Mr. Conaty is innocent, and that he is the victim of a foul conspiracy. You shall be kept well informed in all the proceedings of this delicate affair, which has created a great sensation.

The first representation of Mr. Balfe's opera is definitively fixed for the 10th of April, it is called "Le Puits d'Amour," the "Well of Love;" it is in three acts. The libretto is by Scribe and Lemoin. The principal characters will be supported by Anna Shidon, Darnier, Chollet, Andran, and Henri. Those who have been present at the rehearsals speak highly of it.

A mistaken estimate is generally made of the number of English residents in Paris: I do not allude to visitors. From official statistical reports before me it appears that there are only between six and seven thousand residents, the greater portion whom are women, and that the average income does not exceed £200 per annum. At no one period have there been 8000 English residents in Paris. There is no want of medical gentlemen: we have at least 400! and as to apothecaries; but I am sorry to say, very few gain sufficient to provide for their establishments. Sir Robert Chromside is an exception. This gentleman is the medical attendant to the Hertford family; and, independent of a salary of £1000 a year, he has a lodging provided for him. Sir Robert is also attached to the British Embassy. The only clerical gentlemen of the Established Church are Bishop Luscombe and the Rev. Mr. Lovell, who officiate at the rising chapels.

A slight shock of an earthquake was experienced on the 28th of March, at Luneville, in the department of Meurthe; with the exception of the destruction of two houses, little has been done.

Admiral Williamez, at the advanced age of 80, has been created a count. This is rather tardy justice, supposing the admiral was entitled to a reward for services rendered to the empire.

Thalberg leaves Paris on Monday next for Vienna, and from thence he proceeds to America.

Count d'Erlon, the oldest Lieutenant-General, has been raised to the rank of Marshal of France. General Bugeaud has been decorated with the grand cross of the Legion of Honour

The oyster trade is most flourishing on the coast of France. From Granville, during 1842, 84 boats left, having on board 730 men, and brought thirty-four millions of oysters, which sold for 464,968f., or nearly £20,000

SPAIN.—OPENING OF THE CORTES.—The opening of the Spanish Cortes took place with due solemnity on the 3rd. The Regent repaired to the royal palace, where the peers and deputies, in full costume, awaited to accompany her Majesty. The empty state coach drawn by eight horses preceded the way in carriages drawn each by six mules; the Queen's sister went in a carriage drawn by horses. Her Majesty, accompanied by the Regent, by the Duchesses of Medina and Alburnia, drove in the royal state coach drawn by eight horses, superbly caparisoned. The ceremony took place in the Senate-room, where the Regent read aloud the royal speech.

SPANISH BONDS.—PALMERSTON VERSUS ARBUTHNOT.—"Sir,—Since I took upon myself the charge of the Ministry of Finance, one of my principal cares has been to take into due consideration the payment of the interest on the new Stock of Three per Cents, among, by reason of its origin, an on account of the circumstances of the nation, it ought to be regarded as the basis of the revival of Spanish credit. The payment (of said interest) took place with due punctuality in the months of the finances of the treasury; and, although the effects thereof were felt in the market of this city an in those of foreign countries, yet the said stock has not assumed the value equivalent to that of other countries. The cause of this, in my opinion, is, that the creditors do not consider the future payment of the interest as secured. It is, therefore, indispensable to give them a guarantee which may assure them with confidence, make manifestly the good faith of the Government, and leave the latter free from any compromise at the time of the respective half years' (divides is) falling due. My idea, sir, is to provide the Board of Amortization, with the necessary funds, and to take care that the latter be not diverted to meet other obligations. For this obligation, therefore, let there be assigned the proceeds of the quicksilver from the time that the new contract shall have been concluded by virtue of the decree of the Provisional Regency of the 4th November 1842, and which were at the reservation of the Government. Four millions of reals (£40,000) per month.

Art. 2. As the government reckons upon having the means necessary to pay the interest on the said stock for the present semestre, and that of the coming year, from the remainder of Cuba, and the Crusade, shall commence in the month of September next, in order that the Board (Cdes) may receive from upon said interest funds required from the 1st of January, 1844; for which purpose the Direction of the Treasury shall forward to it (the Board) with the suitable anticipation bills against the said produce by instalments of one, in order more easily to effect the payments at their maturity.

Madrid, 3rd April, 1843. THE DUKE DE LA VICTORIA.

To Don Ramon M. Calatrava.

TURKEY.—The empire has never been in a more critical state than at this present moment. All her recent acts, whether justifiable or not, appear to have involved her in difficulties with the great powers of Europe. The ejection of a party in Servia which was notoriously hostile to her, and carrying on, as tools of Russia, the most destructive intrigues in her provinces, has irritated the Emperor, who is determined, it is said, to compel the Porte to restore the family of Czernovitz, and indemnify it for the obnoxious individuals. To this effect was the letter which was sent by the Emperor to the Sultan An answer has now been returned, absolutely refusing to concede these demands. The general impression is, that the present party in Servia are completely anti-Russian, and that Russia, by the recent change, has lost all her influence in that province, and has lost much, if not all, the power of preventing the Bulgarians and Servians from forming a common and over the Servians, with whom the Bulgarians have a fellow feeling. Austria has still avoided recognising the new Government. The English and French ambassadorial visits; and Russia has endeavoured, as much as it is in her power, to overthrow the Prince and his Ministers. Austrian matters are still in a most perplexed state. The question resolves itself into this: the independence of Hungary is the political conveyance of goods and passengers. The Turks deny their right to do so. The matter was at one time referred to Sir Stratford Canning, but the Turks are determined to make no concessions to the Diet. Austria is determined to insist, whether she has a legal right or not, upon the free navigation of the Black Sea, and threatens extreme measures unless the Porte concedes to her demands. The general impression is, that the present period of the siege and capture, by storm, of Kerbelah by the Pacha of Bagdad. Nejib, who was still at Damascus. The Pacha of Bagdad had endeavoured, on several occasions, to take possession of the sacred city. But the Pacha of Nejib, with his Albanian and Constantinopolitan troops, who had not the religious scruples of the Bagdadees, entered the place after a brave resistance for twenty days, and the gates of Kerbelah, Cufa, and Nejeff were thrown open to the pilgrims without guns, and almost unarmed. It is generally believed that the result of this affair will cause fresh ill feeling between Persia and the Porte: and all those who are acquainted with the Bagdadees are convinced that they will not suffer such a command

IMPERIAL PARLIAMENT.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—MONDAY.

The Copyhold and Customary Tenure Bill was read a second time.—Lord BROUGHAM asked if there was any objection to lay before the house a return of the expenses which would be incurred by the building of the Victoria Tower, adjoining the new Houses of Parliament. It was only yesterday he had seen the plan of this tower, which was a gross violation of every thing like good taste, and must cost a very large sum of money to the country.—Lord DUNCANNON said that the Victoria Tower was part of the original plan, and the expense of building it formed part of the original estimate. Several petitions were presented, after which their lordships adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—MONDAY.

Lord J. RUSSELL read the resolutions which he intended to bring forward after the recess respecting education.—Sir J. GRAHAM said that the Government had had several points contained in the propositions of the noble lord under consideration, and had upon the principle of them introduced modifications into the Factories Bill. Lord STANLEY, in reply to a question from Lord Palmerston, said that fresh instructions had not been sent to the Bahamas respecting the case of the Queen, with a view to any future hypothetical case. The confidential opinion of the law officers of the Crown had been transmitted to the governor, and the house might rely upon it that the right of slaves to freedom in a British port would not be interfered with by the proceedings of Government. In reply to a question from Mr. Ewart, Sir R. PEEL said he had received no intelligence that Mr. Ellis had failed in his mission, and was on his return to this country—reply to question from Mr. S. Worsley, Sir R. PEEL said that the slave trade was carried on in the territories of the East India Company, principally on the coast of Bombay, by Arabs, and several persons had been punished for it. A new act would, however, shortly come into operation, which would more effectually check the traffic.—On the motion of Sir J. GRAHAM, the Registration of Voters Bill was read a third time.—Some clauses were then added to the bill by which jurisdiction upon disputed votes was given to the Court of Common Pleas, and also condemned the power given to one of the judges of appointing the revising barristers, as calculated to destroy the independence of the bar, and thus act injuriously to the interests of the public. He thought the present system very objectionable to the judges of the whole exchequer body in the kingdom to the ever-varying opinions and decisions of the judges.—The SOLICITOR-GENERAL said that in the Irish courts Sir Michael O'Loghlen, on the part of the late Government, brought in a bill to render the decision of the judge binding on a committee of the House of Commons, while in the present case the decision of the Common Pleas would only bind an election committee in the particular case and on the point at issue. There was nothing given up by this bill which could at all be considered as an abandonment of the privileges of the house. It was merely carrying out the original intention of the Reform act, except that the power was given to four judges instead of to three revising barristers.—Mr. HUME supported the clause, which, on a division, was carried by a majority of 109 to 76; the bill then passed.—Dr. NICHOLL moved the second reading of the Ecclesiastical Courts Bill.—Sir R. H. INGLIS condemned the bill as totally destroying the ancient institutions of the country, and never could he say one evil from one less than 300 courts, some of them as old as Conquest. He contended at great length that a few instances of error did not in knowledge of wills were not a sufficient justification of such a measure, and that in few those records were generally carefully attended to. In addition to which it was most useful that they should be enrolled as near the locality of the parties interested as possible; for parties, particularly in the lower ranks of society and in the agricultural districts, would never be perfectly well satisfied as with a personal inspection of the will itself. He had many objections to the bill, some of which he stated, but reserved the general question for discussion, if the bill should ultimately be read into committee. He hoped the right hon. baronet would consent to have its measure postponed to a future session, in order that further consideration might be given to it, but until he received an intimation to take such a step he had but one course to pursue—that of moving that the bill should be read a second time that day six months.—Sir J. GRAHAM could not assent to the postponement of the measure which was brought forward under the most anxious consideration upon the part of the Government. Firmly believing the measure was wise in its policy, and conducive to the public good, he was anxious to relieve himself from the responsibility of having the sense of the house upon the propriety of its adoption. No measure had ever come before the house with higher authority to support it, both national and ecclesiastical: and he was by no means prepared to admit he heard the speech of his right honourable friend, to imagine that any member of that house could defend the existence of these scattered tribunals, the nature and decisions of which had occasioned such general litigation. It would be of the greatest importance that there should be a centralization of the custody of those wills in the metropolis, where nearly all the cases referred to the property they could get out of court, and arrested place. The bill was now before them upon its principle, and if the house should reject it he should deeply regret it, for he conscientiously believed that one more satisfactory in its details he could not propose than that which they had then to decide upon.—Mr. JERVIS opposed the bill on the ground that it tended to throw all the business of the country into Doctors' Commons, the records of which were constituted as not to be safely entrusted with such extensive jurisdiction. They were monopolies; only thirty-four persons could practise there, and no person could be an articled clerk to a proctor unless paying a premium of at least £1000. As a remedy they had all the machinery for search quite perfect at the Stamp-office in order to the collection of the legacy duty, and such a bill as this was therefore wholly unnecessary, if the only object was economy. All the most reprehensible parts of the jurisdiction of the ecclesiastical courts were still retained by this bill, such as the bishop's courts, and the trials for schism, heresy, perjury, &c. These were the very things which it was notoriously desirable to abolish; and these were almost the only things not meddled with. He also objected to the bill because it gave increased salaries and patronage to the officers of Doctors' Commons, and left the small practitioners in the country, many of whom would be ruined by its operation.—Co onel SIBTHORP objected to the bill, which gave increased salaries to the judges and officers of Doctors' Commons, who were rich enough and idle enough a ready. Sir G. Grey rose to address the house, but Sir W. BARON moved an adjournment, which was carried by 136 to 51.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—TUESDAY.

The Royal assent was given by commission to the Punishment of Death, the Coast of Africa Settlements Government, the Slave Trade Abolition, Bolivia, Uruguay, and Texas), the Sudbury Disfranchisement Witnesses, and several railway and other private Bills. Lord CAMPBELL moved the second reading of the Transfer of Freehold Property Bill for the first Thursday after the recess. Lord ABINGERTON expressed his acknowledgments for the vote of thanks passed by their lordships for his conduct in bringing the differences between this country and America to a close.—The Duke of WELLINGTON moved that the acknowledgments of the noble lord should be inserted on the journals, though the gallant officer had acted in the most praiseworthy spirit.—Lord DENMAN thanked the noble earl for the justice he had done the gallant officer, and added, that in this question of slavery he was disposed to take a larger tone than he had been taken by his noble friends around him. He thought it should be treated by every nation as a crime against humanity which any nation might punish without reference to the wishes of another nation. In the case of piracy, independent of the laws of any country, the offence should be treated as a crime against all, and therefore it was that he thought too low a tone had been taken in the negotiations on the subject. The bill was then read a first time, and the house adjourned until Tuesday, the 25th of April.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—TUESDAY.

Sir. VILLIERS announced his intention of bringing forward a motion on the corn laws on the 4th of May. In reply to a question from Sir J. Graham, Sir J. GRAHAM said that the returns moved for by the right honourable baronet relative to church-rates were so voluminous that it was impossible to say when they would be ready. He hoped, however, to be able to give a more definite answer after Easter.—Sir J. GRAHAM, in reply to a question from Mr. Roebuck, said that the commissioners for inquiring into the state of the criminal law had made several reports, and had also made several important recommendations, amongst which the most important one was the consolidation of the criminal law, more particularly in the laws relating to treason and murder. The Government could not, however, undertake such a task, which could be much more properly carried out by a commission. On the motion of Sir ROBERT PEEL, it was agreed that the house, at its rising, should adjourn until Monday, the 24th of April. The adjourned debate on the Ecclesiastical Courts Bill was adjourned until the 28th of April.—Sir J. WALSH moved for leave to bring in a bill for the better regulation of parish vestries in England and Wales.—Mr. G. KNIGHT opposed the motion.—Sir B. HALL hoped the Government would not lend its sanction to repealing an act which had conferred such benefits where it was in operation as Hobhouse's Act.—Captain JONES, Mr. HAWES, and Mr. HUME severally opposed the motion. Colonel T. WOOD thought that Sir J. Walsh had gone too far, but hoped he would be allowed to introduce his bill.—Sir J. GRAHAM, in the absence of Lord John Russell, recommended the honourable member to withdraw his motion.—Sir J. WALSH said he had not expected such opposition, and withdrew his motion.—Mr. BOWRING then moved for a return of the correspondence between the British Government and the Porte on the subject of the Bishop of Jerusalem. The policy of the appointment he thought bad, and the selection of the man he thought worse, because he was the son of a Jew, a class associated with feelings of contempt in oriental minds. The people were much astonished on the arrival of the bishop's wife and family, for, according to their ideas, celibacy was associated with the sacerdotal character.—Sir R. PEEL defended the character and attainments of Dr. Alexander, against whom he was no reproach that he was a Jew by descent. He approved of having a representative of the Protestant Church in the city.—Sir R. PEEL said it appeared as if Dr. Bowring was actuated by personal hostility to the bishop, and the manifestation of this spirit, together with strong public reasons, induced him to refuse the correspondence. The bishop had been received most cordially, and had received also marks of respect from the dignitaries of the Roman Catholic and Greek faith. Nothing unreasonable was requested from the Porte in asking for permission to build this Protestant church, for a Mahomedan might build one to his own faith in this country, in which Dr. Bowring might indulge his predilections by preaching in it.—Mr. HUME hoped the right hon. baronet would forget his sentiments on this occasion when the question of Jewish disabilities would be again brought before the house.—He considered the hon. baronet's declaration as a sign of growing liberality. ("Hear" and laughter.)—Lord PALMERSTON concurred in the remarks of Sir R. Peel, and regretted the spirit displayed by Dr. Bowring.—Dr. BOWRING said he was actuated by no improper feeling, and withdrew his motion.—Mr. HUME then moved for a select committee to inquire into the propriety of setting apart a portion of all waste lands which shall be enclosed by act of Parliament, to be let out in small allotments to the labouring poor in the district, and also into the best mode of effecting the same.—Sir J. GRAHAM assented to the appointment of the committee, for, although he was doubtful of the result, he thought it a more safe course than the introduction of a bill.—Mr. HUME said it would be infinitely better to repeal the corn-laws, if the object were to relieve the people.—The motion was then agreed to.—Captain PECHELL then rose to bring forward a motion of which he had given notice, but when the house was counted out, there being only thirty seven members present.

DEVONPORT, APRIL 11. The Druid, 44, frigate, Captain Henry Smith, has arrived from Portsmouth. On Tuesday morning Rear-Admiral Superintendent Sir R. Byam Martin went on board and mustered the crew, on which occasion he expressed himself highly satisfied with the discipline and general department of both officers and men. The Conway corvette, which is destined to take 3.6 convicts to Van Diemen's Land, and has completed that number by a draft of 100 men from the Stirling Castle convict-hulk at this port. She will stay for prescribed time, and then sail for her destination. The crew of the Druid is a detachment of the 99th Regiment, and the convicts are under the charge of Dr Lawrence, R.N. The Constance will be removed as expeditiously as possible into dock, to undergo repairs, and will sail for Kingstown, Ireland, to receive her freight. The convict guard of this ship is also a detachment of the 99th Regiment from Stonepoint, under the command of Lieut. W. R. Elliot and Ensign De Winton, and consists of 45 rank and file, with two sergeants and a proportion of officers, with whom are six women and nine children.—The Gannet, another ship chartered to take convicts to Van Diemen's Land, lying at Sheerness, waiting the arrival of convicts from Chatham. The staff of the 99th is on board this vessel. The Royal Commission, Captain Tegart, Master Chantry of Queenborough, embarked the head quarters of the 54th Regiment in the Dockyard this afternoon, and sailed the same evening for Glasgow. The Rhadamanthus steam-vessel, Master Commanding T. H. Lang, received on board the detachment appointed to take charge of Regnault. They were landed the same day, and on Monday the remaining detachment of the 54th embarked, and sailed at noon for Glasgow.

ROYAL ARTILLERY.—Lieut.-Col. Chesney, the celebrated traveller who was employed on the Euphrates and Tigris expedition, and subsequently on Persian service, has received orders to proceed to Hong Kong, as commanding officer of Artillery.—Major-Gen. the Royal Artillery were inspected to-day at the hospital, and will form a detachment to accompany Col. Chesney to fill up the casualties in Major Greenwood's company at that station.

SHIPPING INTELLIGENCE.

BRIGHTON.—On Sunday the offing was very thickly studded with outward bound merchant vessels, which had been lying in the Downs for the two or three days previous, outbound.

On Sunday afternoon the brig William Fulcher, Captain Staines, from Sydney, New South Wales, anchor at Brighton, per pilot boat Mother Goose, from Dover, one passenger and 30 tons, and five bags of letters, which were immediately forwarded to London. The passenger reports that on the passage the large comet appeared very brilliant, and that the bulbea was distantly discernible.

A Liverpool schooner, Johnson master, has been last eight leagues from Cadiz, bound up the Mediterranean.

The Great Western steam-ship, advertised to sail from Liverpool to New York on the 15th, will not leave till the 29th. On leaving New York she go on shore, and it has been found necessary to alter her bottom. Another ship, the Great Britain, is now in course of building at Liverpool being full RESCUE OF A SHIP'S CREW BY FRENCH FISHERMEN.—The following particulars of the rescue of a ship's crew by some French fishermen has been received by the owners from their agent at Boulogne-sur-Mer.—"We beg to inform you that the crew of a German vessel, fourteen in number, including an English pilot, were picked up by a fishing-boat belonging to this port, and brought here this afternoon. The number of the boat is 93, and the name of the master Jean Gu.". It appears that on the morning of the 9th inst. the Jean Sparidone, 290 tons, Captain Demetric Degoujan, from Newcastle to Constantinople, with coals. She had an English pilot on board, and had put into Hull and Grimsby on account of contrary winds. She struck on the sands on the 9th inst., at twelve a.m. The crew took to the long-boat, and would doubtless have perished, had not the master of the fishing-boat used every exertion to rescue them. In the attempt to save the ship's papers, but at attempt the object he met in view, that of saving the lives of all hands belonging to the unfortunate vessel in question.

LOSS OF A STEAMER.—On Friday week the following remarkable occurrence, in which a steamer was stake, and several lives lost, attracted with loss of life, took place at Tynemouth, near North Shields. At day-break, the pilot on the look-out at the entrance of the river discovered a vessel amongst the rocks, called the Black Middens, underneath Tynemouth lighthouse and the ruins Abbey, which proved to be a steamer. The alarm was instantly raised, and the life boat was manned, and put off to render assistance, when before arriving alongside of the vessel, steam suppose was at stake, only one man on board, who was safely taken out of the wreck, and conveyed ashore. Immediately after he succeeded in attempted to get away, without giving any account as to the manner the ashed, but the customs officer of the port, who was at the entrance of the some time, he admitted having, with another man, stolen the steamer from her moorings in that river (the Tyne), and in making for sea she got on the rocks. This took place about two o'clock on the Thursday night, and the more they strove to get her off the more she was bilged beneath. Angry, on the return of the tide, she commenced breaking up, and he must have perished very shortly but for the arrival of the life-boat. The other man, he said, jumped overboard upon the vessel breaking up, to swim to the rocks, but is expected he had been drowned, for he saw nothing more of him. It has been ascertained that the steamer, which was called the Charles William, with two engines of 20 horse power, belonged to Messrs. Richardson and Co., steam-vessels, at South Shields, and had the man who is supposed to be drowned was a Lascarlad son. The vessel was used for towing vessels in and out of the harbour. She was quite completely to pieces

TOTAL DESTRUCTION OF TWO SHIPS BY FIRE.—Accounts have, within the last two or three days, been received at the Edinburgh insurance companies of the total loss of two vessels—their cargoes—the schooner Agnes, of Leith, and the Glasgow. The loss of the first named [illegible] ill, and, to the dismay of all on board, the fire was by no means extinguished. Every effort was made for saving the vessel, but all efforts overboard, and every means adopted in the hope of stifling the flames. In the mean while the master, whose conduct throughout is spoken of in high praise by the crew, brought the ship round with a different course, in hopes of meeting with vessels, and lights were observed at the most head, as a signal of distress. At about half past two o'clock, the destruction of the vessel became inevitable, [illegible] abandoning to the mercy, sails, and rigging. Ere a quarter of an hour had elapsed the whole vessel, from stem to stern, presented one vast body of flames. The [illegible] who had previously jumped into the long-boat, remained within a short distance of the burning ship until she went down, which did not take place until between six and seven o'clock. Everything in her was by that time consumed, the masts had fallen overboard, and nothing remained but her mere shell. Two hours after the vessel was sunk the crew were picked up by the Norwegian barque Two Sosters, Captain Holst, from Helmstrand for Harlingen, the fire having been seen by them at a distance, and who were bearing down to render assistance. On board of that vessel the master and crew received the utmost kindness, and on Monday week last they were safely put ashore at Texel, near Nieuwdep. The vessel and cargo are only partly insured. The destruction of the other ship, the Fame, of Glasgow, by fire, happened on the morning of Wednesday, the 22d of February, in lat. 35 deg. long. 18 deg., under similar circumstances. Soon after the outbreak of the flames a vessel called the Gartsherrie came alongside, and took the crew on board, and afterwards landed them safely at Madeira. The ship is fully insured at Glasgow.

SHIPS FOR A FERRY.—The Cato steamer, of London, on November, 1250 barrels; the Jane and Anne, of Sydney, with 200 barrels; the Kent, of London, out 16 months, with 400 barrels in the Sydney, arrived at Hobart Town.

BURNING OF THE TRANSPORT-SHIP LIVERPOOL.—Extract of a private letter, dated Canton Harbour, Dec. 11th:—"Since the last letter we have been, after four months' detention, and up the river Yang-tse-Keang, which has never been navigated before by Europeans. We succeeded in getting up the river about 90 miles, when we came to a dead stop, one and all of us. The Harlequin, 18 guns, Commander Bourchier, T. Hastings (a relation of the late Lady Flora), struck on a sandbank, and, for a time, considerable anxiety was manifested for her safety. However, by the judicious conduct of the master, she got off in a few hours, without injury. The other craft were not so lucky. The last Indus Company's warsteamer Ariadne got upon a reef, and afterwards sunk in deep water, carrying with her three Chinese, who perished. Most of the transports being astern had time to bring to anchor, except the Liverpool, which struck on a sandbank, and became immovable. The Harlequin was then ordered to lay alongside, to protect her from being plundered by the Chinese, and to use means to get her afloat. The Herleqin remained by her for nearly a month, and, although her masts and all top-stores were taken out of her, the ship still remained a fixture, and afterwards, by order of the admiral, she was set fire to, and consumed. The Liverpool was a fine brig, between 300 and 400 tons burden, and belonged to Liverpool."

SHIPWRECK.—On Saturday morning the Russell, of Poole, Kimber master, was driven ashore between Cape of Redhil, near Hastings, and was found on blowing very hard from the west, and the sea made a clear breach over her. Two of the hands succeeded in getting ashore in the boat, but the other six were lashed to the rigging, the people on shore not being able to render the least assistance. Fortunately the vessel held together until the tide fell, when they were all released from their perilous situation in a most pitiable condition. The poor fellows, who had lost everything, were relieved by the Hastings branch of the Shipwrecked Mariners' and Fishermen's Society.

NEW LIGHTHOUSES AT DUNBAR AND GREAT YARMOUTH, ON THE COAST OF FRANCE.—In consequence of the loss of the Reliance and the Conqueror East Indiamen off Cape Grisnez, near Boulogne sur Mer, the French Minister of Marine is having a memoir drawn up for the coast of France, so as to ascertain the present state of the lighthouses (fanals), and the exertion of vessels where they may be most wanted, so as to prevent a similar catastrophe to that which happened to the above two ill-fated vessels.

ACCIDENTS AND OFFENCES.

DARING BURGLARY.—At Union Hall, on Thursday, two men, named Wheelwright and Kidney, were charged with breaking into the premises of Mr. Tillyer, oilman, Great Suffolk-street, Borough. It appeared from the evidence of Police-constable Baker, one of the H division, that on the previous morning, as he was passing Mr. Tillyer's shop he perceived Kidney and another man leave the shop-door, and a few minutes afterwards Wheelwright joined them in the dark. He had a parcel full of tobacco, and was about to spring his rattle, when the man not in custody suddenly aimed a blow at his head with a jemmy, which grazed the side of his head, and somewhat stunned the man all to pieces. He could call for assistance the whole of them escaped. Knowing where the two prisoners resided, he with the assistance of another constable took them out of their beds at four o'clock in the morning. Mr. Tillyer stated that he was alarmed by the cries of the police, who informed him that his house had been broken into. On going down to the shop he discovered that the thieves had effected an entrance by forcing a panel in the door, behind which he found a cap, which was proved to belong to Kidney, a hat was also found, belonging to the man not in custody. The constable said he knew the man. The prisoners were committed for trial until Saturday.

FATAL FALL.—A man named Jordan, a carpenter, residing at Marlborough-street, Chelsea, fell from a ladder whilst repairing a watersput in his own yard, and was killed.

ROBBERY AT LORD ABERDEEN'S.—On Tuesday last a man dressed as a sweep made his way into the house of the Earl of Aberdeen, No 7, Argyle-street, Oxford street, and carried off a brown dress coat and a blue coat, belonging to Captain Gordon. He is described as a young man, short and stout.

FIRE IN THE STRAND.—On Tuesday morning a fire broke out in the lower part of the house of Mr. Hunt, of the cigar divan and billiard rooms, next to Exeter 'Change, Strand. Water was procured from the Thames, and the exertions of those present the fire was soon extinguished. The origin of the fire is not known.

FATAL ACCIDENT OFF ERITH.—A few days ago as a number of gentlemen were testing the capabilities of a newly purchased sailing yacht, a man named Freeman, an old and experienced waterman, who had undertaken the management of the vessel, was thrown out of his position by the breaking of a rope, and knocked over into the river. The accident was immediately observed, but the vessel had got full way upon her, and it appears that though the boat was lowered and a skiff was also in the course of the vessel not changed, nor was any rope thrown to the poor man, who after floating for a few minutes sunk to rise no more.

BODIES FOUND IN THE RIVER.—On Tuesday the body of a woman was found on the causeway in front of the old Thames Police-office (now used as a station) in Wapping, and supposed to have been in the water three or four days. A person identified the body as that of a man who committed suicide on Saturday night last, by throwing herself from Waterloo-bridge. The attempts made to recover the body of the late Mr. B. Ferrand Busfield, who was drowned at Battersea Reach on Saturday last, have led to the finding of the bodies of several other persons, who have perished in the river Thames. The body of a man, named George Phantom, was found on Barking Side Creek, on Saturday, and on Monday the remains of a lad, who fell overboard from a vessel called the Nesles, off Greenwich, was taken out of the river at Greenwich. On Tuesday, the body of a sailor boy was found below Limehouse Church. There are generally numerous fatal accidents by drowning during the last three weeks, chiefly of persons employed in the barges and craft in the river. Not fewer than 2000 persons are drowned annually in the United Kingdom, and the average in the rivers, canals, and waters in the metropolis and its immediate vicinity, is about 400 every year.

FALL OF A TOWER AND LOSS OF EIGHT LIVES.—The telegraph brought the intelligence on Saturday last that Jeffry's tower of Nuncarnes had fallen down and killed eight persons. It appears that the structure, for the repair of which 80,000 francs had recently been voted, suddenly sunk down, about two hours after the workmen who had been working at it, alarmed by the falling of some loose stones, had quitted their dangerous position. Most of the persons occupying the houses at its base also quitted the scene of destruction in time to save their lives. But this was not the case with all. The wife of an officer of the garrison was killed, and the man posted at the top of the tower came down with the ruins, and was taken from the concourse excited a good deal of alarm in the town, and the news is as a fire broke out among the ruins immediately after the fall.

FATAL ACCIDENT ON THE RIVER.—On Tuesday night, about eleven o'clock, the Thames police, stationed on board the Investigator brig, off Somerset-house, heard cries of "Help" proceeding from the Temple-bar Pier. Three river constables, named Rowcroft, Gregory, and Rae, immediately proceeded in a boat to the spot, and there were informed that a man was overboard. They threw out the drags, and after three quarters of an hour recovered the body of a man about 35 years of age, named Pocock, who had been acting as waterman to the vessel. The vessel was a timber-laden barge of wooden blocks for paving the roads. It is supposed that in stepping from the barge to another alongside, near the pier, he slipped between the two vessels, and fell into the river. An inquest was held on the body on Wednesday evening, and these facts having been given in evidence, a verdict accordingly was returned.

DISTURBANCE AND ACCIDENT IN GRAVESEND REACH.—THREE SAILORS DROWNED.—On Wednesday afternoon an accident occurred in Gravesend Reach, which unfortunately resulted in the death of three young men, sailors, belonging to the Royal Victoria Dockyard, Deptford. The vessel under Gowland, now lying off the Royal Dockyard, Deptford. It appears that the young men who are lost formed part of a boat's crew of five hands, who left the vessel in the morning, by order of the master, to go on shore on various stations below Gravesend. The boat was a small skiff, and from the statement of one of the survivors it seems that as they were on their return, with their boat loaded with provisions, they had the misfortune to run foul of the Blackwall steamer, which was coming up the river when the boat capsized, and some of the persons on board observed the poor fellows struggling in the water, and immediately proceeded to their assistance, but before that was effected, two of the sailors had sunk to rise no more. Another was picked up by a lighterman, who was navigating a barge up the river, and put off on observing the accident; but three out of the five sunk before could reach them.

FIRE IN SHADWELL.—EXTRAORDINARY PRESERVATION OF HUMAN LIFE.—Between twelve and one on Tuesday morning a serious fire occurred in the vicinity of Shadwell, in consequence of a fire having been discovered on the premises of Mr Haylow, boot and shoemaker, High-street, Shadwell, which was nearly attended with loss of life. It appears that it was first noticed on the second floor front room, tenanted by a family named Burright, a dense mass of smoke having been seen issuing from the windows. The alarm was instantly given, and Inspector Beverley, the parish constable, soon attended with the Shadwell engine, as well as the brigade engines from Wellclose and Jeffry square, and the inhabitants having exerted themselves to the utmost in subduing the flames, the fire after some difficulty was confined to the floor in which it originated. On it being reported that a child was missing, and being apprehensive that it might have perished in the flames, search was immediately made, when to the parents' surprise, they found the child lying under a bed, apparently suffocated. It was with a speed removed to a neighbouring surgeon's, and after some time life was restored

NEWCASTLE.—The rope of the incline through the tunnel from Spital Tongues Colliery to the river Tyne, at the North shore, broke on Saturday, while ten waggons were descending. The waggons thus at liberty ran again to the river, where a vessel was being loaded, over which a portion of them ran completely into the water, and the remainder were lodged on the deck. Happily no lives were lost, though the damage done was considerable.

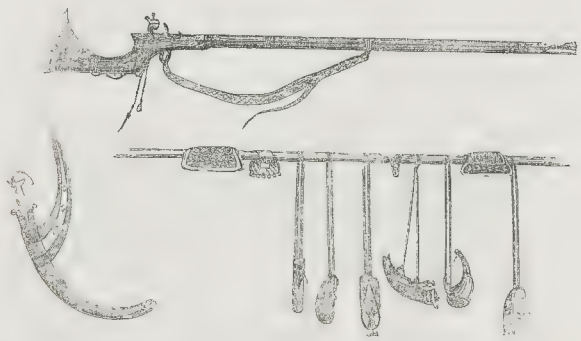
SUKKUR, OR "VICTORIA," ON THE INDUS.

This spot, now established as a British post, is remarkable for its peculiarity of character and position. It is situated on the Indus, immediately opposite the fort of Bukkur, and looks upon the rich fertile gardens of Koree on its opposite bank, which are fringed with graceful foliage.

Modern Sukkur was originally a vast Mohamedan cemetery outside the old city, which now stands, but in a ruinous plight; and the new houses erected as European habitations have been built for the greater part above the Moslem mausoleums, which are curiously faced with mosaics of azure china ware.

The heat of Sukkur is extreme, in consequence of its being built on limestone rock, but as a military post it is not found unhealthy, although many European troops have suffered, in consequence of being unsheltered by good barracks, and compelled to live in tents by the water's edge.

In a commercial point of view, the confidence inspired by our presence is every day more apparent. The Bazaar, once an ill-supplied, thinly-inhabited place, is now wealthy and extensive. Traders from Western India, Bancans, Parsees, and artisans have settled there; large, numerous, and commodious shops have been erected; and Sukkur is secure and flourishing.



BELOOCHEE WAR ARMS.

Every Beloochee warrior isadorned with a great number and variety of these appendages, called among the people Toshdans. Some are bags for containing bullets, others are powder pouches, with many having a variety of uses. They are commonly made of the light green leather of Cabul, embroidered in coloured silks and adorned with fringes. They are suspended to a belt which passes round the wearer's waist and corresponds with his shield and sword belts. The Beloochee sword is broad and much curved; the hilt is usually silver, and the sheath black leather ornamented with green leather and scarlet cloth, bossed and adorned with gold and silver according to the rank of the wearer. The blades are often of great value, and verses of the Koran are frequently graven on them towards the hilt. This weapon is always used with a circular sweep, and the Beloochees are too expert swordsmen ever to render them doubtful of its effect. The matchlock, as represented in our engraving, is one of those worn commonly by the Beloochees, and worth about fifty rupees, or five pounds English; but the chiefs are luxurious in these arms, and frequently possess matchlocks which are worth a hundred pounds. The barrels are often beautifully watered, the manufacture of Damascus, and the bands and ornaments of richly chased Venetian gold. The chiefs have adopted English locks to their matchlocks, but the Beloochee soldiers, generally speaking, continue the match. The inferior matchlocks are made in Sindh, and many even of these are handsome. The Beloochees are not particularly good marksmen, and the length of the matchlock barrel renders it difficult to take correct aim. The Hill Beloochees sometimes use wooden rests to assist in steadying the weapon, and many of these were found by our troops about the Pass of the Bolan.

SINDHIAN BELOOCHEE.

Under the government of the Ameers of Sindh, which was itself nothing more nor less than a system of Beloochee despotism, a great number of Beloochees settled in that country, as mercenary soldiers. They are a fine race of men, far superior to the people of the country in size and daring. Their costume, as shown in the cut, is Sindhian, consisting of a gown of thick white cotton, a blue cotton scarf across the shoulders, and the tail, stiff, singular-looking cap, which is made in all the towns of Sindh, varying in price from one rupee to thirty. Their arms are a sword, shield, and matchlock, to which they commonly adapt the European flint and steel. Their salaries are generally nominal, being commonly billeted on villages, and allowed to forage for themselves—by which system they become, of course, a perpetual curse to the agricultural and peaceful part of the population.

BELOOCHEE CHIEF.

The country of Beloochistan with the plains of Cutchee are divided between, and governed by independent chiefs, supported by their followers, who, although acknowledging the right of the prince to their military service, refuse the payment of all tribute. Many of these chiefs possess great power, and, in cases of combination, the prince seldom dares to oppose their will.

The dress and general appearance of the Beloochee chiefs is very picturesque and remarkable. They are usually large of person, with fine Jewish features, and glossy hair hanging in long curls upon their shoulders. They are adorned with a large proportion of arms and warlike ornaments, and wear huge turbans of thick white cloth, twisted carelessly round the head. They are always well mounted, and their Khurasan mares are remarkable for their blood and breeding.

The residency at Hyderabad, which, according to our latest accounts from Sindh, was destroyed by the Beloochees during our late engagement with the forces of the Ameers of Sindh, was originally erected from a plan of Major Outram's, and situated somewhat less than a quarter of a mile from the bank of the Indus, and three miles from the fort of Hyderabad. Before our occupation of the country, the garden in which it stood was a pleasure-ground of the Ameers, and was well filled with fine fruit trees. The great reception-room, which occupied the whole length of the house, was remarkably lofty and well decorated, a large amount having been expended in furnishing it with a variety of French and Florentine ornaments, with the view of giving the princes of Sindh a taste for luxuries, which should induce them to look favourably on the interests of commerce, and perhaps tend to modify their barbarian notions.

The house possessed a second story to it, a luxury not very common in Sindh or India, in consequence of the dangerous results incidental to the inroads of white ants upon the timbers; but the excessive heat and steamy atmosphere of Hyderabad during the spring and summer seasons rendered the elevated sleeping-rooms absolutely necessary. The loss of property to Government by the destruction of the residency must be very considerable, for the whole was in remarkably good taste, and, as we have observed, erected and furnished at great cost.

HYDERABAD.

OUR GREAT VICTORY IN THE EAST.

With the arrival of the Overland Mail we had in our last number to record one of those brilliant achievements of the prowess of British skill and valour over overwhelming numbers of a barbarous enemy, which, in almost every instance in which we have dared the disadvantageous encounter, have crowned the prowess of our arms. It is thus that this glorious affair—glorious so far as the gallantry of our general, and the noble conduct of our troops, are concerned—has been epitomized by a military contemporary. It appears that the British Government, having determined to civilize Scinde against its will, and after taking possession of the Indus having demanded a certain territory on its banks, the Ameers determined on seeking the first convenient opportunity for resistance. They tampered, and pretended to treat, until time had been afforded them to collect their troops. This accomplished, they sent word to Major Outram to retire from Hyderabad, which, not expecting immediate hostilities, he declined to do. Accordingly, on the 15th of February, his residence was attacked by an overwhelming force, but was gallantly defended by 100 men, who maintained their position for several hours, and who (their whole ammunition being expended) eventually succeeded in retiring to the steamers, whence they proceeded to join Sir Charles Napier, then at the head of some 2,700 men, at a distance of twenty miles from Hyderabad. The Ameers made, as may be supposed, all haste to attack this handful of men with an army of 22,000. The battle took place on the 17th, and, after a terrific fight of three hours, the Ameers were defeated with immense loss. The Bombay Times justly describes this action as one of the most brilliant and severely contested which has occurred since the days of Lord Clive; and, although we have given a summary of the Indian news elsewhere, and the official document describing the battle, we cannot refrain from quoting the more graphic account of our Indian contemporary:—

"One of the most severely contested and brilliant actions was fought near Hyderabad, in Scinde, on the 17th ult., which has occurred in India since the days of Lord Clive. General Napier, with a body of 2,700 British troops, consisting of her Majesty's 22nd, a portion of the Bengal 9th Cavalry, and Poonah Irregular Horse, the 1st Grenadiers, 12th and 25th Bombay Native Infantry, was met while on his march to Hyderabad by a body of 22,000 Beloochees, commanded by Ameers in person. The contest was a fierce and bloody one; for three hours the armies were closely and hotly engaged, victory occasionally leaning to either side. At length, the cavalry having managed to get round so as to operate on the flank of the enemy, our success was complete. The Beloochee army was dispersed, and fled in every direction, leaving upon the field upwards of a thousand slain; their wounded being computed at four times this number. The whole of their artillery, consisting of fifteen guns, fell into our hands; fifteen others were afterwards captured under the walls of the city. The whole of the Ameers immediately afterwards gave themselves up unconditionally as prisoners of war, surrendering at the same time the city of Hyderabad. Our troops, on the 20th, took possession of the gates, and encamped under the walls of the capital. Our casualties are severe, consisting of 256 killed and wounded, including 19 officers."

To the portrait of General Napier which we are enabled to give, with other illustrations of his gallant exploit, we add a brief but interesting memoir of his soldierly career, as it has been partially recorded by the United Service Gazette:—"We have long known," says our contemporary, "and esteemed the military character of the gallant general under whom this signal victory has been achieved. He is not only one of the 'bravest of the brave' in the field, but he has done more to promote the interests of the humbler classes of the army than all his brother generals put together. We allude to his book on military law, the best work that has ever appeared on the subject; but more particularly to his unceasing efforts to ameliorate the condition of the private soldier. His personal career has been one of chivalrous valour. His first service of consequence was in the Irish rebellion. He commanded the 50th Regiment during the entire campaign which terminated with the battle of Corunna, where he was made prisoner, after receiving five wounds (his leg broken by a musket shot, a sabre cut on his head, a wound in the back from a bayonet, ribs broken by a cannon-shot, and several contusions on the head from the butt-end of a musket). On his return to the Peninsula in 1809, where he remained until 1811, he was present at the battle of Coa, and had two horses shot under him; at the battle of Busaco (where he received a shot in the face, had his jaw broken, and his eye injured); Fuentes de Onor; the second siege of Badajos, and a great number of minor affairs. In 1813 he served in a floating expedition on the coast of America; and, in the campaign of 1815, was present at the storming of Cambray."

NAPIER.

SURRENDER OF THE AMEERS.

A TIGER STORY.—The following story is related in a letter from Batavia, dated December 6, inserted in the Amsterdamsche Courant:—"On the evening of the 16th November, whilst a Creole, named Ramein, was at work in front of his house, a royal tiger, coming from a thicket, advanced slowly behind him, and got pretty close upon him without being perceived. The father of Ramein, who was sitting within the house, observed the animal, but was so overcome by terror that he was unable immediately to give his son the alarm, and in another moment he perceived that the fierce animal had seized his son by the leg. Ramein, with great presence of mind, turned round and threw himself over the tiger; then exerting all his strength he held with both hands the animal's head between his legs, and pressed it down to the ground; but finding that his strength was insufficient, and that the animal was endeavouring to drag him into the neighbouring thicket, he began to cry out for help, and tried to force his fingers into the tiger's eyes, which object, however, the struggle prevented him from accomplishing. Meanwhile, the father of Ramein, having recovered his self-possession, drew out a sort of poignard called a badie-badi, which he wore about him, and plunged it into the tiger's side. On receiving this wound the animal let go his prey, and was about to retreat, but Ramein's father attacked him again, and wounded him a second time. The tiger now turned upon his new assailant; but fortunately another man, Mallang, the brother of Ramein, came up and struck the infuriated beast a blow with his gollok. The tiger now reared himself on his hind legs, and endeavoured to attack Mallang with his claws, and succeeded in wounding him on the legs. Both father and son now attacked the tiger, and, fortunately, soon succeeded in killing him. Ramein has been very seriously wounded in the conflict, but hopes are entertained of his recovery. The tiger was very old, and of unusually large dimensions, measuring 6 feet 10 inches along the back, exclusive of the tail. A female tiger, of similar dimensions, has been seen in the same neighbourhood."

VOLCANO.—A volcano of a novel kind has broken out in the neighbourhood of Kemeghatte, in Silesia. For twenty years a slow fire, which occasioned no alarm, has burnt in the coal-mines of that district; but recently it has shot out immense volumes of flames, which threaten destruction to the surrounding buildings, and to the vast forests of the country. A steam-engine has been established for the purpose of discharging water into the mines; but this machine had been in action at the last accounts for 72 hours without producing any effect.

FORGERIES IN TURKEY.—We have received letters from Constantinople by the way of Odessa, which confirm the accounts formerly given of great forgeries. The Turkish government has just issued new assignats, in consequence of those before in circulation being too easily imitated. A great number of fraudulent money dealers and forgers have been arrested, and it is found that they have numerous associates in foreign countries particularly in Greece. They have already put into circulation 1,000,000 piasters in false bank notes, and some millions of paras, which are most skilfully imitated. A strict investigation is going on, and some persons of great consideration are said to be implicated in the fraud.

The Hampshire Independent contains an account of the following singular circumstance. The Camilla, on her last trip from France to Jersey, brought over a party of French ladies and gentlemen; amongst them was a Catholic priest of twenty-five years' standing, who had been smitten with a young lady of his own country, of the Protestant faith, whose parents were not inimical to the match, provided the priest would renounce his religion, and adopt the faith the young lady was brought up in. To this he ultimately acceded, and in company with his intended father-in-law, his future bride, and a party of friends, he embarked on board the Camilla, on Thursday week. They were united in the holy bands of matrimony the next morning, by his reverence the Dean, at the parish church of St. Helier's.

THIEVES IN THE THAMES TUNNEL.—On Tuesday afternoon two thieves were apprehended in the Thames Tunnel, while picking pockets, and several others have been already committed by the magistrates for attempting to rob the visitors. The Tunnel continues to be visited by thousands daily.

As it has been said, truly, that there is no pleasure without some alloy so is the axiom verified in reference to the proprietors of the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS, whose natural and sincere gratification and gratitude at the brilliant success of their design, and the loud public approval with which it has been crowned, is at last, in some measure, marred by a drawback, which is nevertheless a source of pride in itself—and certainly a peculiar and unprecedented honour in the history of newspaper literature. It is sorely a new complaint, that public demand for any periodical should exceed the means of supply with commensurate rapidity—and baffle the most active energies and spirited enterprise to keep pace with the patronage so pleasingly created. Yet so it is with the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS; and "increase of appetite" has so grown by what it fed on that at last it is found—in the present state of printing machinery, and with the most perfect practical machine for art-printing in England—impossible

POSTSCRIPT.

Friday Evening.

The Queen and Prince Albert walked on Thursday morning in the royal gardens. In the afternoon her Majesty and his Royal Highness took an airing in an open carriage and four.

THE DUKE OF SUSSEX.—His Royal Highness passed a tolerable night on Wednesday, and was a little better on Thursday morning.

A confirmation of the juvenile nobility and gentry was held on Thursday (Maundy Thursday) in the chapel-royal, St. James's.

The Bishop of London intends consecrating the new church of St. Paul, Wilton-crescent, Knightsbridge, Monday, the 1. The Rev. W. J. Hardy Bennett, M.A., has been appointed by his lordship to the incumbency.

Herr Staudigl, the celebrated bass singer, has arrived in London, and will make his first appearance next week, at Covent Garden Theatre, in an English opera.

LAUNCH OF A STEAM FRIGATE.—On Thursday, about an hour before high water, at half-past ten o'clock, the steam frigate Mutine was launched from the slips at the new dockyard, Sheerness, into the waters of the Medway. This vessel is built on the principle of the invention of Mr. Smith, the patentee of the screw propeller, and will be immediately fitted with the said boilers and engines, and the necessary apparatus for working the screw.—[We shall next week give a spirited engraving of the launch, our artist having attended for that purpose.]

THE THAMES TUNNEL.—This being Good Friday, an immense concourse of well-dressed persons visited the tunnel in the morning. About eleven o'clock, the numbers increased so rapidly, that it was supposed by the officers belonging to the company to check the progress of the crowd, many of whom passed without paying. A compulsive list ensued, when it was deemed advisable to send to the Mint, Point, Station-house for the assistance of the police. It was calculated that no less than 10,000 persons had passed through up to half-past 12 o'clock.

COURT OF BANKRUPTCY, Thursday.—Lord Huntingtower appeared before his Honour to-day to receive the official signature to his certificate; and having complied with the ordinary forms of the act of parliament, the usual process was carried out. His certificate is still in existence, and it is understood that the certificate will be inoperative till the question at present pending before the Court of Review is decided.

FOREIGN.

FRANCE.—We have received the Paris journals of Wednesday, but their contents are without interest.

SPAIN. Some of the Madrid papers of the 8th instant mention a report that the Cortes intend to declare Don FRANCIS DE PAULO incapable, by reason of his rank as a prince of the blood, of sitting in the Chamber of Deputies. It may be matter of regret that Don FRANCIS should have consented to become the instrument of a faction, but it would be still more to the honour of the Cortes to violate in his person one of the greatest rights imparted by the Constitution. It would be much wiser to allow the prince to take his natural place, and learn by experience, which he would soon do, how much he is misplaced in the representative body. His voluntary retirement would be the result.

METROPOLITAN NEWS.

THE NELSON MONUMENT.—Admiral Sir Robert Stopford, the Governor of Greenwich Hospital, has cordially consented to allow a number of veterans from that establishment to attend the ceremony of placing the statute of NELSON upon the column in Trafalgar square, "because he is sure it will be as gratifying to the feelings of the men themselves as interesting to the assembled spectators." The gallant Admiral also promises "to furnish the committee with the number of the present inmates of the hospital who fought under the great naval hero, either in the glorious battle of Trafalgar or other of his naval victories, and whose present state of health will enable them to attend."

BANQUET AT THE MANSION-HOUSE.—The Lord Mayor, in the exercise of that hospitality which seems to distinguish the present civic dynasty, gave on Wednesday night a splendid entertainment to a distinguished circle of guests, including many of the members of the late ministry. The Egyptian Hall was the scene of festivity, and, as usual upon such occasions, was splendidly lighted up and decorated. The display of plate was gorgeous in the extreme. The company numbered about 150. After proposing the usual loyal toasts, the Lord Mayor said that the was not a political meeting, and he did not intend to introduce political toasts. He would, however, propose the health of her Majesty's ministers. They all knew that a country could not be governed without ministers (cheers and laughter); and they knew, moreover, that her Majesty called to her councils men who she thought could at that moment govern the country. Under those circumstances, then, he thought that no one could possibly object to drinking the toast. (Cheers.) The toast having been duly honoured, the Lord Mayor next proposed the health of Lord Melbourne, and the Marquis of Lansdowne and the House of Lords. The Lord Mayor said that the next toast was the health of a noble lord to whom the country owed much. It was that of his noble friend Lord John Russell. (Loud and prolonged cheering.) He was sure this day that no man was so one of the late ministry; but as one of the representatives of the large constituency in the kingdom. In that latter capacity he would propose his health, and he could assure him—and he was sure the citizens of London would assure him—that they looked to him not only for the preservation of the rights and privileges of the City of London, but also for the upholding of those blessings throughout the kingdom. (Cheers.) The health of Lord John Russell returned thanks, and concluded by proposing the health of the Lady Mayoress. The Lord Mayor next proposed the health of Lord Palmerston and those of the House of Commons, for whom he returned thanks. The Lord Mayor and that the next toast was the health of a noble lord to whom the country owed much. It was that of his noble friend Lord John Russell. (Loud and prolonged cheering.) He was sure this day that no man was so one of the late ministry; but as one of the representatives of the large constituency in the kingdom. In that latter capacity he would propose his health, and he could assure him—and he was sure the citizens of London would assure him—that they looked to him not only for the preservation of the rights and privileges of the City of London, but also for the upholding of those blessings throughout the kingdom. (Cheers.) The health of Lord John Russell returned thanks, and concluded by proposing the health of the Lady Mayoress. The Lord Mayor next proposed the health of Lord Palmerston and those of the House of Commons, for whom the former open air, and all its deleterious influences. The Van Eyck seems to have been protected, and to owe its freshness to some process of this kind.

The "discovery"—or rather we should say the improved re-discovery—of oil painting, of which this remarkable picture stands as one of the principal monuments, consisted, says Vasari, in his "Lives of Most Excellent Painters," and published in Florence, 1550, in "nothing more than this—according to the ancient practice, a fresh colour was never added to the panel until the first covering had been dried in the sun; a mode infinitely tedious, and one in which the colours could never perfectly harmonize. Van Eyck saw this difficulty, and he became more truly sensible of it from the circumstance of having exposed one of his paintings to the sun in order to harden, when the excess of heat split the panel. Being at that period sufficiently skilled in philosophical inquiries, he began to speculate on the manner of applying oils, and of their acquiring a proper consistency without the aid of the sun. By uniting it with other mixtures he next produced a varnish, which, dried, was waterproof, and gave a clearness and brilliancy while it added to the harmony of his colours." The oils used by him are said to have been "linseed and nut oils, boiled." "Before the time of Van Eyck," says Lanzi, "some sort of painting in oil was known, but so extremely tedious and imperfect as to be scarcely applicable to the production of figure pieces. It was practised beyond the Alps," and, we may add, by the Egyptians of the Greek period, of which a most remarkable specimen may be seen in the Louvre; "but it is not known to have been in use in Italy." Giovanni carried the first discovery to its completion; he perfected the art, which was afterwards diffused over all Europe, and introduced into Italy by Antonello da Messina.

DIVING AT BLACKWALL.

The attempt to recover the body of Mr. Busfield was renewed on Saturday morning last, at ebb tide, by a large number of watermen, who successively dragged all those points of the river where the current sets in strongest from Blackwall to Bugeby's-hole. The offer made on Friday by Mr. Knight, the chief superintendent of the East India Dock Company, to allow the use of their diving apparatus for the purpose of examining the mooring-chains which cross the river in several places near Blackwall, was gladly accepted by the relatives of the deceased, and the barge containing the necessary machinery was brought round from the West India Dock basin, and moored off the pier before seven o'clock on Saturday morning. The helmet diving apparatus, invented by Deane, and successfully employed at Spithead and other places, was considered more suitable for the purpose than the diving-bell; and Thomas Jones, an experienced diver, in the service of the East and West India Dock Company, was selected to perform the arduous task. The weather was very unfavourable for the attempt, the wind blowing strong from the south-west, and causing a heavy swell in the reach. Before nine o'clock, however, everything was in readiness for the first descent. Jones having adjusted the helmet and enveloped himself in a waterproof dress, descended the ladder to make an examination of the piles near the western end, among which it was considered very probable that the deceased might have been entangled. After remaining under water more than half an hour, Jones returned to the surface, and reported that he had carefully examined along the whole range of piles, and could discover nothing of the body.

The novelty of the machinery, and the melancholy occasion of its employment, contributed to attract an immense number of persons to the spot; but one feeling of regret at the unfortunate occurrence appeared to animate every breast, and the most perfect order prevailed. The barge having been made fast to the buoy, Jones prepared to descend once more. The usual weight of his dress was considerably increased, in order to counteract the effect of the current, which sets in strongly against the pier at all times of the tide. The leaden weights suspended to various parts of his person amounted to nearly a hundred and a half weight; but even this was barely sufficient to carry him safely through the current. Jones remained under water for a great length of time, and eventually walked from the northern buoy to the Essex shore, along the line of chain: his researches, however, were unfortunately of no avail.

It will be recollected that when a young female, a domestic servant in the Duke of Buccleuch's family, lost her life by falling from the same pier in landing out of a Scotch steamer, her body remained under water for six weeks, and was eventually brought to the surface by one of the ballast-lighters.

Since Sunday every exertion has been made to discover the body. On Tuesday morning, as soon as it was low water, Jones recommenced his labour, and continued with but little intermission until the tide turned, examining the various holes and bed of the river. At high water he was compelled to abandon his exertions; but as soon as the tide turned he re-descended, when he proceeded to the buoys on the Essex shore, without meeting the object of his search. At each time he rose a piece of ordnance which was placed on a barge moored opposite the pier was fired eight or ten times, it being anticipated that the vibration would cause the body to float, provided it was not entangled. The diving and firing continued up to near 5 o'clock, when further attempts were abandoned. During the whole of these melancholy proceedings an innumerable number of boats were rowing about in all directions, for the purpose of picking up the body if it should float. The failure of these experiments leads to the supposition that the remains of the deceased gentleman are carried beyond the lower reaches.

POPULAR PORTRAITS.—No. XXXVII.

HOWARD ELPHINSTONE, Esq., M.P.

There is another accession to the ranks of the Anti-Corn-law League in the person of Howard Elphinstone, Esq., the member for the borough of Lewes. From his entrance into Parliament he has been known as a free-trader; but it is not every one holding, in his station, those opinions, who joins openly in the operations of the League itself. They agree in the object to be attained, but differ as to the means of attaining it. Mr. Elphinstone concurs both in means and object, and has embarked thoroughly in the cause. At the Drury Lane meeting on Wednesday evening last he was one of the principal speakers. It has been said that the study of the law generally induces a preference for the forms and usages of the past, and a repugnance to change which throws many of our greatest lawyers into the ranks of the Conservative party. Mr. Elphinstone appears to be an exception; he is a doctor of civil law, and practices as an advocate at Doctors' Commons. He is therefore immersed in the intricacies of our ecclesiastical courts and their forms of procedure, which partake more of the spirit of the past than any part of our legal system, and yet he is a supporter, in his political capacity, of many things which the admirer of old things—the laudator temporis acti—would shrink from in fear and terror; in the house Mr., or rather Dr., Elphinstone votes for the ballot, short Parliaments, extension of the suffrage, and (as evinced by his last speech) the repeal of the Corn-laws, and free trade in its fullest signification. Dr. Lushington, who is a judge in the same courts, is also well known as a Liberal in politics.

Dr. Elphinstone is the descendant of a house that has given the country warriors both by sea and land: his grandfather was the Admiral Elphinstone who defeated the Turkish fleet at the battle of Tchesmè; he is the son of Major-General Sir Howard Elphinstone. In addition to his professional rank as an advocate, he is a magistrate and deputy-lieutenant for the county of Sussex. He was first returned to Parliament for the borough of Hastings, in 1835, and represented it till 1837; in that year he contested Liverpool, but unsuccessfully; he first sat for Lewes in 1841.

CHRIST'S HOSPITAL.—We understand that those gentlemen who have engaged to act as stewards on the ensuing anniversary (23rd October) of the birthday of King Edward VI. have made application to the governors for permission to have its celebration held on this occasion in the large hall, in order to afford to those persons who have received the liberal advantages of this excellent institute the opportunity of testifying their gratitude, and cordially acknowledging the munificent favours which royalty has recently so bounteously bestowed upon that foundation. The governors having, on a previous occasion, kindly granted the use of the hall for the benefit of another charity, but which had no immediate connection with their own, we may confidently anticipate that this request, preferred as it is upon such laudable motives, will be most willingly acceded to.

MONUMENT TO THE LATE LIEUT.-GEN. SIR LIONEL SMITH.

This distinguished officer was the son of Benjamin Smith, of Lyn, in Hampshire. He was born on the 8th of October, 1778, and educated at Winchester. At the age of sixteen he was appointed, without purchase, to an ensigncy in the 24th Foot, then in Canada, and obtained a lieutenancy in the same corps in the October of that year. While in America Lieut. Smith attracted the notice of her present Majesty's father, the Duke of Kent, to whom he was much indebted in after life for promotion. He served for some time in America, and was thence ordered to the western coast of Africa, to quell a serious insurrection that had broken out among the blacks at Goree and Sierra Leone. Here he remained for two or three years. In the month of May, 1801, he obtained his company in the 85th Regiment, and in the following year succeeded to a majority in that corps, from which he was removed to the 16th Foot. He then proceeded again across the Atlantic, and served under Sir C. Green, at Surinam, and was also present at the capture of Essequibo, Berbice, and the other possessions in the West Indies which at that time fell into our hands. In June, 1805, he was appointed Lieut.-Colonel in the Nova Scotia Fencibles, and subsequently served with the 18th at Jamaica, of which regiment he was one of the few surviving officers. In November, 1806, he removed to the 65th Foot, then at Bombay, and for upwards of twenty-two years he remained in India. In 1809 he commanded an expedition to the Gulf of Persia against the pirates, and rendered important services to the Sultan of Muscat, whose territories he may be said to have preserved. His general services in India were honourably noticed by the Marquis of Hastings, then Governor-General, whose friendship and esteem he quickly acquired.

In 1810 he commanded the 65th at the taking of Mauritius, and after its capitulation returned with his regiment to Bombay. In June, 1812, he obtained the brevet of colonel in the army, and at the capture of Poonah commanded the fourth division of the army of the Deccan. He was also present at the cavalry action at Ashta, where he received a dangerous and severe sabre-cut on the head. In August, 1819, he was advanced to the rank of major-general; and on the 3rd of December, 1822, George IV. nominated him Knight Commander of the Bath. Previous to his returning to England, his European and native friends in Bombay presented him with a service of plate, and a splendid sword, at the cost of £800. He was beloved by his regiment, as well as by the Sepoys or native troops, for his humane exertions for their comfort, and he will long be remembered in India as "the soldier's and the poor man's friend." While in England he was appointed to the colonelcy of the 95th Foot, and shortly afterwards proceeded to Barbadoes as Governor and Commander-in-Chief of the Windward and Leeward Islands. Two years afterwards, on the death of Sir G. Barnes, the colonelcy of the 78th Foot became vacant, and Sir L. Smith took command of that regiment. In August, 1836, Sir L. Smith succeeded the Marquis of Sligo as Governor and Commander-in-Chief of the Island of Jamaica, where he remained upwards of three years, and was most zealous in all measures for the extinction of slavery in that important colony. He obtained the rank of lieut.-general in January, 1837, and at the coronation of her Majesty was created a baronet. In September, 1840, from political motives, he was relieved from the government of Jamaica, and offered the government of Mauritius.

His departure from Jamaica was felt as a public calamity; the people displaying banners inscribed "Sir Lionel Smith, the poor man's protector and friend," "We mourn the departure of our governor," &c., and nearly the whole of the population wore mourning on the occasion. So extensive were his charities, that a few months before his departure from Jamaica their amount exceeded a thousand pounds. A subscription was raised for presenting him with a piece of plate, when the poorest negro came from the most distant parts of the island to contribute to the fund, which amounted to a thousand pounds. Sir Lionel, however, gave the money towards the erection of a place of worship. In April, 1840, he proceeded to the Mauritius; he was next created a Knight Grand Cross of the Bath; but his administration here extended only to seventeen months. He died at Reduit (the governor's country residence) on the 2nd of January, 1842, aged sixty-three. The colony of Mauritius immediately voted the sum of a thousand pounds for the erection of a monument to his memory, to be placed over his tomb in the burial-ground of Port Louis. Sir Richard Westmacott, F.R.S., is about to execute this work for the colony from the accompanying design.

Sir Lionel Smith was twice married. His first wife (the daughter of Thomas Galway, Esq., by whom he had two daughters) died in 1814, while he was serving in India. He married secondly, in 1819, Isabella Curwen, youngest daughter of Eldred Curwen Pottinger, Esq., and sister of Sir Henry Pottinger, Bart., her Majesty's plenipotentiary in China. Lady Smith survived Sir Lionel but three days. By her he left three daughters and one son (Lionel Eldred), the present baronet, who was born in 1833.

THE BELISARIUS OF GERARD.—(FROM THE LOUVRE.)

The story of Belisarius has acquired, from its operatic celebrity, no small degree of interest in the public mind; and in the progress of criticism upon the recent impersonation of the ancient general by Fornasari at Her Majesty's Theatre, it has been remarked that the finished actor's deportment and personnel were remindful of the famous picture in the Louvre, wherein Gerard, the painter, endeavoured to work out the force and beauty of the ancient tradition. We have been induced to have the famous Louvre painting, in which the subject is treated in the same spirit as upon the Italian stage, copied and engraved for the gratification of our readers; and, accordingly, here, gentle patrons, you may regard in his blind majesty the war-worn hero of Marmontel.

WORDSWORTH—THE NEW POET LAUREATE.

We lately recorded the melancholy death of Southey, and Wordsworth now seems his natural successor to the Laureateship. He has received, or rather been prevailed upon to accept, the appointment; and that it should have been pressed upon him, was as creditable to the minister who held the patronage, as was his own humility to the modest poet himself. Here, reader, is his likeness; but you may better commune with his works: they breathe a beautiful atmosphere of genuine poetry—they are flooded with the glory of nature—they are chastened, almost hallowed, by gentleness of heart. We could really lament that the laureateship should not have fallen to the destiny of Wordsworth at an earlier period of his life, in the very freshness of his muse, and when his own laurels grew most green. Surely he would have deemed it his duty not to let his vocation sleep. Those stirring events—the coronation—the marriage—the motherhood of our young Queen—the christening of her lovely children—above all, the birth of a Prince of Wales—would surely not have gone unsung! We should have had some national poetry from a worthy muse in celebration of honoured themes; and even now we are not without a lingering hope, that the lyre of the laureate may be awakened into stirring harmonies again! Let Wordsworth give us some offerings in honour of his new station, even if they be confined within the sweet circle of the sonnet—such sonnet as he could so gloriously celebrate and so exquisitely write. Who does not remember this fine confirmation of his power in that walk of poetic inspiration?

> Scorn not the Sonnet: Critic! you have frowned
> Mindless of its just honours; with this key
> Shakspeare unlocked his heart; the melody
> Of this small lute gave ease to Petrarch's wound.
> A thousand times this pipe did Tasso sound;
> Camoens soothed with it an exile's grief;
> The Sonnet glittered a gay myrtle-leaf
> Amid the cypress with which Dante crowned
> His visionary brow; a glow worm lamp,
> It cheered mild Spenser, called from Fairy-land
> To struggle through dark ways; and when a damp
> Fell round the path of Milton, in his hand
> The thing became a trumpet, whence he blew
> Soul-animating strains—alas! too few!

NATIONAL EDUCATION.—The following are the resolutions laid on the table of the House of Commons by Lord John Russell on Monday night, and which are to be taken into consideration immediately after the Easter recess:—1. That in any bill for the promotion of education in Great Britain, by which a board shall be authorised to levy, or cause to be levied, parochial rates, for the erection and maintenance of schools, provision ought to be made for an adequate representation of the rate-payers of the parish in such board. 2. That the chairman of such board ought to be elected by the board itself. 3. That the Holy Scriptures, in the authorised version, should be taught in all schools established by any such board. 4. That special provision should be made for cases in which Roman Catholic parents may object to the instruction of their children in the Holy Scriptures in such schools. 5. That no other books of religious instruction should be used in such schools unless with the sanction of the Archbishops of Canterbury and York, and the concurrence of the Committee of Privy Council for Education. 6. That, in order to prevent the disqualification of competent schoolmasters on religious grounds, the books of religious schools should be taught apart, by the clergyman of the instruction, other than the Holy Bible, introduced into the parish, or some person appointed by him, to the children of parents who belong to the Established Church, or who may be desirous that their children should be so instructed. 7. That all children taught in such schools should have free liberty to resort to any Sunday-school, or any place of religious worship, which their parents may approve. 8. That any school connected with the National School Society, or the British and Foreign School Society, any Protestant Dissenters' school, and any Roman Catholic school, which shall be found, upon inspection, to be efficiently conducted should be entitled by license from the Privy Council, to grant certificates of school attendance, for the purpose of employment in factories of children and young persons. 9. That, in the opinion of the House, the committee of Privy Council for Education ought to be furnished with means to enable them to establish and maintain a sufficient number of training and model schools in Great Britain. 10. That the said committee ought likewise to be enabled to grant gratuities to deserving schoolmasters, and to afford such aid to schools established by voluntary contribution as may tend to the more complete instruction of the people in religious and secular knowledge, while at the same time the rights of conscience may be respected.

MUSIC.

SACRED HARMONIC SOCIETY.—Rarely has Exeter Hall been so crowded as it was on Wednesday night. It was generally rumoured that Miss Clara Novello would have been called to account for her conduct at the previous concert on Friday. As this matter has been so much canvassed, it will be necessary to state the events of that memorable evening. Miss C. Novello, after singing the air "How beautiful are the feet," was encored; she, instead of graciously complying with the compliment, cast contemptuous glances at the company, and angrily exclaimed to the band, "It is of no use playing, for I do not intend to sing it again." The audience resented the scornful look of the vocalist by a burst of disapprobation seldom heard within the Exeter Hall walls; and when Mr. Phillips came forward to sing in the midst of the hurricane "Why do the nations so furiously rage together, and why do the people imagine a vain thing," the cheering was loud and long continued, the application of the words to the singer who had walked out of the orchestra after the "beautiful feet" being taken up with evident delight. Mr. Harrison, the chairman of the society, prior to Miss C. Novello's re-appearance in the last part, found it necessary to apologize for her disobedience of the encore on the ground of indisposition. But the speech did not satisfy the amateurs, for when Miss Novello rose to sing the air "I know that my Redeemer liveth," the sibillation was renewed, and much risibility was excited by some Hibernian exclaiming, "It is your temper, my darling!" Such was Friday's occurrence. It became the talk of the whole town, and a scene, on Wednesday's repetition of the "Messiah," was confidently predicted. Just before the overture Miss Clara Novello entered the orchestra with Mrs. A. Shaw—a very prudent arrangement, which saved the expression of feeling, for the respect entertained for the latter stopped the outbreak. When Miss Novello began her first recitative there was solemn silence. She was firm and collected, and sang with wonderful power. It was evident that she was trying her utmost, and at the close there was a moment of doubt, but it was dispelled by the involuntary admiration excited by her fine vocalization, and a burst of applause then followed. The lady smiled, and smiled, and was clearly angling for an encore, but the harmonists were not reconciled, although propitiated. In the "Rejoice greatly" the uneasiness of the singer became more apparent by unsteady execution of the runs; and when there was no call for its rehearing Miss C. Novello, after looking Italian stilettoes at Mrs. A. Shaw, suddenly quitted the orchestra before the latter began to sing. He shall feed his flock," as if such an impulse of loving tenderness was opposed to the approbation bestowed on the superb contralto of Mrs. Shaw. And here the temper of the audience was not to be mistaken. Mrs. Shaw sang flatly, and by no means in her usually pure style, but the encore was tremendous, and palpably directed at the singer without

CENTRAL CRIMINAL COURT.

OLD COURT
(Before the Recorder.)

TUESDAY.—Charles Abraham Bennett, a surgeon, who was convicted on Thursday last, before Mr. Justice Creswell, of assaulting Thomas Thompson, was brought up to receive the judgment of the court. The Recorder told the prisoner that he had been indicted for a most brutal assault. He had thrust out the eye of the prosecutor with a fork. The jury, under the circumstances that were produced in evidence before them, had thought fit to convict him of an assault only; and the learned judge who tried him had instructed him (the Recorder), upon that conviction, to sentence him to be kept to hard labour for six calendar months. The court then adjourned until Monday, May 8.

NEW COURT.
(Before the Common Sergeant.)

MONDAY.—Stealing THE "ILLUSTRATED NEWS."—William Gunn, a youth, was indicted for stealing, on the 15th of March last, at the parish of St. Dunstan in the West, in the city of London, 135 papers, value £2 13s. 9d., the property of the proprietors of the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.—Mr. Clarkson appeared for the prosecution, and Mr. Payne for the prisoner.—Mr. Clarkson said he had the honour to appear on behalf of the proprietors of the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS, a weekly paper, which, although not long established, had a very extensive circulation. The case was a short one. The prisoner was a servant in the establishment, and it was his duty to return safely from the printers' to the office, in the Strand, with the copies of the papers intrusted to his care; this, he should show by the witnesses, he had not done. The prosecutors had no wish to press the case severely, but it was necessary to make an example of the prisoner, as a warning to the numerous persons in the employment of the prosecutors.—William Daniel Stevens: I am a warehouseman in the employ of Messrs. Palmer and Clayton, of No. 10, Crane-court, Fleet-street, printers of the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS. On Saturday, the 18th March, about eleven o'clock in the forenoon, the prisoner came to the printing office for the purpose of carrying as many copies of that work as had been struck off to the publishing office. I gave him nine quires, with a delivery ticket for that number. About twelve o'clock the same day he returned for a further quantity (the delivery ticket having been returned in the interim, duly signed by the publisher), and I then delivered to him five quires more, with a delivery ticket for that number, which ought in the due course of business to have been returned the same afternoon, signed by the publisher; it did not, however, come to hand; it was numbered twenty seven.—By Mr. Payne: Although not a general practice, papers were sometimes sent without a ticket; such, however, was not the case on the occasion referred to.—Mr. Winnard Little: I reside at No. 198, Strand. I am the publisher of the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS. The prisoner was in the service of the proprietors of that paper. On Saturday, the 18th March, he was employed to bring copies of that publication from the printers' to the office. About half-past eleven he brought nine quires, together with a delivery-ticket, which I signed as a receipt. The prisoner did not bring any other copies to the office on that day, and was absent the whole of the afternoon. The prisoner had no authority whatever to sell any copies of the paper, and the 135 copies given to him by the last witness were not delivered by him to me on that day. They were worth £2 13s. 9d., and belonged to the proprietors. By Mr. Payne: There are an immense number brought to me from the printing-office, and I will not swear positively that the prisoner did not bring me any beyond the nine quires, but to the best of my belief he did not. Re-examined by Mr. Clarkson: He did not return to the office again.—Samuel Wilson: I am a cressman in the employ of Mr. John Whitaker Ludlow, Union Leathwait, of No. 1, Pope's-head-alley, Cornhill. Between four and five o'clock on the afternoon named in the indictment the prisoner came to my master's shop and asked if we wanted any "LONDON NEWS;" I replied we would take all he had got, and he sold me forty-seven copies, for which I paid 18s. 9d. I asked him who he came from, when he replied from Mr. Little, the publisher: I said it was very strange that he (Mr. Little) should send the papers when our boy had been waiting at his office several hours, and could not get them. The prisoner said he could not help that, Mr. Little had sent him out with them, and, if I did not like to have them, I could leave them.—By Mr. Payne: I have no doubt whatever of the prisoner being the person to whom I gave the money. Thomas Sawyer: I am in the service of my father, who lives at No. 8, Pope's head-alley, Cornhill; he is a news agent. On the afternoon of the 18th March the prisoner came into my father's shop and asked if we wanted any "LONDON NEWS," and I purchased two quires of that paper, for which I paid £1 1s. 6d.—Mr. Payne made a very able defence, but the case was of too clear a nature to admit of any doubt of the guilt of the prisoner who was found "Guilty."—Mr. Payne preferred a recommendation to the mercy of the court.—The Common Sergeant sentenced the prisoner to seven months' imprisonment with hard labour.

TUESDAY.—WORKING THE TELEGRAPH.—Samuel Crouch, a hairdresser, was indicted for stealing, on the 11th of March, a set of harness, value 50s., the property of Mr. Charles M'Cann. Several witnesses were called on behalf of the prisoner, to prove an alibi, and also to give him a character; but, during the examination, it was observed that they cast their eyes up to the gallery of the court, when it was discovered that a young man was stationed there to "telegraph" the witnesses by motions with his hands what to say, in order that they might agree in their stories. The offender was brought down, and committed for contempt of court, and two of the witnesses were also taken into custody. The jury found the prisoner guilty. It was then found that the prisoner was the same person who had been convicted in the year 1825 of stealing in a dwelling house, and was sentenced to be hanged, but the punishment was afterwards commuted to transportation for a limited term, and the prisoner had returned to England many years since. The prisoner was then sentenced to transportation for fourteen years. The other prisoners committed during the trial were held to bail to answer any indictment that might be preferred against them.

SURREY SESSIONS.

(Before Mr. Puckle and a Bench of Magistrates.)

TUESDAY.—Charles Louis de Bourbon, commonly called the Duke of Normandy, against whom articles of the peace were exhibited at the last sessions, and by Mr. Thomas Jackson, was placed at the bar. He was dressed in the same manner as he was at Union-hall, in a blue coat, with gold braiding on the collar, and a star on his left breast. He had a military cocked hat in his hand. It appeared that the defendant, unable to procure the required sureties, was committed in default to the county gaol, where he has remained ever since, and the purpose of bringing him before the Court that day was to ascertain if he was prepared with bail. The chairman having intimated to the defendant that he would be liberated on finding the required sureties, his reply was, that he had left the affair in the hands of his professional adviser, and he looked round the Court and inquired if Mr. Horrey, his counsel, was in attendance. It was here stated that the learned counsel was not present, upon which Mr. Chairman said he apprehended there would be very little difficulty in the case; all that was required was, that an additional person would become surety for £250 for the defendant, a gentleman having a ready offered to become bail to the amount of £250 which was accepted. Mr. Sweet, the defendant's solicitor, here offered himself as the other surety. Mr. Jackson, however, acting on the old adage of "not over particular," objected to the latter, saying that he had never seen the gentleman before, and that he was totally unaware whether he was a responsible person. The defendant in an energetic manner then declared that he was the victim of persecution; that his property had been divested of all its furniture by Mr. Jackson; and that his family were compelled actually to live upon straw for the want of other accommodation. The Court asked Mr. Jackson what sureties were the case? Mr. Jackson said that the houses occupied by the defendant and his family belonged to him, for which defendant paid no rent for a considerable time, and that the furniture was the property of the defendant and was indicated by him in a very large sum he certainly had taken possession of it under a bill of sale. The defendant was then sent back to gaol until he produced the required sureties.

Samuel Stone, an attorney's clerk, and Christopher Wardell, were indicted for feloniously stealing, on the 21st of July last, in Kingston-upon-Thames, five £5 Bank of England notes, 13 sovereigns, and upwards of £6 in silver and other moneys, the property of Andrew Dunlop, of the Dolphin Inn. It appeared that the accused, were two respectable young men who had been in Kingston on business on the day, or while the robbery took place, and that owing to the stupidity of the police, acting on the evidence of a little girl, they were placed in the painful and degrading position of felons. After a trial which lasted thirteen hours, the jury acquitted the prisoners to the great satisfaction of a crowded court; and we hear it is their intention to bring actions for false imprisonment.

POLICE.

MANSION-HOUSE.—Joseph B. Oliveira, the Portuguese, who was charged with having in his possession imitations of the stamps of the government of Portugal, was brought before Mr. Hall, the chief magistrate, by the officer, for re examination. Mr. Francis Ignatius Vasconcellar, consul for the government of Portugal in this country, was called as a witness by Mr. Bash. Upon comparison of a genuine bill with those which were found upon the prisoner, he found the resemblance was extremely great. He certainly would be deceived by the resemblance. The act under which he applied for the committal of the prisoner was the 1st William IV., cap. 66, section 19, by which it was enacted, that if any person should engrave, or in anywise make upon any plate whatever, or upon any wood, stone, or other material, any bill of exchange, promissory note, undertaking, or order for payment of money, or any part of any bill, or in whatever language expressed, or whether intended or not to be under the real purporting to be the document of any foreign power; or if any person should, without authority, use or have in his custody or possession any part of such foreign bill, &c., he should be guilty of felony, and be transported for a term not exceeding fourteen years.—Mr. Humphreys appeared for the prisoner, and contended that the instrument produced was nothing more than a piece of waste paper.—The Lord Mayor said he could not think of deciding upon any course in so important a case, except that of sending it to a jury. The prisoner had not attempted to assign a reason for causing to be made an imitation by which frauds to an enormous amount might be perpetrated. He should send the case to a jury, where it would meet with a thorough investigation before the legal authorities.—Mr. Deputy Lead—hall-street, and, on arriving at the Mansion-house, the defendant demanded his fare, and refused to carry her any further. The lady refused, and the fellow left the yard, after giving instructions to two other ruffians to annoy her in every possible manner.—The Lord Mayor said the case was a most nefarious one. Perhaps the defendant did not know the sort of punishment which it was in the power of the magistrate to inflict. It was the power of the magistrate to send a person guilty of such conduct for two months to hard labour at the treadmill, and the defendant might congratulate himself upon escaping such a punishment on such an occasion. The sentence upon him was that he should pay the sum of 40s. and costs. As for the lady who had been so much insulted, the public were deeply indebted to her for having, in so spirited a manner, done her best to bring the offenders to the Lord Mayor, we think he should have administered the severity of the law, which would have had a more salutary effect than if he preached for an hour. The fine was paid.

UNION-HALL.—Charles Green, a shoemaker, of Kent-street, and Mary Ann his wife, were brought before Mr. Cottingham, charged with stealing a gold watch, the property of Mr. Robert Johnson, of Green-street, Hyde-park. About three months ago, a box, containing some valuable jewellery, was stolen from the residence of Sir Richard Dobson, in Greenwich Hospital, and though every exertion was used on the part of the police to discover the thieves, they were unavailing. A few days, however, after the robbery, a portion of the box was found in the passage of an obscure house in Kent-street by the inmates, who, upon examining it, found in one corner a gold watch, a gold neck chain, and several other smaller articles of jewellery. The parties who made the discovery gave information of the circumstance at the station-house, and from subsequent inquiries it turned out that the box thus found formed a secret depository in the one which had been stolen from Sir Richard's house, and was left in the situation in which it was afterwards discovered by those who had access to the premises, supposing, no doubt, that it contained nothing of any value. The prisoners were taken into custody in consequence of having offered a gold chain for sale to a silversmith in Southwark, which was said to be a part of the property stolen, but there was no private mark on it by which Sir Richard or Lady Dobson could possibly identify it, although they had no doubt of it being theirs. Sir Richard Dobson mentioned an important fact, that the prisoner's mother, who was charwoman, had been at work at his residence in the College on or about the time the robbery was committed. The prisoners were remanded.

On Wednesday five casual paupers, all young men, were charged with destroying their clothes in St. Olave's Workhouse.—The porter of the workhouse stated that upwards of 100 persons applied for shelter the previous night, 73 of whom, and amongst them the defendants, were admitted, there being no room for more. That in the morning, owing to the dense smoke issuing from the ward in which the prisoners were, an entering he discovered that some of them had intentionally set fire to a quantity of straw given to them to lie upon the night before. Water having been obtained, the fire was soon extinguished; but it might have been attended with very serious consequences had it not been got under.—The magistrate committed the defendants for seven days each for destroying their clothes, and gave directions that a minute watch should be kept, and any attempt to set fire to the casual ward in the above workhouse on any future occasion.

WORSHIP-STREET.—James Charlwood, alias Flint, alias Sherwood, a stout rough-looking person, was charged with having a base-coined sovereign in his possession. He was brought in custody from Brighton, and placed at the bar before Mr. Bingham, the sitting magistrate, upon a charge of having stolen a pocket-book containing £115 in bank notes from the person of Charles Robert Rose, a coachmaker, living at No. 4, Hackney-road.—The prosecutor, who is rather elderly, and of eccentric and irregular habits, was stated to be the son of a country clergyman, and had received a handsome education. He formerly kept a Hackney road but kept a coffeehouse in Bishopsgate-street. The prisoner was a public-house acquaintance of his, and in the habit of calling familarly at his residence. From information received by the prosecutor, it appeared that on the 7th of March he received £150 in bank notes. The following evening when he went home he found the prisoner sitting in the parlour with his wife, and he then had in his possession the property which he missed in his waistcoat pocket. He sat down and fell asleep, the prisoner being still there, but some time afterwards his wife awoke him and he missed his pocket-book, and the prisoner was gone.—Henry Holmes, superintendent of the Brighton police, said that the prisoner was apprehended in that neighbourhood. The place at which he had been lodging having been searched, the superintendent went with a constable, well armed, to apprehend him, as he was understood to be of desperate character. As soon as the door was opened, he presented a pistol at the superintendent, but fortunately the pistol missed fire, and he was secured by the prisoner. He (Holmes) before whom he was taken, sent him to this court, to which he was accordingly brought, securely handcuffed and manacled.—The prisoner denied the charge against him.—Rowland, one of the summonary officers of the court, who had been employed in the search after the prisoner, informed the magistrate that one of the £5 notes, and, he believed, another note, had been traced, passed by a man who, from the above pious, was believed to be the prisoner.—Mr. Bingham remanded the prisoner for further evidence.

LAMBETH-STREET.—John Hodges, an officer of customs, was placed at the bar charged with stealing from the St. Katherine's Dock. Mr. Taylor, the superintendent of police in the dock, in reply to the question of Mr. Hall, said that the prisoner, though but a weigher of customs, had latterly acted as lecker, and by virtue of his office had access to the warehouses where the whole of the fruit in the dock was stored, and therefore had an opportunity of helping himself to the fruit coming under his care. Mr. Taylor further stated, that though the workmen in the dock were invariably searched when leaving their employment, persons in the prisoner's situation never were, and had not the officer's (Pope) suspicions been excited by seeing the prisoner in the part of the building in which he had no business, he might have got off. The prisoner, when asked what he had to say to the charge, replied "Nothing," but would rely on the mercy of the court. He (Hall) said his duty was to fix the bail at £25 each, and the prisoner was remanded for a week.

MARLBOROUGH-STREET.—Lieut Rurton, 89th Foot, was brought up in custody on a warrant charging him with intending to fight a duel. On Tuesday night a gentleman came to the court and made a communication, the result of which was the issuing of a warrant to compel the parties to find bail. On last Wednesday morning, as he was returning to his lodgings in St James's place, and afterwards placed in the station. The name of the other party did not transpire. On the defendant being brought before Mr Fitzpatrick asked him if he admitted that he was the person named in the warrant? Defendant: I do. Mr. Fitzpatrick: Are you provided with sureties to answer for your conduct? Defendant: I am. Mr. Fitzpatrick: Very bad! intended any breach of the peace by fighting a duel. Mr. Fitzpatrick: Information upon oath has been given that such was your intention. Defendant: No one can persuade you that my intention was such a matter than myself. Mr. Hardwick: I shall call upon you to enter into your own recognizance of £500, with two sureties in £250 each. Defendant: The affair in question was amicably arranged precisely on the terms of its occurrence. There can be no want of sureties in such a case. It's very absurd. Mr. Fitzpatrick: If you don't intend to fight, the sureties will stand without prejudice; they are only bound that you keep the peace and be of good behaviour towards her Majesty's subjects for a year. Mr. Roberts, of St. James's-street, and Mr. Spencer, of 3, St. James's place, having become bail, defendant was liberated.

CORONER'S INQUESTS.

SUDDEN DEATH OF AN ECCENTRIC CHARACTER.—On Tuesday an inquest was held by Mr. Wakley, M.P., at the Feathers Tavern, Warren-street, Fitzroy-square, on the body of John Banks, aged 90. On Thursday morning he was left home for Covent-garden market to purchase vegetables. On his return home, whilst crossing Soho-square, he was for the first time in his life suddenly attacked with illness, but he succeeded in getting and managed to walk home. On entering the place, he exclaimed, "I am struck with death." His daughter desired him to let her run for a doctor, but he peremptorily refused, saying he never had had occasion for one, and he never would. In five minutes after he was a corpse. The coroner and jury, on viewing the body, expressed their admiration of the symmetry of the deceased's person. Verdict, "Natural death."

SUICIDE OF A MANIAC.—On Tuesday an inquest was held, at Walton-on-Thames, on James Coqubour, a son of a respectable coachmaker, who cut his throat in the absence of his mother, who had gone to Godalming to attend her father's funeral. Verdict, "Lunacy."

THE FASHIONS.

Paris, Rue Chaussée d'Antin, April 11, 1843

Mon cher Monsieur, In proportion as winter recedes we see the appearance of bonnets of more delicate and fanciful colours. I mean that description of head-dress which is meant to relieve the head from the heavy winter hats which have so long oppressed them. Some of the head-dresses I speak of from the atelier of Alexandrine are surrounded with several bands, which have much lightness and which give to the face a shade of softness quite inconceivable to those who have not witnessed the effect of them. Their shape is slightly gathered, and is raised a little towards the bottom so as not to interfere with the fashion of wearing the hair. The little crêpe hats now worn with a very low plume have much to recommend them, and afford to the wearer a very distingué appearance. I believe you they are really a spring head-dress, and seem as if their destination were to glitter in an open carriage during those first fine days which give the tone and style to all our fashionable coquettes. I must again quote Alexandrine, whose general taste is a guarantee for everything which emanates from her, and who is now preparing for the season numerous patte de rix bonnets, which she will finish according to the requirements of every description of toilette, with that tasteful innovation and artistical feeling which we are permitted to dilate upon though we must not reveal it. The cashmere shawl is now giving way to the mantelet, which is something resembling, or rather between, the mantle and the pelisses worn by our mothers, it in fact resembles the trimmed mantle, forming a sort of scarf. There is one question how for certain dresses at the sides are likely to continue in fashion. It would appear to me they will still be worn, inasmuch as they afford a means for the display of greater taste and greater elegance on the part of the wearer than the long gown robe with which it skirts. We have nothing new to observe on the subject of sleeves or corsages. For evening dresses, or in half dress, short sleeves are still commonly worn. But I should imagine that of whatever sort the robe may be composed, a lady must trim her short sleeves according to her taste with a simple frisha, and must wear a little cap of tulle with gauze ribands. In one word, short sleeves are not a necessary in dress; they are a custom, and that is all that can be said for them. I think I may safely recommend the Turkish coiffures now worn of fishus or scarfs in Eastern tissues. It is difficult to find anything more elegant, more rich, or more distinguished than the turbans which are now worn. They, however, can hardly be called turbans—perhaps in strictness they have no right to be classed among them; they have a character which can never be confounded with those usually engendered in Paris an fancies. We trust, however, that next we shall have no occasion for any further reservations, and that we shall be able to speak upon our fashions with something like an air of certainty.

HENRIETTE DE B.

IRELAND

On Monday last a petition against the withdrawal of the manufacture of coaches from Ireland was exhibited by the operative coachmakers, signed by 35,000 inhabitants of Dublin. We understand it is intended for presentation to Parliament immediately after the Easter recess. Petitions have been also forwarded to Dublin for transmission from Thomastown, Kilkenny, Waterford, Slane, Dunleer, Drogheda, Navan, Limerick; and among the signatures we have been informed are the following:—The Countess of Carrick, Lady Langrishe, Lady Power (Kilfane), the Right Hon. Charles Kendal Bushe, the Archdeacon of Ossory, Sir John Power, Bart. (Kilfane).

On Thursday week an unfortunate man, named Kelly, died suddenly on his way from Dublin to Tuisk, in a state of intoxication. He was (says a provincial paper) one of the very few who have violated the teetotal pledge, and on that account was held in such disesteem by his friends and relatives that scarcely one was found to pay the last rites to his lifeless corpse.

CAPTAIN MANBY, F.R.S.

This philanthropic gentleman, who has laboured forty years for the humane end of saving life at sea (and whose celebrated mortar-line was engraved in our paper of the 29th ult.), was born at Downham-Market, in Norfolk, in 1765, and educated at the grammar-school of Lynn, afterwards at Bromley, in Middlesex, and then at the Royal Academy, Woolwich. He next joined the corps of Engineers, and was appointed to the situation of barrack-master at Yarmouth, on the Norfolk coast, in the year 1803. That coast, it is well known, is full of shoals, and many vessels have gone to pieces within a hundred yards of the shore, in sight of multitudes of persons, who had no chance of giving relief, for want of means to establish a communication, either by a boat or by a rope, with the object in danger. Captain Manby's attention was first fixed to the subject by the lamentable case of the Snipe gun-brig, when upwards of sixty persons were lost near the haven's mouth at Yarmouth, though not more than fifty yards from the shore, and this wholly owing to the impossibility of conveying a rope to their assistance. Captain Manby's efforts were crowned with success after several experiments, in affixing a cannon-shot to a rope, and projecting it from a piece of ordnance over a vessel stranded on a lee-shore; and by this means, in 1812, the captain had been instrumental to the preservation of ninety souls from drowning. The loss of a Swedish brig, and every soul on board, at Harborough, in the night of January 5th, 1809, and the unavailing attempts made to project a rope to the vessel by the means successfully used in the day, next led Captain Manby to extend assistance to ships wrecked even in the darkest nights. The requisite objects were—1. To devise the means of discovering precisely where the distressed vessel may be composition, which, when inflamed, displayed so splendid an illumination of the rope, that its flight could not be mistaken. Such are the most prominent features of Captain Manby's invention for the preservation of shipwrecked seamen. There were many minor points respecting the mode of bringing the sick on shore, of carrying a boat over a surf, to reach a stranded vessel without a bar, &c. Among these was a simple method of converting any common boat into a life-boat, at an expense of about £3, by merely lashing within the gunwale six or seven empty and air-tight casks, a plan that has been found so efficacious in giving buoyancy, that sailors who have tried it have no hesitation in putting to sea in such a boat with a hole bored through her bottom. The whole expense of Captain Manby's apparatus amounted but to about £10. Highly satisfactory experiments having been made with it at Woolwich, and reported to the Ordnance, Captain Manby was subsequently deemed worthy of a parliamentary reward. He had, however, no sooner completed his invention, and carried it into operation on the coast of Norfolk, than he prevailed upon the magistrates of the county to institute a "Society for the Relief of Shipwrecked Mariners," and specifically for providing them with requisite clothing and necessaries, besides assisting them to their homes; and we believe the captain induced other maritime counties to follow the example of Norfolk. Captain Manby has likewise contrived apparatus for the preservation of lives endangered by the breaking of ice; these are a rope, with a floating noose distended by whalebone, with a piece of wood or cork, to be easily grasped by the hands, when thrown to the person in danger. Another machine for saving persons in similar cases is a boat of wicker or wood, made buoyant by tin boxes enclosing air.

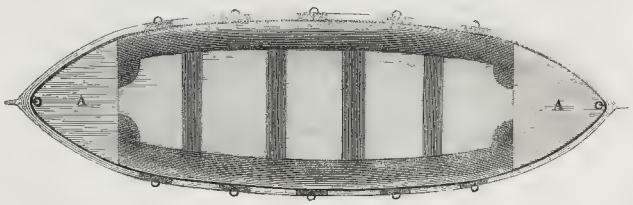
Captain Manby has long since resigned the situation of barrack-master of Great Yarmouth, but he still resides at South-town, in sight of the Nelson Pillar, near the spot "where the first life was saved from shipwreck by means of a rope attached to a shot fired from a mortar over the stranded vessel, on Feb. 12, 1808." The captain has also applied his ingenuity to an apparatus for rescuing persons from fire; and in these philanthropic pursuits he states that he has expended the whole of his property, and (with the exception of as much as purchased an annuity of £50 on his life) the whole of the sums liberally voted him by Parliament; yet he is repaid by having been the means of rescuing many hundreds of his fellow-creatures from death—so that, from the date of his invention to 1834 not a single life had been lost on the Norfolk coast. The originality of the captain's plan has, indeed, been questioned; but Lieut. Bell's scheme, with which Manby's has been confused, is to fire a rope from the ship to the shore, which is impossible in a gale of wind. The captain is likewise at issue with a committee of the Royal Humane Society of London, who refused to award him the Fothergill medal for his discoveries; and with a committee of the Society of Arts, for similar conduct: upon both these institutions the captain maintains that he has claims. The establishment of a fire-police was also long since proposed by this venerable benefactor to his kind, now almost an octogenarian. In middle life his talents took a topographic turn; when he wrote "The History and Antiquities of St. David's, South Wales;" "Sketches of Clifton;" and "A Guide from Clifton, through Monmouth, Glamorgan, and Brecknock." Still, the prime object of the captain's long and useful life has been the preservation of shipwrecked persons; and he is president of the British section of the Société Générale des Naufrages, established in Paris, in the interest of all nations, for saving lives and property from shipwreck.

In another part of the present paper will be found described an invention of kindred interest to those above-mentioned.

THE BRIGHTON LIFE-BOAT.

The appearance of a long list of disasters at sea in the Times of Thursday induces us to devote some space to the details of the following invention, which, it is hoped, may tend to prevent the frequent recurrence of these sad calamities.

We have been favoured by J. Johnston, of Brighton, the inventor of the cliff crane, engraved in our paper of the 25th ult., with the following description of a life-boat, also invented by him, and which he states has inspired much confidence on the part of the boatmen and mariners of Brighton, as well as of North-sea captains, who have inspected the principle of the invention. The length of the boat in the annexed engraving has been limited by the peculiar nature of the locality, where it is established, namely, a short and steep beach; and where, being liable to be called into operation upon sudden emergencies, arising out of the frequent casualties which happen among the boats there, a larger size would have been objectionable. But for general purposes, especially where there is the advantage of a harbour, an addition of five feet to the length (all other dimensions remaining the same) would doubtless be an improvement in the construction.



The following are the dimensions of the present boat:—

Extreme length	22 feet 6 inches.
Breadth of beam	6 feet 6 inches.
Depth in centre	2 feet 7 inches.

Built of the best half-inch elm plank, and copper-fastened throughout; built sharp at both ends, to row either way; the gunwales rising in a hollow curve, forming a sheer of two feet above the centre at either extremity. This is a principle of all others best calculated to ensure the boat's righting, in the event of its being turned over; the great buoyancy of the copper canisters at either extremity would so raise the hollow gunwales in the centre, that in the slightest roll the air would doubtless get under, and, of necessity, greatly facilitate its righting.

The sides are fitted with lockers 14 inches wide at the top, the surface sloping upwards from the thwarts to nearly the gunwale edge. This peculiar construction of the lockers prevents the deep gully which in most boats runs fore and aft through their whole length. The advantage of this construction is evident; if, for instance, the boat ships a sea over the gunwales, the water pours at once into the bottom, forming, as it were, additional ballast, instead of bearing down the side by the weight of water acting on the surface of the common lockers. The lockers are filled with horizontal layers of the best Faro-stone cork, requiring (in this instance) from 3½ to 4 cwt.

The cork sides continue to within three feet and a half of either end, each extremity of the boat being fitted with bulk-heads and decked, and enclosing air-tight copper canisters, carefully fitted to the whole space.

The boat rows with four oars, 16 feet long, if rowed single banc; and six oars, four of which are 13 feet long, if double banc. One long oar measuring 17 feet was originally provided for steering, but this has since been supplanted by a rudder (see sketch), to ship at either end, and which is found to answer better. Single tholes to be used with rope grummets have been found preferable to crutches or rollocks, as a means of securing the oars if momentarily abandoned. Each stem is fitted with cleets and rollers, to admit a hawser for kedging the boat, if necessary, through the surf. Two life-buoys as described in the course of the former article, already alluded to, are slung, one under each of the centre thwarts. Four leathern buckets for bailing, two of which are slung under each of the after thwarts, are also provided. Stuffed vendors protect the sides.

It has frequently occurred to the inventor that if all life-boats, according to the intended number of their crews, were provided with small lanyards about two fathoms long, having one end made fast to the boat and the other furnished with a body belt, made to buckle round the waist, such a provision would effect great additional protection to those who might be called upon to embark in a furious sea. If, for instance, without such a provision, the boat is upset or overwhelmed, how next to impossible it is for those who may be washed out of her to regain her; while, by thus being attached to the boat in a way which would involve no impediment whatever to all necessary exertion, they could scarcely fail to regain their hold of her under any circumstances.

PUNCH'S LETTERS TO HIS SON. By DOUGLAS JERROLD. Orr and Co.

These pungent and sarcastic essays on the habits and tendencies of social life have become so familiar to the great mass of readers, from their having appeared in a well-known periodical, that we are relieved from the necessity of examining them at length. Punch, in his present mood, is not so merry, but more biting, and also more instructive than he otherwise would be. Here he jingles his cap and bells with a solemn and judicial air, and handles his drum-stick as if it were the Chancellor's mace. Why not? Socrates could occasionally be a buffoon, and Punch has as good a right to be sometimes a philosopher. "A laugh there is," his motto tells us, "of contempt or indignation, as well as of mirth or jocosity." There is matter enough in this one volume for a man to laugh at till his sides crack; for if he were to laugh till doomsday, and to crow down Democritus himself, he would not have exhausted one tenth part of the vices and follies and absurdities of Punch's minions—men. To the man of slow brain, who was born on a leaden planet, and wishes to improve his composition by an admixture of more mercurial elements, we have no better recipe to offer than to bid him read, mark, digest, and inwardly perpend the satirical humours and mirthful wisdom of our sarcastic friend, and watch how he blows from his reflecting pipe the "bubbles of the day." Let Punch, for instance, instruct us in "Choosing a Profession," and let his worthy draughtsman, that first of pictorial satirists, Kenny Meadows, expound his precepts, and embody his conceptions. See how he displays before our eager sight the tempting baubles of ambition! The soldier's helmet, the clergyman's shovel hat, the judge's wig, the painter's pallet, the sword, the pen, the cross, the garter! A moving index to the book of life! Or let him show us "Death a Gentleman" in his true colours, and vindicate his slandered name and maligned reputation. Or strip the ermine and the tinsel from corruption, and exhibit "Justice giving Short Weight." Tell us how honour kicks the beam, and how the bandaged goddess is blind but of one eye, while the other is wide awake to its own interests, and laughingly eyes the suitor's hand oiling her reverted palm! Again, let him instruct us on the true uses of friendship, and expose the hollowness of your Damons and Pythiases. "How to use a friend" is the great secret of life, which is to be acquired only by the art of sucking oranges. The friend, we see, has much of the orange quality about him, and will evidently stand a bleeding. What next? Let the inquirer study the history of "Captain Kite and Master Pigeon," and fructify from the truthful tale. Are not these portraits, drawn from the life, and with no unskilled hand? Have we not seen them both many a day and oft, promenading in Pall Mall and St. James's-street? But again, see "the Solitary Drinker and his Genius," and study that awful chronicle of ruined hopes and blasted fortunes, and imagine the insidious tale of the imp at the toper's elbow. If this be not enough, get by heart this bit of philosophy, and then tell us whether Punch does not see into that hard millstone the human heart.

"Now Chaucer, in allusion to the devil, says of him, 'He hath in Jewe's heart his waspe's nest.' Now, what we call the devil has built, by the agency of his demon wasps—pride, avarice, scorn, oppression, selfishness, and others—thousands of nests in the hearts both of Jews and Christians. Well, suppose you have the power of looking into their hearts as though they were so many crystal hives; suppose you behold in them the rapacious insects, hear their buzzing, almost see their stings; if you cry, 'Wasps, wasps!' men will shake their heads at you for a malicious, evil-minded fellow; but, my dear boy! clasp your hands, and cry, 'What a honeycomb!' and you shall pass from mouth to mouth as the best of creatures."

CHAPTER VI.
CONNUBIAL FELICITY.

DURING the honeymoon all, of course, was rapture—ecstacy! Sir Arthur was in a transport of joy; he idolised Caroline—worshipped her: studied her every thought and tried to anticipate her every wish: nothing that she could conceive that she wanted, or that he could imagine would please her, did he fail to procure: he taught her, in fact, to create wants in order that he might have the pleasure to supply them, and never seemed so happy as when surprising her with presents. And Caroline appeared to appreciate his kindness: she appeared to be grateful, and never addressed him but in the most endearing strain—in tones so sweet, and with looks so fascinating!—he was her "love," her "life," her "dear love," her "darling!" Oh! she felt so happy! while he was so intoxicated with delight, that when the month had expired, a resolution was moved and carried, nem. con., that as they had passed the honey-moon thus in Elysium, they should have it all over again.

The happiness, however, of Charles and Lucrece was of a more tranquil character; but, if not so ardent, it was not less pure; while that of Greville, who passed his time, wanting nothing, anticipating nothing, caring for nothing, and thinking of nothing, as usual, partook of that indolent unconcern, which proved that he might have been as well without reason as with it.

At the expiration of the period thus assigned, namely, two months, they came up to town—Sir Arthur having previously given instructions to have everything prepared in the best possible style—and here the happiness which Caroline had experienced at the Lodge seemed surpassed.

"Now my dearest pet," said Sir Arthur, the morning after their arrival, "if there be anything which you do not admire here have it removed, or if there be any alteration which you think would improve the appearance of the place, have it made by all means, my love: spare no expense.

"Really, my dear," returned Caroline, "I do not perceive that any improvement can be made: everything is so superb and so admirably arranged. you will forgive me when I say that I never before gave you credit for the possession of so much taste."

"You're an ironical little rogue," cried Sir Arthur, kissing her for about the hundredth time that morning.

"Nay, indeed love, I'm serious," rejoined Caroline. "You have great taste—great purity of taste—you know that you have."

"I must have had to have chosen you: therein it is proved!—I admit it."

"But I do not mean that!"

"I do, you little blushing rogue, I do!" And here—the fact may as well at once be placed upon record—he actually kissed her again. "But, my love," he continued, "now do you not think that if this room were hung with a rich deep crimson damask paper, it would be an improvement?"

"Oh! it would indeed look elegant!"

"With gold mouldings and beadings, and chairs to match! It would look warm, and cozy, and comfortable! Eh?"

"Oh, magnificent! But what do you imagine would be the cost?"

"Not a word about that!—not a word about cost! When the happiness of my very greatest plague can be promoted, cost shall never be considered for a moment."

"But unnecessary expenses, dear, are not essential to my happiness! I am happy, I cannot be more so."

"Now, I know that we shall have a most desperate quarrel. I know that we shall, if you say another syllable about the matter. Am I not master of my own house? The alteration shall be made! We are going to the coachmaker's to order our new chariot, and we'll call at the upholsterer's on our way."

"You are a dear, kind, affectionate creature," returned Caroline; "I know not how sufficiently to love you."

The carriage having been previously ordered, they accordingly proceeded, on its arrival, to the upholsterer's, and thence, after giving the necessary instructions, to one of the most eminent coachmakers in town. Here a variety of chariots met their view, but not one was sufficiently elegant for Sir Arthur: he had made up his mind to have something superb, and was therefore requested to step into the counting-house, with the view of inspecting the various drawings.

"Oh! what a love!" exclaimed Caroline, alluding, as they passed, to an elegant little phaeton which stood near the counting-house door. "Did you ever see such a little beauty?"

"It would look rather pretty," observed Sir Arthur, "with a well-matched pair of white ponies, would it not?"

"Oh, dear, yes! or cream colour. Really, I never saw so sweet a little thing."

Sir Arthur smiled, and led her to the table upon which the drawings were displayed; but, while she was engaged with one of the clerks in looking over them, he and the principal returned to the shop.

"You have a nice little phaeton here," he observed.

"It is, indeed, sir, a beautiful thing," replied the principal; "quite a new style, sir; everything novel about it: you perceive that the——"

"What is the price of it?"

"Why, sir, it ought to be a hundred and twenty guineas—in fact, a hundred and fifty wouldn't pay for the time and labour it has cost—but, to you, sir, if you wanted a thing of the kind, I shouldn't mind saying a hundred."

"Where is it likely that I can get a pair of cream-coloured ponies?"

"Upon my word, sir, I don't know, but there's a livery stable keeper next door who can, I've no doubt, inform you."

"I wish you'd send for him?"

"Certainly: by all means."

One of the men was then despatched for Mr. Longbow, who, being in the yard at the time, at once made his appearance.

"Have you a pair of cream-coloured ponies?" inquired Sir Arthur.

"Why, sir," replied Mr. Longbow, "can't exactly say that I have, but I happen to know a gent which has got a pair of white uns'"

"They will not do; the colour must be cream."

"Do you want 'em immediate, sir, may I ask?"

"As soon as possible."

"Well, sir, I dare say I can find you a pair 'twixt this and the morning."

"That will do."

"Somewheres about, p'raps, thirteen hands?"

"I want them to run in this phaeton."

"I see, sir. It's a monstrous little mite of a thing though. However, if there's any to be had in England they shall be in my yard, sir, to-morrow at twelve."

"Very well; then at twelve o'clock I'll call."

Mr. Longbow then left; and Sir Arthur, having stated that he would have the phaeton, returned to Caroline, who was still looking over the drawings.

"Well, my love," said he, "which have you chosen?"

"Nay, dear, the choice rests with you! This is an admirable style of chariot: do you not think so?"

"Oh, yes! it is indeed: I admire it much."

"If the panels were blue it would look extremely rich; would it not?"

"Blue! aye, that would have a beautiful effect. Then you like this much better than any that you have seen?"

Oh! much. But you must exercise your taste and judgment. The choice, you know, must not be mine!"

"But that, my dear, is the very one I should have chosen! Nothing, I am sure, can be in my view more handsome, especially with the improvement you suggest."

This was conclusive: the order was given; and, after taking a ride round the park, they returned.

On the following morning, at twelve precisely, Sir Arthur proceeded to Longbow's yard, and found that person in excellent spirits, and apparently happy to see him.

"Well," said he, "have you been successful?"

"Beyond every think!" replied Mr. Longbow. "After going all over the town, I've got a pair of the prettiest tits in natur. I never see the fellow to 'em yet. They're the handsomest things, sir, you ever clapped eyes on: fat and sleek as moles, sir, and quiet as lambs."

"Well, let me see them. If they answer your description they are the very things I want."

"They go beyond it," returned Mr. Longbow, having ordered his men to bring them out. "You'll be right on delighted with them. I was. There's a pair of beauties," he continued, when the men had produced them. "They're what I call a pair, sir, them are! there aint a hair's difference between 'em: both rising four, barely thirteen, and warranted sound. I'll back 'em against all England for symmetry and action; and as for their tempers, I'll trust my youngest babby to drive 'em."

And they were extremely beautiful little creatures; in excellent condition, with remarkably small heads, long tails, and flowing manes. Sir Arthur greatly admired them. They were just the very colour, the very size, the very things, in fact, he wanted.

"What is the price?" he inquired.

"Why, it's rayther a longish price," replied Mr. Longbow, "certainly; and yet it ain't, considering there isn't another such a pair in the country. The Countess which belongs to 'em wants a hundred and eighty guineas, harness and all. I told her groom it was rayther stiff, and wanted her to fix a lower figure, but, as she'll have to give me five per cent. commission, she'll not take a sixpence less, whether they're sold or not, and she don't seem to care about parting with 'em much; and I don't wonder at it, for I'm sure they're not to be matched in Great Britain; there can't be bigger beauties; they are, in fact, out and out!"

"What sort of harness is it?"

"Beautiful! I have it here, sir; show it you in a moment."

The harness was then produced; and, when displayed upon the ponies, met Sir Arthur's views precisely.

"Would you like to see 'em in the phaeton, sir?" inquired Mr. Longbow, in a feverish state of anxiety, ascribable chiefly to the prospect of his clearing seventy pounds by the transaction. "I'll send for it in a moment, sir, and then you'll see how splendid the turn-out will look altogether."

As Sir Arthur assented to this, the phaeton was brought into the yard: and, when the ponies were in, the whole affair looked most elegant and unique.

"Well," said Sir Arthur, "I'll have those ponies. I like their appearance much."

"Thank you, sir; I'm obliged to you. Shall I send 'em to your stables"'

"No; just have them ready in about an hour, and I'll send for them."

A cheque was then given for the amount, and Sir Arthur at once returned home, enjoying in anticipation the delight with which his Caroline would be inspired; for the highest pleasure he knew was that of imparting pleasure to her.

"Cary, my love," said he, on his return, "don't you intend to take advantage of this delightful morning?"

"Oh! I should indeed enjoy an airing," returned Caroline, rising from the piano, "if you are not engaged, dear."

"Oh! then I'm to go with you?"

"Why, I scarcely need say that the pleasure would be enhanced."

"But suppose I meet you in the Park? I think that I must have a gallop this morning."

"Do so, my dear, by all means. You will find me in the Drive."

"Well, then, run away and dress, and I'll order the carriage."

Caroline then left the room; when Sir Arthur summoned his groom, who was waiting for orders, and desired him to go for the phaeton.

"Now," thought he, "for a scene of rapture! I know she'll be delighted—I know she will. She hasn't the least idea of it—not the most remote! What happiness it is to surprise her."

Here he paced the room in a state of the most pleasurable excitement, and continued to conceive what joy would be expressed, until she returned, when he affected to be perfectly calm.

"Well, my love," said he, "you are ready before the carriage."

"I'm in no haste, dear," replied Caroline, approaching the window. "Oh!" she exclaimed, as the phaeton came to the door, "did you ever see anything so lovely? You playful little beauties. Oh! do look. And our Thomas driving? Why, whom on earth can they belong to?"

"Oh! that," said Sir Arthur, smiling, "that is Lady Cleveland's."

"Lady Cleveland's. Mine! Oh you dear!" she exclaimed, throwing her arms round his neck, and lavishing kisses upon him; "you darling! Oh! what am I to do to prove how highly I appreciate your goodness? Why, is it not the very phaeton we saw yesterday?" [See Illustration above.]

"The same."

"And so you purchased it because it was admired by me! You are a duck! You don't know how I love you—you don't! But where did you meet with those dear ponies? See how playful they are—how delighted they appear! The little lambs! Whom did they belong to before?"

"To some countess: I couldn't exactly ascertain her name."

"Well they look like the ponies of a countess. I never beheld such loves! See how every one admires them! I must, before I go into the park, call and show them to Lucrece: she will be so delighted."

"Do so my dear: there's plenty of time, in an hour I'll meet you in the Drive."

Caroline then again kissed him and thanked him, and repeated that she was sure he knew not how much she loved him; and, having thus rendered his happ ness perfect, she entered the phaeton and gaily drove off.

"What a dear good affectionate grateful creature," he exclaimed, when she had left, "how easily delighted! Lucky dog!—lucky dog to have such an angel—for an angel she is if there be one on earth. What joy she expressed! What ecstacy! That's the sort of wife—there's the sort of wife!—all heart, all soul. He wh with such a wife as that cannot deem himself blessed is a fool."

Having arrived at this enchanting conclusion he ordered his horse, and soon afterwards rode to the park, not so much for the pleasure of the ride per se, as with a view to witness the happiness of Caroline, and to enjoy that general admiration of which he was sure she could not fail to be the object.

On reaching the Drive, therefore, he looked round with the utmost anxiety and when he found that she had not yet arrived he began to be impatient. All other vehicles were then alike to him; he paid no marked attention to any, the most superb equipage was regarded with no more interest than the meanest, while those who knew him looked for a nod of recognition in vain. His whole soul was fixed upon a certain pony phaeton; and, as his "mind's eye" was constantly upon it, of course he could see nothing else.

He was not, however, kept long in suspense, for presently the veritable ponies dashed through Buckingham Gate and came down the drive in a style which could not be surpassed. Sir Arthur watched their approach with feelings of the most exalted pride, and Caroline on perceiving him instantly pulled up.

"Oh how much they have been admired!" she exclaimed as the groom flew to their heads, "and such beauties to go! They require no whip, they know me already, I have but to speak, and they fly. Will you not drive me home my dear? Pray leave that great ugly horse and take the reins: you'll be delighted!"

"Certainly my love," replied Sir Arthur, dismounting, and at the same time resolving that the great ugly beast should be killed in the morning, notwithstanding he had been so fortunate as to purchase him. "But would you not like to go once round the park my dear?" He added on taking the reins.

"I should indeed," replied Caroline.

"Take that brute home," said Sir Arthur to the groom, for he really began to have a great contempt for the animal. "Have you been far, my love?" he added, turning to Caroline.

"Only to my sister's, dear. But do they not go along beautifully?"

"Like their mistress, they appear to have plenty of spirit?"

"I have not enough! You have quite subdued that which I had. I suspect that your intention is to make me, by kindness, as tame as Lucrece. Is she not a gentle, mild, quiet creature? And as for Charles, he is quite a philosopher—eternally studying!"

"He'll be a great man a great man, my love. He has a head upon his shoulders—a head! I have no fear of him. Was fred there?"

"Oh, he's always there! They are inseparable."

"I'm glad of it: he can't be in better society. Something must be done for them both."

"Papa was there, too. He also appears to be amazingly attached to Charles."

"Charles is an excellent fellow, my love—a fine, noble, generous fellow: his heart is in the right place! I never yet met with a man who disliked him. What did he say to your ponies?"

"Oh, he admired them much. Who could fail to admire them? What beautiful action they have! how speedily they dispose of the ground! But, really, dear, although I appreciate your goodness, and love you dearly for it, you must not continue the practice of presenting me with everything I happen to admire."

"You are a dear, good girl," returned Sir Arthur. "I am anxious only to show that I appreciate your goodness, in the perfect conviction that by promoting your happiness I do my own."

After having had a most delightful ride round the Park, they proceeded home to dinner; and, being quite alone, went in the evening to Astley's, expressly for the purpose of seeing how much superior their ponies were to those which were exhibited in the ring.

During the performances, however, a strikingly beautiful horse was displayed, and its action was so fine, and its symmetry so perfect, that the admiration of Caroline was fixed up n it alone.

"What a splendid creature!" she exclaimed. "Is it not?" So symmetrical, so docile, so intelligent! Really it appears to have a superior sort of instinct—one might almost call it reason."

"It appears to be quite a lady's horse," observed Sir Arthur.

"Oh, quite! A child might ride it with safety. And how beautifully spotted! It is, indeed, a dear."

Not another word was said on the subject then; but, in the morning, Sir Arthur called at the stables adjoined to the theatre, and on being introduced to the proprietor of the stud, inquired whether he felt at all disposed to part with the horse, he was answered in the negative.

"The fact is," continued Sir Arthur, "a lady whom I am anxious to oblige has taken quite a fancy to it, and, therefore, if you are at all inclined to sell it the price will be no object."

"I am induced the proprietor to think about the matter: and the result was that, after having candidly explained that the horse, being naturally a pure milk white, its neck and haunches had been painted for theatrical effect, he sold it to Sir Arthur; and that he made him pay for it is a fact which need not perhaps be added.

And thus did he proceed, studying every fancy, and indulging every whim, as a means of securing the happiness of her to whom his soul was devoted, and in whom all his earthly hopes were centred—treating her like a child, and actually prompting her to want everything she saw, in his anxiety to procure for her everything she wanted.

Colonel Baillie, M.P., the new Lord Lieutenant of Rose-shire, has agreed to grant land on his properties of Redcastle and Tarradale for the site of non-intrusion churches. This is almost a solitary instance among the extensive proprietors in the north. The non-intrusion party in Inverness have made offers for part of the academy grounds as a site for their projected church.

We hear that W. Ba. Rash, Esq., of Brancepeth Castle, has purchased the Wynyard (late Marquis of Londonderry's) hounds, and intends to hunt the Durham country with them, in conjunction with his own pack. The Earl of Hillsborough, Sir Wi nghby Dixie, G. M. Musgrave, Esq., the master of the Fleet, and other noblemen and gentlemen, (the hunting season being over) are about to reduce their respective packs by selling off large lots of them.

FATAL ACCIDENT.—On Wednesday week an accident, terminating fatally, occurred to Mr. Simcox, proprietor of a cross country coach from Brighton. Upon the arrival of the coach at Lewes, Mr. Simcox was fastening the luggage to the roof, when the strap broke, and he fell into the road and broke his arm. He lingered in great agony until Saturday, when he expired. He was a fine healthy man, only thirty-six years old.

FIRE AND LOSS OF LIFE.—On Tuesday morning a fatal fire occurred at the house tenanted by some Germans, No. 13, Everard-street, Back Commercial-lane, Commercial-road East. The unfortunate person who perished was a female, 50 years of age, who lodged in the front-room on the ground-floor. On the discovery being made the apartment was found in flames, and she in the midst screaming loudly for assistance. She was soon got out, but died shortly afterwards from the injuries she received.

THE MARKETS.

CORN-EXCHANGE.—Owing to the extremely moderate state of the supply of English wheat on offer at Mark-lane this week, and the increased attendance of buyers—most of whom have been short of stock—the demand for that article of grain has ruled brisk, at an advance of from 1s to 2s per quarter, and good qualities have been readily obtained. In foreign wheat we have had a large amount of business doing, and prices have not undergone the slightest alteration. Grinding and malting barley has sold freely for last week's money, at late rates. Oats, beans, peas, and flour have maintained their value.

Ranges of Wheat from last week, 42s to 49s, duto white, 47s to 50s. Rye, Lincoln, 30s to 32s. Barley, maltn, 18s to 24s; 27s, 3s to 28s; grinding ber... to 21s; Chevalier 32s to 34s; Suffolk and Norfolk malt, 36s to 38s. Beans, Tick, 30s to 32s; mazagan and Pigeon, 32s to 34s; Harrow, 32s to 34s; Essex and Suffolk, 32s to 34s. Peas, maple, 32s to 34s; white, 32s to 34s; boilers, 32s to 37s per quarter. Town-made flour, 44s to 46s; Suffolk, 38s to 40s, Stockton and Yorkshire, 36s to 38s; per 280 lbs. Foreign. Free wheat, 42s to 46s. Rye. Archangel, 20s; oats, new, 15s to 16s; ditto feed, 14s to 15s; beans, 30s to 36s; peas, 32s to 37s per quarter. Flour, American, 28s per barrel.

Gross Imperial average of wheat, per quarter, was sold at Mark-lane.

Take of Wheat The supply of last week was small, but article was dull on the first day, as good terms as of late; but in all other kinds of seeds exceedingly little has been doing.

The following are the present rates. Lincoln, Rye, 30s, to 32s, 6d, Barley, 22s to 24s; Mediterranean and Odessa, 22s to 23s; Pigeon, 32s to 34s per quarter, Canadian, 19s to 21s per quarter; Malting, 22s to 24s; white ditto, 25s to 27s 6d. Beans, Tick, 30s to 32s per bushel; English rapeseed, new, £36 to £38 per last of ten quarters. Linseed cakes, English, £10 to £10 10s, ditto foreign, £7 to £7 10s per 1000, rapeseed cakes, £5 5s to £6 per ton.

Seeds. The prices of wheaten bread are from 7½d to 8½d per 4-lb loaf of household ditto, 4d to 5½d for the 4-lb loaf

Imperial Weekly Average.—Wheat, 43s 6d; barley, 23s 8d, oats, 16s 2d, rye, 29s 9d; beans, 34s 2d; peas, 33s 4d.

Imperial Averages of Six Weeks which govern Duty.—Wheat, 42s 1d; barley, 28s 1d; oats, 17s 7d; rye, 28s 6d; beans, 33s 6d, peas, 33s 4d per quarter.

Smithfield.—Per 8lbs by the carcass, 2s 6d; barley, 2s 8d; oats, 2s 6d, rye, 2s 6d, beans, 2s 6d, peas, 2s 6d per quarter.

Tea.—Sales of 133 chests of Assam tea took place on Tuesday last, but the whole of the quantity found buyers. The market rema ns quiet, but prices are steadily supported. Hyson 1s to 1s 2d per lb; Hyson skin, 10d to 1s; young Hyson, 1s to 1s 2d; Twankay, 1s 1d to 1s 3d; Congou, 1s 1d to 1s 3d; Souchong, 1s 1d to 1s 3d; Assam, 1s 1d to 1s 3d; Pekoe, 1s 3d to 1s 4d per lb.

Wool.—The West India market is firm, at an advance of from 1d to 2s per cwt. In wool and Mauritius has sold freely, at the same amount of improvement. The refined market is steady, and standard lumps have realised 75s 6d to 76s.

Coffee.—The market is dull, and prices have a downward tendency.

Cocoa.—The demand is still inactive for all descriptions, but the quotations remain without alteration.

Indigo.—The quarterly sales of indigo commence on Tuesday next, and at which 7746 chests will be offered. The private-contract enquiry is rather dull.

Provisions.—All kinds of butter are steady, and prices have given way quite 2s per cwt. The same observations may be applied to most other kinds of prov sions.

Tallow.—There is nothing doing in this article below. Candles are 6d to 6½d, and for mould candles 7s 6d to 8s 6d, are the nearest quotations.

Wool.—Supplies of wool are very small into London this week. Several large lots of Australian, consisting chiefly of fleece, 700 packages, have been appointed to take place at Garraway's, on the 25th and six following days. By private contract exceedingly little is doing, and prices are nominal.

Hops.—Good colonery samples still command full quotations, but in other kinds of hops very little is doing

Potatoes.—The arrivals of potatoes being rather small, and the weather cold for the time of the year, prices of potatoes have advanced this week quite 4s per ton, the Yorkshire realising 8s to 9s.

Smithfield.—The market has ruled tolerably steady this week, and the following are the current rates:—Beef, from 3s 4s to 4s 2d; lamb, 4s 4d to 5s 2; veal, 3s 8d to 4s 10s, 2nd pork, 3s 8s to per 8lb, to sink the offal.

Newgate and Leadenhall.—The receipts of country meat since our last publication. It is satisfactory to state that those changes which have occurred, however, denote a still improving condition. In Mincing-lane, during last week, the sales of Bengal, Madras, and Bombay cotton were extensive, and at full prices. Large arrivals are expected, both from the East and West Indies, still the trade has been active. In the course of last month, the sales of cotton at the out-ports were very large, a comparison of the rates which then previously had obtained, and an advance of from ¼ to ½ per lb has been established. The above statement is also borne out by the returns of imports into the kingdom, which, during the present year, have greatly exceeded those of the corresponding period in 1842.

It is satisfactory to state that during the last ten days an alteration for the better has been exhibited in all the large markets for the consumption of agricultural produce. Wheats of the finest qualities have risen during that period nearly 3s. per quarter, and a proportionate advance must likewise be noted in the value of all other descriptions of grain and grain. In Smithfield, also, cattle are in much better demand than they were a month ago, and, in fact, all events, confidence appears to be again gaining ground and the tradesmen generally in a flourishing condition.

On the English Stock Exchange the principal attention of brokers and jobbers has been directed to the settlement of the account of the month of January, which occurred on Tuesday last, and which was arranged without any difficulty. The speculative account in the Consols is for the present very small, and the business doing in that quarter, for the time, is not to any extent of importance. The settlements in the Long Annuities, and in the Bank and India stocks, have also been effected without any difficulty. The Foreign Stock Exchange has been very dull, and the business doing in that quarter has been to a very limited extent. The Spanish securities have been in request, and the Portuguese have also been in demand. The Dutch securities have been dull, and the Russian have been heavy. The settlements in the Foreign Stock Exchange have been effected

DREADFUL COLLIERY EXPLOSION, AND LOSS OF LIFE.

It is our province to record another of those distressing accidents which are so frequent in the mining districts and give so precarious an aspect to the destinies of the labouring colliers, whose hardships are undoubted, whose endurance of them is patient and generally even cheerful, and whose condition and grievances are as much deserving of the serious attention of the legislature as those of any other class of the labouring community.

The accident occurred shortly before 8 o'clock in the evening, in the Stormont Main Colliery, at Newcastle-upon-Tyne, the property of Mr. John Grace and partners, at Wreckington, and was attended by a tremendous sacrifice of human life, there having been twenty-seven men and boys killed, and six or seven others seriously injured. The men employed at the mouth of the pit had no conception that such an accident had occurred until a boy was drawn up much burnt, and even then they were made aware of but a small extent of the calamity. There were upwards of fifty persons engaged in the pit at the time; and of these more than thirty worked in the western part of the mine, where the explosion occurred. The damage done to the pit is remarkably trifling, scarcely exceeding in value a few shillings, not so much as a prop having been driven from its place. Nor did the bodies of the sufferers present any of those harrowing features which are generally witnessed after an explosion; very few were burnt at all, and even they comparatively slightly, while the majority were perfectly uninjured. There is, therefore, little, if any, doubt that the loss of life is attributable, not to the fire, but to the "after damp," or, less technically speaking, the noxious gas which succeeded, and was produced by the explosion. How the accident originated will probably remain matter of conjecture. The most current explanation—and the one which most readily suggests itself—is, that while Mr. Matthias Gray, the under-viewer (and one of the sufferers), was passing a working which had been for some days considered to be in a dangerous state, the foul air was ignited by his light; and the men who were employed on both sides of that place were those who perished. It may be supposed that this melancholy event has excited a very general sensation throughout the neighbourhood, and spread much suffering over a large number of families, many of whom are understood to be in a destitute condition.

An inquest was held at the Half Moon Inn, Wreckington, before Mr. J. M. Favell, coroner, and after a protracted investigation, without discovering the immediate cause of the explosion, a verdict of "Accidental death" was returned.

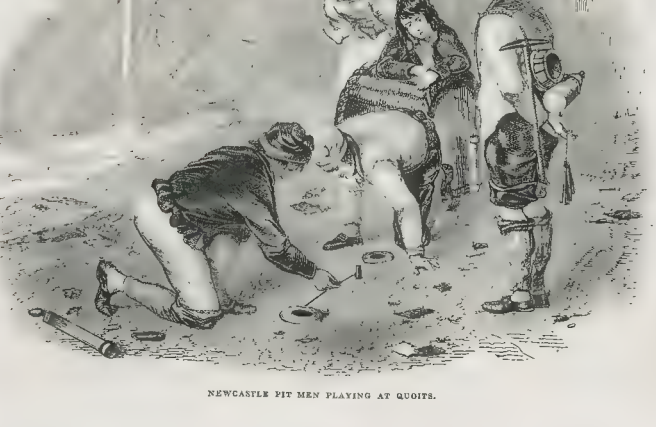
We have availed ourselves of the opportunity indicated by this distressing circumstance, to present to our readers some engravings illustrative of the coal-mining districts, and to append to them some notices of the manner in which such dreadful accidents occur, submitting an explanation of their causes more full and explicit than we discover in the simple news narration.

Seams of coal vary in thickness; that called the Bensham seam is five feet six inches from the floor to the roof, and others are not more than three feet high. The present depth of the lowest working in Wallsend colliery is between 140 and 150 fathoms from the surface. In removing the coal, portions are left as pillars to support the roof, forming many passages of immense extent. There is a slow and imperceptible discharge of gas from coal, sometimes it is met with issuing from chinks in the roof with a noise like steam; when this gas accumulates so much as to overpower the pure air, an explosion takes place on any fire being introduced into the neighbourhood. To prevent this, currents of air are made to rush through the workings; doors, called traps, are placed in some directions, and large fires lighted in others. So much skill is now used in ventilating coal-mines that these fearful accidents are now usually caused by carelessness on the part of the workmen, or by unexpectedly coming upon some old working filled most likely with either gas or water. The C. pit, Wallsend colliery, represented above shows the means resorted to by Mr. Buddle to consume the gas arising in an old mine of about five acres in extent: by means of a metal pipe it is conveyed from the bottom of the pit, and ignited. It has been computed that the quantity of gas drawn from the mine is eleven hogsheads per minute. Had this old working been suddenly broken open and ignited, Mr. Buddle observes that the effect would have been similar to an earthquake. The burning of this gas at the C. pit presents a ruinous appearance even in daytime, but at night it looks wild and fearful, lighting up the adjoining country, and making a roaring noise like a furnace. The explosions at Wallsend colliery have followed each other in rapid succession until within the last twenty years, when they have rarely occurred; showing that the skill and care used has been a means of preventing these dreadful accidents. Further particulars respecting the collieries will be found in Mr. Hair's work on the coal-mines of Northumberland and Durham, from which these sketches are taken.

"When the pitman is about to descend to the cavern of his labour," says a writer in a late periodical, "he is dressed in a checked flannel jacket, waistcoat, and trousers, with a bottle or canteen slung across his shoulders, and a satchell or haversack at his side, to hold provender for his support during his subterrene sojourn. At all hours, night and day, groups of men and boys are seen, dressed in this fashion, wending their way to their colliery, some carrying Sir Humphrey Davy's (called by them 'Davy's') safety-lamp, ready trimmed and brightened for use. They descend the pit by means of a basket or 'corfe,' or merely by swinging themselves on to a chain, suspended at the extreme end of the cordage, and are let down with inconceivable rapidity, by a steam-engine. Clean and orderly, they coolly precipitate themselves into a black, smoking, and bottomless-looking crater, where you would think it almost impossible human lungs could play, or blood dance through the heart. At nearly the same moment you see others coming up, as jetty as the object of their search, drenched and tired. I have stood in a dark night, near the mouth of a pit, lighted by a suspended grate, filled with flaring coals, casting an unsteady but fierce reflection on the surrounding swarthy countenances; the pit emitting a smoke as dense as the chimney of a steam-engine; the men, with their sooty and grimed faces, glancing about their sparkling eyes, while the talking motion of their red lips disclosed rows of ivory; the steam-engines clanking and creshing, and the hissing from the huge boilers, making a din, only broken by the loud, mournful, and musical cry of the man stationed at the top of the 'shaft,' calling down to his companions at the bottom. This, altogether, is a scene as wild and fearful as a painter or a poet could wish to see."—Notes in Mr. Hair's "Sketches of the Coal Mines."

"When Grimaldi, the celebrated clown, was performing at Newcastle in 1818, the glowing descriptions of the manager induced him to see a coal mine. His stay in the pit, however, was brief enough. He descended some two or three hundred feet in a basket, and was met at the bottom of the shaft by a guide, who had not conducted him far, when a piece of coal, weighing about three tons, fell with a loud noise upon a spot over which they had just passed. 'Hollo!' exclaimed Grimaldi, greatly terrified, 'what's that?' 'Hech!' said the guide, 'its only a wee bit of coal fallen down; we ha'e that twa or three times a day.' 'Have you?' replied Grimaldi, running back to the shaft; 'then I'll thank you to ring for my basket, or call out for it, for I'll stop here no longer.' The basket was lowered, and he ascended to the light without delay, having no wish whatever to take his chance again among the 'wee bits of coal.'"—Life by Boz, vol. ii. p. 181.—Note in Mr. Hair's "Sketches of the Coal Mines."

The miners, after the fatigues of the day or on holiday occasions, practise the game of quoits, a characteristic sketch of which is subjoined.



NEWCASTLE PIT MEN PLAYING AT QUOITS.

THE ARTISTS' GENERAL BENEVOLENT INSTITUTION.—The friends, supporters, and patrons of this institution celebrated their annual festival in aid of the funds on Saturday, at the Freemasons' Tavern, in Great Queen-street. The chair was taken shortly after six o'clock by Lord Mahon. Amongst the company were the Count de Neuilly, Sir W. Ross, R.A., Mr. T. Phillips, R.A., Mr. R. Hardwick, R.A., Mr. J. Barry, R.A., Mr. W. Wyon, R.A., Mr. W. Uwins, R.A., Mr. D. Roberts, R.A., Mr. C. R. Cockerell, R.A., Mr. Creswick, Mr. Mann, Mr. Severn, Mr. Jerdan, and many other gentlemen well known for their connection with the fine arts. A list of contributions was read by Mr. Cockerell, amounting in the aggregate to £460.

SUDDEN DEATH AT THE LOWTHER-ROOMS.—On Monday night, about eleven o'clock, a gentleman, named W. L. Lost, entered the Lowther-rooms, at which a ball was taking place, and having obtained a partner, he commenced dancing. He continued to do so until about 1 o'clock when he was observed first to stagger and then fall. Mr. Blake, the proprietor of the rooms, placed him in a chair and seeing that he did not recover, though the ordinary means of causing him to do so were tried upon the spot, he was immediately conveyed to the Charing-cross Hospital, but died on the steps of that institution. Deceased, whose age was stated to be about 30, was formerly a house-agent in London, but had lately retired from business, and dwelt with his mother at Leatherhead. A good deal of property was found on deceased's person, which Mr. Blake handed over to the police, and a diary containing a list of parties and balls, which no doubt deceased intended to be present at. [What a practical sermon this incident reads to the thousands of thoughtless young men who nightly pursue the same degrading round of pleasure.]

AMUSEMENTS OF THE PEOPLE.

The Easter holidays have commenced, and with them the gaiety, and bustle, and animation of popular enjoyment. The excitement of politics is lulled, the fierce storm of political contention has subsided into calm, and for the future progress of sessional legislation society seems to have made up its mind to be patient without passion, and to trust to the good intentions of Government to fulfil its destinies aright. In the meanwhile, the people have entered warmly upon their season of festivity, and it is a matter of earnest gratification to us to see them making a business of pleasure in the heartiest sense of the word. When we here speak of the people en masse, we mean exclusively the crowd of lower orders who take brief cessation from labour, and get the unfrequent but happy licence of holiday during at least a portion of the Easter week. We know that the same season produces its revolution in the world of ton; that Fashion, with the peculiar inconsistency of its nature, comes rushing from the green fields and the beautiful hedgerows, from fair flowers, and sweet tree blossoms, and fragrant air, into dim, dense, populous and smoky London; that the Opera, the ball, and the concert-room contain elements of new vigour and freshened life; that Almack's points the season to the modern Adonis and the belle of the haut monde; that Rotten-row is in the afternoon sunlight crowded with carriages, and that there is a crush of loungers in Bond-street, Regent-street, and the Parks; in a word, that with Easter the London season has commenced, and that even politicians and Parliament-men will only condescend to date their campaign from the recess. But it is not of these we speak—it is of those who tread the humbler walks of life—the lowly, enduring, industrious class of our fellow-creatures, in whose happiness not to take interest becomes a crime. We regard, then, the Easter season as peculiarly the holiday of the poor. Then they take their joy as a sort of rightful privilege which even from the pulpit they have been admonished cheerfully to accept. They rush into simple rational exhilarating pleasures, that have not the alloy of dissipation, and so do not leave behind them the poison of regret. There has been of late years a great change for the better in the constitution of the people in this respect. The opening of exhibitions—the progress of metropolitan improvements—the excursion-facilities afforded by railways—the more free access to pleasure-grounds and parks, have tended to lure the populace into the more innocent enjoyments which these liberties afford. It is most creditable to the improved intelligence of the lower orders that they have rushed in thousands to the British Museum or the National Gallery, to the hospitals of Chelsea or of Greenwich, and that in the latter place the fine glorious old national foundation has carried its attraction over the fair! Now the poor have been spending their little pittance in the halls of science and among institutions devoted to the higher purposes of national improvement, and we may hardly blame them if at the theatre (how much better than the pot-house or the gin palace!) they have crowned the festivities of the day. They have relinquished prize-fighting, bull-baiting, and the more brutalizing sports—they have abandoned the fiercer dissipations which were once but too characteristic of the season—and they have chosen the indulgence of a fair and legitimate recreation which all wise men and good patriots will surely encourage and commend.

Now these are signs of the times which legislators ought not to neglect. Wherever public amusement can be thrown open to the people, the boon should be granted with ungrudging liberality of heart. There is no item in the public estimates that can be given with a more proper combination of generosity with justice than that which is devoted to the fair and hard-earned pleasures of the people—to the promotion of salubrity in companionship with enjoyment—to the throwing open of public walks and paths and squares—and avenues and gardens for purposes of natural recreation and innocent delight. We declare that we have experienced no more teeming gratification of heart than during the fair heavenly weather of the last few days in witnessing the bounding happiness of the pleasure-seeking throngs as they have been passing, in blythe cheerfulness and jollity of spirit, to their chosen spots of festivity—their selected Paradise of the year. The Cockney hunt in Epping Forest has not lured them as of yore, and the night debaucheries of the Greenwich orgies have been properly abolished, but there have been many goals of recreation open to them which they have heartily bent themselves to reach. Along sunny roads they have jauntily careered with laughing hearts and faces, or upon the sparkling river have embarked their happy freight of life—and nothing could be more beautiful, more natural, more picturesque and merry than their cheerful groupings, either upon the public highway or the steamer's deck. The sight of them should gladden the hearts and warm the sympathies of the good, while philosophy should look upon them smiling as upon the pictures of peace.

We wish most earnestly to be among the encouragers of the means of such happiness, and, therefore, there is not one spot of nature's loveliness—one beautiful park or landscape—one cultivated Eden, to which we would not make the people free. Such places of enjoyment are among the just rewards of toil—are the right relaxations which the rich and the prosperous owe to the labouring and the poor. They are a nation's tribute to its working classes, and those classes have a right to claim them at the hands of governments. Their influence, too, is civilizing, and forwards the interests of humanity—engenders a love of nature—of the pure, the beautiful, the serene—reposes the mind—contents the spirit—and warms, intellectualizes, and opens the finer sympathies of the heart.

SCENE FROM THE OPERA OF "NORMA."

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.

On Tuesday this magnificent house re-opened with Bellini's opera of "Norma," which was executed, with one solitary exception, to the full extent of the partition, and perhaps with an ensemble of effect that has not been surpassed. The music of this charming opera is sui generis; it boasts not the great learning of the German school, nor does it indulge in the exuberant floridity of the Italian; it is purely sentimental—by which we do not mean any approach to the maudlin or whining affectation of expression, it is the faithful echo of the passions of the words which it was its duty to "clothe in melody," and beautifully has the composer suited them. Had Bellini understood instrumentation better, he would have been the most dangerous rival that Rossini ever encountered; but alas! his well-imagined constructions are often defeated of their most valuable intentions through the ignorance of a means to parade themselves richly; while his great compatriot and contemporary lavishes his harmonic wealth with the profligacy of a spendthrift, bestowing careless bounty the most insignificant and worthless imaginations. All the works of Bellini are the productions of a young enthusiast, they abound "in poetry and passion uncontrolled;" and just when he had begun to make an alliance between his maiden fancy and a ripening judgment. "Death, like a rocky fragment, rolling from a mountain, crumbled into nothing;"—no!—we cannot complete the quotation, Bellini is still something, and will be as long as music is held to be a divine inspiration, as Thomas Aquinas says, who asserts "that not music alone, but every other science was understood by immediate revelation to the first of the human race" Bellini died at the age of twenty-seven—a period before which few men even begin to think they can compose. What might not have been expected from the maturity of such a precocious and brilliant mind?

After a two years' absence, Grisi appeared as Norma, looking as if she had been "at Hebe's everlasting fount" ever since she last enchanted us. Her singing, and more especially her acting, may we say, are considerably improved; or is it attributable to the gratification of welcoming back a favourite to her native home? N'importe—l'un vaut l'autre. Labiache made his début for the season in Oroveso and was greeted to his heart's content; nothing could exceed the warm cordiality of his reception. Conti, as Pollione, left us nothing to regret but Rubini; and Molini was the best representative of the "equally-paired twist love and friendship," Adelgisa, that it has been our gracious lot to see. Her by-play was exquisite, and she sang as if she might, but dared not, be the heroine of the scene. The duet between her and Grisi was most perfect, particularly in the syncopated passages of the last movement, in which she sang "up" to the other with extraordinary watchfulness and personal grace. Altogether the opera gave universal satisfaction and delight; at the conclusion of each act the principal performers were called forth to receive the gratulations of the audience, and if the joy of pleasing be equal to that of being pleased, the singers must have been quite as happy as the hearers. We must not omit to say that Stephan danced most beautifully; she is trenching fast upon the "steps" of others "hither, hight she first."

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

FRANCE.—PARIS, April 18.—Were our Paris politicians to be credited a war between the Porte and Russia is not only imminent, but certain; indeed, they go so far as to say that a formidable naval armament is preparing in the Black Sea, and that, notwithstanding all the influence of Prince Metternich, [illegible] Turkey [illegible] Russia. [illegible] former correspondence that many angry notes are passed between the cabinets of the principal courts, and that Lord Cowley and M. Guizot are far from entertaining the same opinion on this important question. France, however, I feel certain, will give way—Russia will take no hostile measure—and the peace of Europe will not be disturbed. I am the more confirmed in my opinion from the fact that France is daunting and considerably reducing her naval establishment. Already have the three-decker Mortebello, Friedland, the frigate Minerva, and other minor vessels been laid up in ordinary; and orders have been sent to Toulon and Brest to suspend the works on other ships, to dismiss a great many workmen, and not to re-engage all the warrant-officers whose term of servitude had expired. In the army, too, considerable reduction is taking place, and not less than 50,000 conscripts have received indefinite furloughs. There is much movement in our diplomatic circles, but all are determined on preserving peace: "the Court which should have the firm nerve to declare war," said M. Appony, a few nights since, at the British Embassy, "would do so at its peril, for it would not be a ship rated by any power in Europe."

The interior of France is tranquil, and the revenue, to some extent, flourishing; but I am sadly afraid we shall have much misery before the end of the present year. The wine-grower, already half ruined, will be quite so; for—owing to the late severe frosts, all the vineyards of Bordeaux are lost for 1845; and in Chalons-sur-Saone and Champagne the vine is frost bitten past recovery. The iron masters are also in a bad position, not being able to compete with the low prices of the English and Belgian; and the silk trade of Lyons and Grenoble is in a most deplorable condition.

The embellishment of Paris is the raging fever of the day—"new streets for old ones" in all directions—improvements in the Champs Elysées, and fountains in every corner. Such is the mania for bu ding that £120,000 has been given for the house and gardens of M. Rougement, on the Boulevard Poissonnière, for the purpose of opening a communication with the Rue Bergère; magnificent houses will be built on both sides of the new street. The Government, always alive to pecuniary advantages, have determined on disposing of the ground on the new site for the Foreign Office, on the Boulevard Capucins—about eight acres: they demand £320,000. The Foreign Office will be moved to the Rue Champs Elysée,—to the hotel now occupied by the Turkish Ambassador, on which will be considerably improved and enlarged. It is, perhaps, not generally known that the Turkish is the only ambassador lodged at the expense of the Government. I understand that the Sultan is to be lodged for an indefinite time in the Rue St. Honoré, so as no longer to be under any obligation to Louis Philippe.

The King and Queen of Belgium, accompanied by the Prince of Saxe-Cobourg and his two sons, arrived in Paris on Wednesday week on the marriage of the Princess Clementine, on the 20th: it is now determined that the ceremony shall be performed at St. Cloud, without any official pomp.

I have received letters from Turin to the 11th inst. The health of Sardinia was fast recovering from her severe indispos tion. It appears that on the 2nd the Queen was taken with a violent spitting of blood, and was considered to be so much endangered that the Viaticum was administered to her on the 4th. The King and his two sons seldom quit the royal sufferer.

The Chantilly races, which take place on the 18th, 19th, and 20th of May, are likely to be well attended; there are eight handicaps, for, amongst others the Chantilly Prize of 1200 francs; the Annual Prize, 1250 francs; Queen Blanche's Prize, 1000 francs; Orleans Prize, 5000 francs; Jockey Club Prize, 6000 francs; and the prize of 3000 francs given by the administration of "Haras."

The Opera Comique has obtained a great acquisition in Mademoiselle Lavoye, who made her début on the night of the "Ambassadrice." This ady strongly resembles Conti-Damoreau in purity and method, and her melodious vocalisation. No débutante in Paris has received so much general applause, and deservedly so, for many years past. Mademoiselle Lavoye is a most brilliant star. A new ballet, "La Peri," is in preparation at the Grand Opera. The decorations will be on a most magnificent scale. A Mademoiselle Julie Dubos appeared on Tuesday for the first time as a principal dancer, but with little success. By the by, I understand that Adèle Dumilâtre has returned from London very much dissatisfied with her reception at the Italian Opera. Duprez and the director are still at war, but the former has the advantage; on the nights he appears the house is full, when absent empty benches! On Sunday last was given the 238th representation of "Robert le Diable," Robert being the most produced of the 8000 francs. On the night that Duprez performed the Dauphin, in the opera of "Charles the VI.," the receipt was 7000 francs; a few days after another person performed the same character, and the receipt was 900 francs less.

Our countrymen, Osborne and Balfe, rank high in our fashionable saloons; the concert of Osborne, last week, was attended, and he was greeted with rounds of applause, particularly when he played his Scotch and Irish fantaisie. Mr. Osborne, as a pianist, is elegant, pure, and brilliant, in the style of Kalkbrenner. Mr. and Mrs. Balfe gave their evening: Rivarly rooms were crowded. Thalberg played two pieces of his composition and a caprice taken from the opera of Charles VI. Balfe played a duet on two pianos with Madame Belleville, her pupil. Balfe is in Paris the first week in May; apartments have been taken for him in the Rue Monsigny, not far from the Italian Opera. Liszt is expected in Paris in June next: he is now giving concerts at Warsaw and Petersburgh.

The Italian Opera of Vienna opened the first night with "Linda di Chamouni," and the second with "Nabucodonosor," of Verdi. Rosconi was well received. The company consisted of Tadolini, Del Gaiz, Vardot Garcia, Alboni, and Salvini; and Messrs. Salvi, Guasco, Severi, Rosconi, Varbie, Derivis, and Donatelli.

The grand festival at Hamburgh is fixed for the 17th of May; it will take place in the old castle, and will last three days: more than 200 artists are already engaged. It is intended to give "Alexander's Feast," by Handel, with great eclat.

The verdict against County, as I anticipated, has been quashed by the Court of Cassation, and County sent for trial before the Royal Court of Orleans.

Tamburini is on his road for Madrid, where he is expected with much impatience. The old composer, Joseph Nicolini, died on the 2nd, at Florence, aged 89 years. His principal opera was "Georgian."

The Duke de Montpensier intends being present at the inauguration of the statue of Henri IV., at Pau, on the 25th of August next. The ceremony will be most interesting, and attended by the greater part of the visitors to the Pyrenean spas.

Admiral Dupetit-Thouars, of Otaheitan celebrity, has received the decoration of Grand Officer of the Legion of our "Long Champs" on Friday last. There was a great number of hackney-coaches and several elegant equipages; but it was generally remarked that the élite of the haut ton were not present: none of the royal family appeared in the Champs Elysées.

The Queen has quitted her mourning for the Duke of Orleans; the Duchess of Orleans is still in widow's weeds, and tends a most secluded life.

Early (it is to) that murders and robberies increase to a frightful extent in Paris, notwithstanding the immense force of police. It will hardly be credited that, independent of the regular police, the municipal force consists of 650 cavalry and 2000 infantry. Either the police is badly regulated or the people are demoralised to an incredible extent: I am inclined to be of the latter opinion.

It is reported that M. Piscatory, member of the Chamber of Deputies, will replace M. Lagrenée as Minister Plenipotentiary to Greece.

The price of bread has fallen in Paris; it is now 5¾d. the 4 lb., French weight.

So many persons are dissecting, proposing, and arranging, after their will and pleasure, the great American boundary question, that I have thought it interesting and opportune to send you the following scrap, extracted from a most interesting work now in course of publication, called "Notes on the Populations of Antiquity," by Dr. Loudon:—

"ANCIENT MODE OF SETTLING A BOUNDARY QUESTION—HINTS TO MR. LINN.

"Cyrene was a very populous and powerful state, and at one time a formidable rival to the no less populous town and state of Carthage. A dispute had been long pending between these two countries with regard to the exact boundary of a part of their territories. At last it was agreed that the point should be settled in the following manner:—Two young men were chosen on each side, who, on a certain day, and at a fixed time, were to run from the two capitals towards the limits in dispute. The line of demarcation was to be fixed on the exact spot where these four individuals should meet.

"The Carthaginian pedestrians met their opponents at a point in the Cyrenian territory much beyond what the Carthaginians had ever claimed. This so vexed the people of Cyrene, that they did not hesitate to tax the Carthaginians with perfidy, in falsifying the agreement, the time first starting, and they most vehemently demanded a new convention. It was at last proposed on the part of the Cyrenians after some serious quarrelling, that, if the two Carthaginians, whose names were Philenes, would consent to be buried alive on the spot on which they insisted to have gained the race, they would admit the line the Carthaginians claimed to have won. They at the same time added, that the Carthaginians refused this proposal, and would grant them the boundary they had previously asked for, the two young men who started from Cyrene would be ready to sacrifice themselves by submitting to the same death. The Carthaginians accepted the first proposal. The two Philenes were voluntarily interred alive, and the boundary question settled. The courage of the Philenes was highly praised by their countrymen. They were ranked amongst the gods, had altars erected to their honour, and constant sacrifices offered up to their memory."

I have just heard that it has been decided that the approaching anniversary of the death of Beethoven shall be celebrated at Frankfort by a festival: amongst others "Rémusi," by Goëthe, for which the illustrious maestro composed an overture, will be represented. A statue of Beethoven is to be erected at Bonn.

A letter from Brest, dated the 18th, says that the "Fishery question," between England and France, has been amicably settled, signed by Mr. Pettet, her Britannic Majesty's consul at Brest, and M. Lange, French [illegible] sary. Amongst other concessions it has been agreed that French fishing vessels shall be allowed to navigate and cast anchor within three miles of the coast of Great Britain

It was reported to-day on 'Change that the French Government intended sending an ambassador to China! It is also said that the ambassadors of three principal courts are now in Paris, viz., M. de Barante, an ambassador to the court of St. Petersburgh, M. de Pontois, ambassador to the Ottoman Porte, and M. de Salvandy to the court of Madrid.

The Spanish Ministry is decidedly in a minority.

SPAIN.—Letters from Madrid of the 11th inst. announce the defeat of the Spanish Ministry by the coalition on the preceding day, after a stormy debate. The numbers were 80 against 55. Subsequent advices from Paris state that they had tendered their resignation to the Regent, who had sent for Lonbon to General Concha.

ST. PETERSBURG, April 1.—The will of Baron Von Stieglitz is dated in 1836. His property amounted at that time to 52,000,000 rubles banco, or about 17,000,000 Prussian dollars (about £2,500,000 sterling), and has doubtless much increased since. He has left one daughter by his first marriage, but in her the succession will not be broken, as the whole of the inheritance is left to the daughter. The legacies are very small, and the son has increased some of them.

PORTUGAL.—By the latest accounts from Lisbon it appears that notwithstanding the many projects which have been brought forward in the Cortes for the removal of the distress of the Douro wine district, none appear to have received hitherto the approbation of the senators of either house.

GREECE.—Our Athens letter of the 31st ult. states that the English and French Governments had replied to the demand of Greece, that they would pay the dividend of the three powers, when it became due in March, but that the Greek Government must contrive to raise funds for the payment of the September dividend. The two cabinets had declined making any other answer to the application of the Greek minister at Paris on a similar reply, but the court of Bavaria still entertained the hope of being able to prevail on the Emperor to come to the relief of King Otho, and had with that view transmitted to Athens the confidential instructions of the late post of Ambassador at St Petersburg.—Vessels arriving from Greece at Ancona are henceforth to be admitted immediately to free pratique. The convergence was also ordered to be given to the Greek vessels in the English and French ports of the Mediterranean.—Prince Dolgorouski, who was lately ordered to quit Paris by the Emperor Nicholas, passed through Silberfeld, on the 11th, for St. Petersburgh, en route for Italy. Our private letters anticipate for Prince Dolgorouski a very disagreeable reception at St. Petersburg, and then proceeds to state.—but we give his statement, without even the admission of the probability of the truth of which smouldering disaffection pervaded the noble and other superior classes of Russia, which threatened at no remote day to pro uce a revolution

The Ionian Gazette of the 29th contains the following, which have taken place at Corfu, Santa Maura, and the other islands, on the return of Chevalier Petrizopolo, and his re-election to the presidency of the Ionian States.

TURKEY.—By accounts received from the Turkish frontiers, dated April 4th, it appears that the British Ambassador has received instructions to support the Russian proposition, with the exception, however, of some reservation, however, not to recognise the Emperor's right to demand the dethronement of the present ruler, and the election of a new one, but merely to represent it to the Turkish Government as a matter of the greatest importance and expediency. Therefore upon this point the London Cabinet remains faithful to its former declarations.

UNITED STATES AND CANADA.—The Boston and Halifax mail-steamer Columbia, Captain C. H. E. Judkins, arrived at Liverpool on Saturday evening after an excellent voyage of ten days and a half from Halifax, and twelve days and a half from Boston. She had forty-three passengers. She left Boston on the 2nd instant; her departure being delayed a day for the receipt of the southern mail, which, in consequence of the bad state of the roads, by land storms and excessive wet weather, had been rendered almost impassable.

A slight difficulty had arisen on the disputed territory, from the arrest of an American by a British officer, and the rescue of the prisoner by the Americans; but it amounted to nothing of serious import. Sir Charles Metcalf and suite arrived at Albany on March 29, where Sir Charles received kind attentions from ex-President Van Buren, the officers of the State, and the State Legislature. He left on April 1, by railway, for Boston, where he would arrive in three or four days. Sir Charles Bagot still lies dangerously ill. The last bulletin gives little prospect of his recovery. The court-martial on Captain Polkinghorne, for running the Caroline, had been dissolved by the President. It is said that Mexican dollars, made of German silver, and plated by the new magnetic process, are in circulation at Halifax. The quantity of silver used in the plating is necessary to cut into the metal before its composition can be determined.

WEST INDIES.—The ship Simeon Hardy, from Barbadoes to Cork, arrived at the port on Friday last, bringing the intelligence of the loss of the brig of war Globe to the 10th ultimo. At the time of the Simeon Hardy leaving Barbadoes the latest dates from England at that island by steamer were to the 3rd of January; but, by the arrival of the overland mail, dates to the 6th of February had been received. Great disappointment was daily expressed at the non-arrival, up to the 10th of March, of the 1st of February mails per steamer. The cause was supposed to be the severe weather.

SECOND EARTHQUAKE.—[From the Charleston Courier, March 22.]—We learn from Captain Smith, of the schooner Francis Canaday, arrived this morning, that a second severe shock of an earthquake was experienced at the north part of Guadaloupe on the 3rd inst. At the time a captain of a vessel off the north point of the island stated that it shook the vessel with such severity that it was with difficulty the crew could keep their feet. A dense cloud of smoke ascended from the vicinity of the Basseterre, and serious fears were entertained for the safety of that place. It was quite sickly at Point Iere, caused from the effects produced at the time of the first shock. The country seen at that place was seen at St. Thomas on the 2nd of the present month—it was so brilliant as to cause considerable alarm to the inhabitants. A shock of an earthquake was also felt at St. Thomas on the 5th inst., about half-past nine o'clock at night. No material damage was done.

BUENOS AYRES.—By the Orion, arrived at Cowes, advices have been received from Buenos Ayres to the 1st of February. A despatch from the Government of Paraguay was daily expected at Buenos Ayres, and it was looked forward to with considerable interest, in consequence of its supposed object being the offering of terms of accommodation with the capital. Exchange was 2 12-16d. and 3d. per dollar. An English merchant had been imprisoned by General Rosas for speaking disrespectfully of his government. According to the advices from Mexico, it would appear that Rivera, by a conspiracy against him, had removed some suspected chiefs from their respective commands. Ministerial changes had also taken place. Exchange was 46 1, but business was generally at a stand, and great preparations making to resist Oribe. It was, however, supposed that Rivera would most probably take the field, and leave the city to defend itself The French Consul at Monte Video had issued a circular to the Basque emigrants, threatening them with the forfeiture of their nationality if they did not abandon the arms which they had taken up in support of Rivera's Government. Oribe was very near to Monte Video with the main body of his army, and in ten or fifteen days important events would most likely transpire.

COUNTRY NEWS.

DOVER.—ANOTHER GREAT EXPLOSION.—On Tuesday last, at twenty minutes and four o'clock, another of those extensive blowings up of Dover Cliffs, which (under the management of Mr. Cubitt, the engineer-in-chief of the South-eastern Railway Company, Lieutenant Hutchinson, of the Royal Engineer department, and Messrs. Wright and Hodges, and their assistants) have excited so much interest in the scientific world, came off at Lydden Spout Coast-guard Station. This blast proved proportionably successful in effects to the unparalleled one, when, with the enormous quantity of 18,500 lb of gunpowder, the destruction of Roundd wn Cliff was effected on the 26th of January last. The mass of chalk removed on this occasion formed the base of the same cliff, the depth of which, to the depth of 90 feet, was blown off by a blast consisting of 7000 lb. of gunpowder, on the 2d ult. The present blast consisted of upwards of 10,000 lb of powder, which was placed fifteen feet in the rear, or chambered, and ranged along the base of the chalky cliff about to be removed, and the conducting wires being properly placed, all were fired off at once, as on the last occasion of the last blast, by an apparatus invented by the junior engineer, Mr. Hodges, which simultaneously communicates ignition by means of the voltaic battery to any number of wires attached to it, with a sil gle motion of the hand. The blast, like the others, was remarkably successful, the quantity of chalk, the only difference being, that on the present occasion a large quantity of chalk blocks and rubbish was projected in the air to a considerable distance seaward. The quantity of chalk it is possible for us to say at present; for so dense a fog overspread the abyss below, that the eye could not penetrate from the top of the cliff to the bottom. It was clear, however, that the mines had done their duty, from the tremendous mass that has been thrown down. The shock was felt for hundreds of yards around, and the fissures created in the top of the cliff presented a most terrific appearance; and for some time after every one of the cliff keep falling, and it was expected that other portions would come down in the course of the evening. This explosion seems to have created quite as great a sensation as the great blast of Dundeon. On Monday and Tuesday the conveyances to Dover were crowded; we should say there were quite as many spectators present as on the occasion referred to. In the ebbing there were several steamers, in one of which the chairman of the company had embarked, while on the top of the cliff and on the beach at its base there were numerous straggling groups. We have not heard of the slightest accident, although the cliffs, to the west of the point selected are in a fine state. The weather was a fine sea mild, and but for the fog the sight would have been superb.

DUDLEY.—On Monday a numerous and respectable company of the inhabitants of Dudley and its neighbourhood sat down to a dinner given at the hotel, in order to express publicly their thanks to the magistrates for their vigilant and firm conduct during the late disturbances. The chair was occupied by Lord Ward, who was supported by Lord Lyttelton, the lord-lieutenant of the county of Worcester, and also those of the principal gentry and iron-masters of the town and neighbourhood.

GLOUCESTER.—NORTHLEACH SESSIONS.—At the Quarterly Court of Magistrates, held on Tuesday in the above town, Gloucester, the report of the commissioners appointed by Government, to inquire into the causes which led to the death of the prisoner Beale, and to investigate the charges made by other prisoners as to the treatment they had received, and to inquire generally into the management of the Northleach and the other houses of correction in the county, was brought before the meeting by the chairman P. B. Burnell, Esq. After a lengthened discussion, the chairman said that a case of negligence had been made out against the surgeon, Mr. Bedwell, and he therefore moved that he be dismissed. On a division, four voted for dismissal, and a very considerable number for retention. Mr. Bedwell was therefore continued, but with an admonition as to his future conduct The case of the governor was next taken into consideration, when it was resolved to remove him and admonish him for the future. Harding, the second turnkey, was dismissed, after which their worships resolved to ameliorate the discipline of the gaol, and to substitute the dietary recommended by the Secretary of State.

IPSWICH. EAST SUFFOLK ELECTION.—The nomination of candidates for the vacancy in the representation of this division of the county of Suffolk took place at Bury, on Tuesday last, when Lord Rendlesham, the Conservative candidate, was proposed by Colonel Bence, seconded by T. H. L. Alexander, Esq.; and Mr. Adair, his opponent, was put in nomination by Sir Fowell Buxton, seconded by Barry, Esq. The card duties having severally addressed the electors, a show of hands was taken, which was declared by the High Sheriff to be in favour of Mr Adair. A poll was then demanded, which commenced on Friday and Saturday

LIVERPOOL.—The present Liverpool assizes have been the heaviest ever held in this county, having lasted upwards of a month. There have been 89 prisoners brought forward for trial, and upwards of 70 have received sentence of death, and 60 of transportation for periods from seven years to life. A report was current in the courts on Saturday, that in order to prevent so much prisoner in future, the commission would be annually issued.

MANCHESTER.—A meeting of the clergy and members of the established church, including the conductors and teachers of Sunday schools resident in Manchester, Salford, Salford, and adjacent villages, was held at the Corn-Exchange on Tuesday evening last, for the purpose of taking into consideration a petition to the House of Commons in favour of the educational clauses of Sir J. Graham's Factory Bill. The chair was taken by the dean of Manchester. All the resolutions were unanimously adopted.

GRAND FREE-TRADE FESTIVAL.—The grand free trade festival was held on Tuesday evening in the Free-trade Hall, Peter-street, Manchester, John Brooks, Esq., in the chair, on the occasion of presenting an address to Richard Cobden, Esq., M.P., from the working men of Manchester. The address was signed by 11,323 working men. The address was afterwards addressed by Mr. Cobden, who spoke for an hour; by Mr. Lawrence Heyworth, of Liverpool; and by Mr. Bright, of Rochdale, who also spoke at great length.

MARTHYR.—Great excitement was produced in this town last week in consequence of a man named Hansell, a sloker, having killed a woman named Hannah Hodgson, while he confined to the drunken row, which, it is stated, the unfortunate female herself provoked. The delinquent was shortly afterwards apprehended by the police

NORTH SHIELDS.—ACCIDENT ON THE NEWCASTLE AND NORTH SHIELDS RAILWAY.—On Monday morning, when the nine o'clock down train from Newcastle was passing over the embankment below the Howdon station, the connecting chain which unites the tender (the engine having left it) to the train broke, and the engine immediately severed from the carriages, and proceeded with increasing velocity until it reached the terminus of the rail way at Shields, driving against the wall with a tremendous crash, breaking the engine to atoms. The violence of the shock was so great as to start the doors off the sneeks in the dwelling-houses in Bedford-street, opposite to the station. The engineer, James Bonney, was thrown off the engine by the violence of the shock when the chain broke, and the train went over his arm. The damage is estimated at £600. The excitement in shields on the appearance of the engine without the carriages was very great.

NORTHUMBERLAND.—On Wednesday week a public meeting of the county of Northumberland, convened by the High Sheriff, pursuant to a requisition signed by upwards of 600 freeholders and landed gentlemen, was held in the Court-house at Morpeth Castle, to consider the propriety of petitioning Parliament for the repeal of the Income-tax. After several spirited speeches were delivered the following resolutions was unanimously adopted.

SALFORD.—A shocking occurrence took place in Salford on Friday week, and one which created great excitement amongst the inhabitants living in the vicinity of the Free-trade Hall. Early on that morning, a man named Robert Travis, about 50 years of age, was stabbed by a female named Oliver, alias Morris, who lived at a house in Brunswick-street, near the market-place. The deceased was stabbed with a large sharp-pointed carving fork, which penetrated the left side of the abdomen; and although medical assistance was promptly procured, he died in the afternoon of the same day. Both he and the woman were under the influence of liquor at the time of the occurrence, and, according to her statement, they had been quarrelling, and he had made an attempt to cut her throat, when she snatched the knife from him and stabbed him. The deceased, we understand, formerly kept the Black Boy public-house, in Old Millgate, in Manchester, and was possessed of some property. The prisoner was subsequently committed on the coroner's warrant, the jury having returned a verdict of "Wilful murder."

TUNBRIDGE.—EXPLOSION OF POWDER MILLS.—The inhabitants of Tunbridge were alarmed on the 7th inst. by hearing a loud report shortly after 12 o'clock, which was soon discovered to have been caused by the explosion of the gunpowder mills belonging to W. F. Burton, Esq., near that town. Upon inquiry it appears that one of a double mill exploded at the above-named time, and on the following morning, about seven o'clock, the other mill was exploded. We are happy to add that no lives were lost, nor any serious mischief done, except the destruction of the mills.

WALES.—RIOTS IN CARMARTHENSHIRE.—Nearly a party of Rebeccaites assembled at the Prendergast toll-house and commenced operations on the gate. The toll-keeper got up and "met them by moonlight alone," but was soon compelled to retire. The work of demolition was then speedily effected; as usual, all the parties concerned made good their escape, nor have any of them since been detected.

THE CATHOLIC BAZAAR, MANCHESTER.

This bazaar opened for the sale of useful. and fancy articles, needlework, pictures, books, articles of vertu, &c., on Monday last, in the Town-hall, Manchester. The proceeds are to be appl ed in aid of the funds for building St. Bernard's Abbey Church, Charnwood Forest, Leicestershire, which is to be entirely free to the poor. The community of St. Bernard's consists of a body of religious agriculturists, daily occupied with the rule in force of the field, who have already brought into useful cultivation one of the most sterile tracts in England. The monks daily receive and provide with food and shelter for the night some hun dreds of the poor and destitute, without inquiry into their creed or country; forwarding them with alms on their way the next day. They instruct the poor; and, more especially, they educate in practical agriculture a number of the peasantry annually. These and other good works they accompany with unceasing prayers to Almighty God for the welfare of the country and the safety of the state; loving their neighbour as themselves, and endeavouring to do unto others as they would have others do unto them.

We have not space to enumerate the various articles exposed for sale on the occasion, but we cannot omit alluding to three poetic contributions from the pens of Moore, Rogers, and Wakefield, contained in a volume of autographs, and all of them furnished expressly for the occasion, as their dates would seem to imply. The following are the lines of Moore:—

Like a gale that sighs along
Beds of Oriental flowers,
Is the grateful breath of song
That once was heard in happier hours;
Filled with balm the gale sighs along,
Though the flowers are sunk in death;
So when pleasure's dream is gone,
Its memory lives in music's breath.

March 17th, 1843. THOMAS MOORE.

The following is a copy of the autograph of Rogers, the bard of "The Pleasures of Memory:"—

Oh, of the selfish knew how much they lost,
What would they not endeavour, not endure,
To imita e, as far as in them lay,
Him, who his wretchedness and his power employs
In making others happy!

March 8th, 1843. S. ROGERS.

The following we believe, from its date, cannot have seen the light elsewhere:—

SONNET.

ON THE RECEPTION OF THE POET WORDSWORTH AT OXFORD.

Oh never did a mighty truth prevail
With such felicities of place and time,
As in those shouts, sent forth with power sublime,
From the full heart of England's youth, to hail
Her long-neglected bard within the pale
Of learning's fairest citadel! That voice
In which The Future thunders, bids rejoice,
Those who through wintry fortunes did not fail
To bless with love as deep as life the name
Thus welcomed i—who in happy silence share
The glory:—while their fondest musings claim
Unhoped-for echoes in the joyous air
That to their long-loved poet's spirit bear
A nation's promise of undying fame!

Monday, 4th of April, 1843. T. N. TALFOURD.

On Tues lay the attendance was very large, including a numerous party of the Catholic aristocracy, on the visit to Alford Park. The Countess of Shrewsbury presided at one of the stalls, assisted by the Misses Newton, daughters of the Rev. Robert Newton, Wesleyan methodist minister: the conversion of these ladies to Catholicism caused some sensation at the time. We have been unable to obtain the names of the other parties present; but the scene was a very gay an l brilliant one. The receipts at the doors were £71 1s. 10d.; at the stalls, £2393 12s. 10d.: together, £2464 0s. 11d. The total receipts of the two days, £5537 0s 8d.

NAVAL AND MILITARY INTELLIGENCE.

The British war steamer Hecla, from Plymouth, bound for Malta, with Admiral Curtis and family on board, has been put into Lisbon in a leaky state from stress of weather.

The ROYAL BENEVOLENT SOCIETY.—A quarterly general meet of the corporation of the above society was held on Monday last at the Thatched house Tavern, St. James's street. From the report read it appeared that during the last quarter the following grants had been £447 18s., the donations £12 2s.; interest upon the funded property £166 13s. 4d.; making, with £20 10s. 4d. in stock left at last meeting, £646 4s. 8d. The pensioners within the same period was £537 14s. 10d., of which sum £197 5s. was distributed as relief to fourteen widows, and children. The report having been adopted, some business connected with the management of the institution was transacted. A liberal sum was then awarded to many indigent officers; and several handsome donations having been announced, the meeting separated.

The Royal George yacht was paid off at Portsmouth on Saturday, and Captain Lord Adolphus Fitzclarence and all the officers took their departure for the Victoria and Albert steam-yacht, now nearly ready for launching at Pembroke. Lieutenant Sir William Hoste, Bart., is appointed Second Lieutenant of the new yacht.

Major General Sir David Pollis, K.C.B., died at Brunsiide d lodge, N.B., on Wednesday week, in his 74th year. He served with distinction in the East Indies, and was the seventh son of John Pollis, of Rosebank, N.B., promoted to the local rank of major-general 1837, and created K.C.B. 1838.

The ranges of the Royal Artillery at Woolwich will be closed for a short time, to be shipped on board a steam vessel on its way to their destination.

The effective force of the Royal Marines, Lieut.-Col. A. C. Kay, Reynenes, formerly of the 31st Light Dragoons, is in the gift of the colonel of the regiment, Lord Fitzgerald and Vesci.

SHIPPING INTELLIGENCE.

LOSS OF THE SOLWAY, WEST INDIA MAIL STEAMER.

The Lady Mary Wood steamer arrived at Falmouth on Saturday evening at past eight o'clock dudgeon. But we saw them shortly afterwards, and the cloud had evidently passed over.

To return to the park. Upon One Tree Hill, which derives its name from a trunk upon the summit, whose bare branches are presumed, at some period long lost in antiquity, to have put forth occasional leaves, but which now looks more like a tree growing root upwards—upon this elevation the principal array of telescopes was established, and the old pensioners who owned them, and adapted their focus to the eyes of the curious, found plenty of custom. A few years ago the first sight always demanded was "the men in chains"—the bodies of the pirates formerly suspended near the river side. But, alas! for the progress of civilisation; these entertaining objects have long since disappeared, and there is nothing of equal interest to supply their place, so that the pensioners are driven to invent fresh wonders. But what with the sights the visitors actually see, and what with those they persuade themselves they do, the end is apparently answered just the same. A few of the more reckless individuals were hurrying down the side of One Tree Hill, but the declivity was too steep, and the path too stony, to invite many adventurers. On the greensward below several merry parties were playing at the old game of "kiss in the ring;" others had established a party for "thread my needle:" and, in one less crowded corner of the park, we observed some dancing. We were somewhat astonished that we did not see more of this latter species of amusement, which, although forming the chief attraction of a fête on the Continent, is seldom followed at festivals of a similar nature in England, although amongst precisely the same class of people. A few orchestras disposed about the park for the dancers would have had a pleasing effect; but beyond the little group just mentioned, we witnessed nothing of the kind except the low riot and jostling in the canvass taverns of the fair, possibly the most objectionable features of the entire meeting.

The "fair" itself was a long narrow thoroughfare of stalls, booths, and shows in a lane leading from the town to the bridge at Deptford Creek, and formed the least attractive portion of the day's amusement. The crowd was so dense and disorderly as to threaten each minute the overthrow and deposition of the gilt gingerbread kings who were ranged on each side, and in front of Richardson's theatre was absolutely impassable. Besides this leviathan of travelling spectacles there were a few caravans of perambulating wonders, but not so many as we had witnessed on former occasions. One was an exhibition of human deformities in the shape of fingerless boys and fat girls, that we had occasionally seen in Tottenham-court-road and Castle-street towards evening, endeavouring to attract casual visitors until ordered off by the police, in anticipation of which not unfrequent event the horses were perpetually kept in the shafts. There were also some boa constrictors and crocodiles, on one of which in the picture outside a black child was represented as riding in an attitude of triumph. But looking at the pictorial representations of these wonders, and the caravan that was supposed to contain them, the chief marvel was the ingenuity of the contrivance that could dispose of such gigantic creations in so limited a receptacle. There was as usual an immense number of swings and roundabouts, together with "ups and downs" that looked frightfully insecure. The march of improvement had reached even these contrivances, and their cars were furnished with canopies of gay striped canvass, which gave them somewhat the appearance of eastern palanquins. But beyond these things there was very little to attract attention. The fair was evidently filled by the refuse of the park, and we were not sorry to fight our way out of its confusion and be once more allowed to breathe. The sole object of the greater part of its frequenters appeared to be to push their way violently through everything to its extreme limits and then to return again in the same manner.

GREENWICH PENSIONER.

"Well, here was the French, and there was we."

In the town every tavern and public-house was filled to overflowing with hungry, or rather thirsty, occupants, the clouds of tobacco smoke from the open windows proving the crowded state of the apartments. Great must have been the consumption of refreshments during the fair; for not only were the inns thus thronged, but also the eating-houses and tea and coffee-rooms had many more guests than they could reasonably accommodate, although there was by no means a scarcity of provisions. And even in the streets, on the stalls, this desire to administer to the cravings of the inward man was carried to the fullest extent. There were huge pieces of cold meat, from which "two-pen'orths" were cut and eagerly devoured; as well as tureens and fish-kettles of what appeared to be a species of eel broth, which was doled out in tea-cups on the investment of a halfpenny; together with endless strings of sausages, and large pans of pickled whelks; and, finally, various things meant to be eaten, as ocular demonstration proved beyond all doubt, but of texture and appearance that defied the keenest powers of investigation to discover what they were made of or intended for. Ginger-beer was quoted at a penny a bottle, and went off briskly; and oysters, as large as soup-plates, were offered at four for the same sum; whilst fried fish, liberally peppered with dust, were taken freely.

FORTUNE-TELLING.

As soon as it was dusk the steam-boats ceased plying; but the trains on the railway continued to run backwards and forwards every quarter of an hour. As we returned to town by the latter mode of conveyance, we met hundreds more proceeding to Greenwich, although at an advanced hour of the evening. Where they got to when they arrived (for the Park was by that time cleared of its company), or how they contrived to get home again when the fair closed, we cannot form the slightest idea. We had seen enough ourselves, and determined, before fatigue had turned our amusement into disgust, nor indeed were we sorry, at last to get clear of the increasing turmoil and confusion, to which, strange as it may appear, when we arrived in town, we found the usual bustle of Cheapside comparative seclusion and tranquillity.

THE EPPING HUNT.

The Epping Hunt, on Easter Monday, brings back many recollections of the good old days of suburban sports, when the Nimrods of the metropolis went forth, as in the earlier days of Chevy Chase, and gathered in hosts as numerous in Epping Forest as did the borderers of Northumberland on the warlike frontiers of Scotland. Fortunately the sportsmen of the metropolis were not so pugnacious, or at least not so bloodthirsty, as their northern predecessors; for though it must be admitted that on more occasions than one the pleasures of the chase were diversified by a pugilistic encounter or two, arising from too vehement a desire to excel in the display of horsemanship, or from the resentment of indignation at being unhorsed and laughed at in the ardour of the pursuit, the combatants were never seriously injured, and a couple of black eyes and a bloody nose corrected the exuberance of momentary excitement, and restored the parties to reason. Easter Monday was a glorious day, not only for that class of sportsmen with which, in the days alluded to, Whitechapel and the northern districts of London abounded, but to the whole class of bold riders from every part of the town who could procure anything in the shape of a horse to "carry them up to the hounds;" and fortunate, perhaps, it was for some of the quadrupeds employed for that purpose that the hounds were tolerably well fed, or for the moment more anxious for sport than food, or it is much more than probable the living carrion which constituted on these occasions a large portion of the "field" would have furnished a hearty meal for the canine participents in the "day's diversion." But be this as it may, the sportsmen from Whitechapel were on this eventful day joined by the sportsmen from all other parts of London and Westminster. On that occasion even the peripatetic commercials from Duke's-place, and the regions of St. Mary Axe, were seen mounted on capering steeds, careering to the scene of action, through Houndsditch, as triumphant as Mordecai when honoured by Haman in the palmy days of their Hebrew ancestors. Tothill-fields—or, in the sporting phrase, Tothill-downs—sent its contribution of "rough-riders" to the chace; and many a gallant Rosinante, reserved for a season from the inexorable pole-axe of the knackers of Lowman's Pond and Bermondsey, left the studs of the late Bill Gibbons and the celebrated Caleb Baldwin to make use of their last legs in the forest glades of Epping. But it was not only on horseback that the Actæons of that day made their way to Fairmead Bottom—the "venue," as the lawyers call it, or the "meet," as the mighty hunters before the Lord pronounce the locality of the commencement of the chace. It was in a vast variety of conveyances that the anxious and impatient mobs wended their way to that beautiful spot in the forest, Fairmead Bottom, to see the deer let loose from the cart, and join in the labours of his re-capture or death. There was a pleasing diversity of vehicles employed, and in motion from day-break, ay and long before the rosy-fingered morn unbarred the turnpike of Phœbus. There were then to be seen in long and rapid succession the Corinthian teams of the noble and the rich, the "heavy drag" of the more bulky and less opulent sportsmen of the four-in-hand, and the hackney-coach; the "go-cart" and the cart that was "no go"; the capacious omnibus of modern interpolation was then not known, or in its neophytic state as a fly waggon rolled heavily over Lea-bridge with a load of the foresters anxious for the chace and the sylvan honours of the glades.

To hunt the deer with hound and horn,

Some pushed along with four-in-hand,
Whilst others drove at random,
In curricle, dog-cart, whisky, one
Horse chaise or tandem.

The "Eagle" at Snaresbrook presented at an early hour a busy scene. The large pond in the immediate neighbourhood was well calculated to quench the thirst and cool the flanks of the "locomotives," and the fluids supplied by the landlord added fresh vigour to the drivers and riders of the same. This was a half-way rendezvous of the engines and engineers, and here all having recruited their strength, and confirmed their resolution of being in at the "take," proceeded to the well-known "Bald Face Stag," the "whereabuts" of "Thomas Rounding," Esq., huntsman in ordinary and also extraordinary of the day. Here Tom was to be seen in all his glory. His hunting-cap and coat, his buckskin breeches and top boots, mounted on the horse that had borne him through the toils of many a busy day. He was,—for, alas! he has been gathered to his fathers and grandfathers for some time, a famous fellow in his day. His acquaintance with the forest was as intimate as the knowledge of a pickpocket with the labyrinth of the Seven-dials:—

He knew each lane, and every alley green,
Dingle and bushy dell of those wild woods,
And every rocky bourne from side to side,—
His daily walks and ancient neighbourhood.

And he had need of all his knowledge on Easter Monday to keep his sylvans in order, prevent his hounds from being crushed to mince-meat by the feet of the horses and the wheels of the carriages, and rescue the deer from ultimate destruction, or premature capture, from the entanglement of actual lanes of men, women, children, quadrupeds, bipeds, carts, coaches, cars, &c. &c.

In the accompanying illustration is shown the manner in which the deer was released from the cart; the same mode is made use of with all packs of stag-hounds, and there was no novelty in this respect at Epping. The animal, on being released, usually made its way for the thickest part of the forest, as if conscious that some hundreds of the pursuers would very soon be unable to thread their way through the intricacies of the ground, and such was the case. All four-wheeled and all two-wheeled carriages were very soon put hors de combat. "What shall he have that kills the deer?" was a question that in a very few minutes became of personal interest to very few persons. As in another of the illustrations may be seen, it was not long before and as the "chace" increased, a series of accidents, as represented, was inevitable: some fell from their horses; many horses fell from their riders; some were engulphed in mud and mire; some were knocked "up," others were knocked "down;" and before half an hour had elapsed, not a tithe of the original "field" were to be seen in the forest. The deer had a trick which was to some peculiarly annoying, though others thought it capita fun: he would betake himself to one of the herds of his own species grazing in the forest, and then, instead of one quarry, the hounds and hunters had their choice of a score or two which to pursue. Here was perplexity, and that not a little increased by the hallooing of Tom Rounding, the yelping of dogs, the cursing of men, the cracking of whips, and the blowing of horns.

All this discordance, this Discord, harmony not understood was at length amended by the skill of Tom Rounding, who mana ed by some means or other to get a part of his pack upon the scent or track of the right deer, and the animal was, for the most part, ultimately driven to bay, as the cut exhibits, when, after a contest with the dogs, he was secured and taken back to the place from whence he came, not to immediate but to ultimate execution, i. e., to another day's sport at a subsequent anniversary. All this was followed, and indeed accompanied, by eating, drinking, singing, speechifying, and so forth; and, if no great encouragement to stag-hunting in its more legitimate sense, was the means of amusement to hundreds of people, excited mirth and merriment, enforced good-fellowship, and furnished good exercise and diversion. Real stag-hunting is a manly and noble amusement, and when pursued as in some parts of the New Forest a most exciting recreation. The artist by whom these illustrations have been contributed is now in Hampshire, taking views of the forest scenery with which that county abounds, with which it is intended to embellish a future description of the Easter sport.

STAG AT BAY.

As it has been said, truly, that there is no pleasure without some alloy, so is the axiom exhibited in reference to the progress of the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS, whose natural and extreme gratification at the grandeur of the ordinary success of their design, and the loud public applause with which it has been crowned, is at last, in some measure, marred by a drawback, which is nevertheless a source of pride in itself, and certainly a peculiar and unprecedented novelty in the history of newspaper literature. It is surely a new complaint, that public demand for any periodical should exceed the means of supply with commensurate rapidity, and baffle the most active energies and spirited enterprise to keep pace with the paradoxical pleasantry created. Yet so it is with the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS, and "increase of appetite" has so grown by what it fed on that at last it is found—in the present state of printing machinery, and with the most perfect practical machines for art-printing in England—impossible to work off within the allotted time of each successive week as many copies of the journal as the public eager demand. It is true that, by dint of extraordinary exertion, the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS has succeeded in augmenting its circulation larger in amount than that of any other paper in the empire—but daily application and experience have proved to the proprietors that this circulation would be more than doubled if it were possible to furnish a supply. This is an emergency which the proprietors are ready and anxious to meet; and, while they have sincerely to regret that any of their kind patrons should have been disappointed, or that their zealous friends, the newsmen, should from time to time have been tantalized by delays, have to announce their determination to track all the realms of enterprise in order to find the means of meeting the public wish, and of disseminating their journal as far as the most generous patronage would have it spread. They have, therefore, not lost one moment in plunging into a fresh and enormous outlay to this end, and they have now the honour to announce that they have contracted for the

upon a novel and beautiful model, and with a power equal to the rapid production of nearly

of the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS within the period now allotted to the working off of the number supplied. These new machines will be got ready with all possible speed, and in the meanwhile the proprietors have to entreat the patience of the public and the news trade—and to repeat the expression of their gratitude to both for the warm interest which has been taken in their behalf.

As, however, all golden rules have their exceptions, so within the last week it has been the lot of the proprietors to discover that some few tradesmen, unable to procure copies of their journal as fast as they required them, have forwarded to their subscribers other journals in its stead. This is a dishonest imposition, which they are determined to put down, and they here earnestly request any of their friends who may have been thus disappointed to give them information without delay, in order that the fraud may be in every case attended by its proper punishment.

 THE WEEKLY DISPATCH, in its last number, attacked the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS for its publication of the Government December Stamp Returns, which exhibited the unprecedented circulation of this paper, and which proved that we had progressed up to that circulation in the usual course of events. The DISPATCH, however, intimates that we had purchased stamps for the unworthy purpose of public deception, and stakes its veracity upon a prophecy (for it is a poor legerdemain to have to imagine data in the future, instead of taking them from the past) to the effect that the next returns from January to March (moved for before the DISPATCH published its prophecy, and therefore beyond the reach of any money influence of ours) will show a great reduction in our circulation—a reduction, hears our assuming prophet, to some sixteen thousand per week. We pass over the question this point, and we leave it to wait the publication of the next returns. We have only one other comment to make, and that is for the public. The great motive of journals generally to make the appearance of circulation is to promote their advertisement interest—but motive vanishes with us. We have never coveted, but have always limited, advertisements, and never will allow them unfairly to encroach upon a space which we have taught ourselves to consider the property of our readers. We have refused hundreds of advertisements during our brief but prosperous career, and can refer, though it be somewhat ungraceous, to those whose favours we have been obliged to decline.

NEWSPAPER CIRCULATION.

The Proprietors of the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS feel quite as much of the pleasure of gratitude as of the pleasure of triumph in being able to place the following Newspaper STAMP RETURNS, just issued from the printing office of the House of Commons, before our true friend and patron, the public. We leave society to make its own comments on a success which has been of its own fostering, merely remarking that the returns in question are only up to the close of the last year, and that since that period the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS has been experiencing a rapid weekly progression:—

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON, SATURDAY, APRIL 22, 1843.

When, a few weeks past, a number of merchants, bankers, shipowners, and capitalists of the City of London memorialized the Prime Minister upon the subject of relieving the distresses of the poorer classes by an enlarged and comprehensive Government scheme of colonization and emigration, we took occasion to make a few remarks of warning, and to intimate our jealousy of any plan that might lure families from their native country with flattering promises, which circumstances might, mischievously and almost fatally, place beyond the reach or possibility of fulfilment. We then did not hesitate to admit that it would be safer to commit the destinies of emigrants to the natural protection of a maternal government than to the tender mercies of private speculators, who, for years and years, have gone on forming associations to betray, to deceive, to ruin those whom they allured. A very dreadful instance of this engendering of calamity by delusive projects has been presented to public observation during the past week, and, upon grounds of humanity, we take it up for the consideration of our readers. The case in question obtained publicity at the Mansion-house on Wednesday last, and presents many remarkable and distressing features.

It appears that a society, calling itself the "British-American Association," had been established for the purpose of inducing emigration upon an extensive scale. The names of the Duke of Argyll and the Marquis of Downshire were procured to head the directorship; many other noblemen gave it their sanction, and no less than forty baronets committed the authority of their rank and respectability to favour the impression that the association was worthy of trust. As a consequence—and with the implicit reliance which the general integrity of our nobility has taught the industrious classes to place in the moral protection of the great—a number of poor persons, anxious to better their condition, and pinched with penury at home, eagerly seized upon the promises of the prospectus of the Association—and, scraping together all the humble means within their power, broke up their establishments at home, enrolled themselves as emigrants for Prince Edward's Island, and committed their destinies to a ship chartered by the company, and owned by one of the directors—paying previously for passage and provisions, and for certain prospective advantages when they should reach their "golden isle."

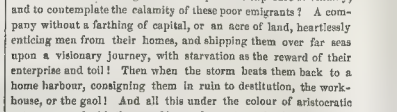
They embarked and sailed—and had made progress many hundreds of miles, when they were overtaken by tempest, and so distressed by evil weather, as to be obliged to put back and make for the harbour of Cork. There they remained for some time—there, if they be not driven from the shelter of their vessel, they remain still.

In the meanwhile the British-American Association is scattered to the four winds of Heaven: the Duke of Argyll has withdrawn from the presidency—the directors had dissolved their conclaves—the owner of the ship in which the emigrants sailed had mortgaged it—and the mortgagee gives official notice of its sale. This is tantamount to a process of ejectment against the wretched emigrants whose money, means, and hopes have vanished, and who are left desolate and homeless, with no bourne but the workhouse, and no remedy but a melancholy philosophy over their most cruel wrong.

By the advice, however, of the emigration superintendent, they seek the assistance of the Lord Mayor, and at the Mansion-house is elicited evidence of the most dreadful description—evidence of a practical delusion on the part of the shattered association little short of swindling — and most deeply humiliating, we should think, to those nobles and gentlemen who gave their names to the scheme—and whom we declare emphatically to be morally responsible for the condition in which the emigrants are placed—at all events, responsible to the extent of instantly relieving that condition. We shall take a few passages from the testimony in question :—

Mr. Campbell: The association is completely broken up. There have been several executions put into the house in Bridge-street, and owing to what passed at the Mansion-house in October last, the Duke of Argyll, the president to the society, has resigned. There are actions at this moment going on against the Duke of Argyll, the Marquis of Downshire, and Sir James Colquhoun. —The Lord Mayor: Then your company has not got together as a company?—Mr. Campbell: Yes, but they are broken up altogether.—The Lord Mayor: The association may be broken up, but there no demesne and gentlemen are not broken up. Are all those shareholders?—Mr. Campbell: No, they are only the vice-presidents and consulting council.—The Lord Mayor. How much of the million capital has been paid up?—Mr. Campbell: None at all. (Laughter.) Nobody paid up at all.—The Lord Mayor: Now, as you are a director, you can let me know what the plan was with respect to those emigrants if you had got them out to Prince Edward's Island.—Mr. Campbell: Twenty houses had been prepared to be occupied on their arrival. And what was then to become of them?—Mr. Campbell: They were to build more houses and work in other ways, and to be regularly located.—The Lord Mayor: And how were they to be maintained?—Mr. Campbell: There was a month's extra provisions going out, so that they would be provided for a month after landing.—The Lord Mayor: And then take their chance of starvation. That is certainly a fruitful alternative. These poor men have been deceived by the long list of titled names, and are now thrown into the most serious difficulties.—Mr. Campbell: I have been deceived myself most egregiously as to the month's extra provision, the general promise to give extra provisions for only a few days after arrival. The association in this adopted a most liberal plan.—The Lord Mayor: Why emigrants under such circumstances may die from sheer starvation.—Mr. Campbell: So they may. (Laughter.)—Mr. Taylor: I am reduced to pauperism with my large family, and cannot afford to employ a lawyer. I have not only lost my passage-money, but I have been obliged to sell my furniture; I had got together to apply to the purposes of labour in the cultivation of the land I expected to hold.—The Lord Mayor: I shall preserve on this inquiry to render you as much service as I can. Pray, Mr. Campbell, how many shares did these noblemen and baronets take?—Mr. Campbell: None at all. (Laughter.)—The Lord Mayor: I shall postpone the case, certainly, and I hope that some satisfaction may be obtained. I am decidedly of opinion that you have a claim upon the ship, and that she is bound to leave you at the place of your original destination. I suppose you would still go to Prince Edward's Island, Mr. Taylor?—Mr. Taylor: I should not wish to go without coming to a more clear understanding as to the power of the association. I understand that they have not an acre of land in Prince Edward's Island.—The Lord Mayor. What? No land there? Is that the case, Mr. Campbell?—Mr. Campbell: Not a single acre, my lord. (Great laughter.)—Mr. Henley: They bargained to sell me 150 acres. (Laughter.)—The Lord Mayor: It is quite impossible that any of those individuals, whose names have been used in this list, could have known of all this. Why, it is a most decided and heartless fraud. I would send the concoctors of it to Prince Edward's Island with a month's provisions. I consider the emigrants the dupes of a double conspiracy.

Is it not heart-rending to read this precious exposure of villainy, and to contemplate the calamity of these poor emigrants? A company without a farthing of capital, or an acre of land, heartlessly enticing men from their homes, and shipping them over far seas upon a visionary journey, with starvation as the reward of their enterprise and toil! Then when the storm beats them back to a home harbour, consigning them in ruin to destitution, the workhouse, or the gaol! And all this under the colour of aristocratic patronage, and with the cry of benevolence strengthening the hypocrisy of the treason and deceit. Justice calls aloud for retribution upon the criminals; and honour and humanity alike demand that the noblemen whose names have favoured the delusion should secure to the famishing victims compensation and redress.



THE COURT AND HAUT TON.

The Queen and Prince Albert, the ladies and gentlemen of the royal suite, and the household, attended divine service on Sunday morning in the Chapel Royal, Buckingham Palace. The sermon was preached by the Dean of Bocking, who took his text from Corinthians, chap. xv., verse 20. The service was read by the Rev. Mr. Vane, Deputy Clerk of the Closet in Waiting.

Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent attended divine service in the chapel at Kensington Palace. Lady Anna Maria Dawson was in waiting on her Royal Highness.

On Monday the Queen and Prince Albert enjoyed their usual early walk in the forenoon in the royal gardens. In the afternoon her Majesty and his Royal Highness took a carriage drive in an open barouche and four, attended by Lord Charles Wellesley and Colonel Bouverie, the Equerries in Waiting, on horseback.

Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent, Lady Anna Maria Dawson, and Mr. George Edward and the Hon. Mrs. Anson, joined the royal dinner circle at Buckingham Palace in the evening.

On Tuesday his Royal Highness Prince Albert, attended by Colonel Bouverie, honoured Sir Robert Peel with a visit at his residence in Whitehall-gardens, and inspected the collection of pictures of the right hon. baronet, visiting the picture gallery. His Royal Highness left soon after two o'clock, and returned to Buckingham Palace.—The Queen and Prince Albert walked in the royal gardens in the morning. In the afternoon her Majesty and his Royal Highness took an airing in an open barouche and four, attended by the Equerries in Waiting, Lord Charles Wellesley (Clerk Marshal), and Colonel Bouverie, on horseback.—The Earl of Jersey, Captain Francis Seymour (Scots Fusilier Guards), and the Misses Macdonald, had the honour of joining the royal dinner circle at Buckingham Palace in the evening.

On Wednesday the Queen and Prince Albert promenaded in the royal gardens of Buckingham Palace. Her Majesty and his Royal Highness took an airing in the afternoon in an open carriage and four. Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent dined with her Majesty and the household. There was no addition to the royal circle.

His Royal Highness Prince Albert, attended by Colonel Bouverie, honoured the Reform Club with a visit on Wednesday. His Royal Highness was conducted through the principal apartments by Mr. Walter Scott, the secretary, and afterwards inspected the kitchen department, the different arrangements of which were pointed out to his Royal Highness by M. Soyer. He also submitted to his Royal Highness's inspection the paintings by his late wife, Madame Soyer.

A gentleman has arrived in town from the Grand Duke of Mecklenburg Strelitz, who, it is understood, is deputed to arrange the preliminaries of the marriage of the Princess Augusta of Cambridge with the Hereditary Prince of Mecklenburg Strelitz. His Royal Highness is expected to arrive from the Continent about the 28th of the present month.

A licence was taken out on Saturday by the Earl of Leicester for the solemnization of his marriage with a daughter of Mr. S. Whitbread. The noble earl is twenty, and the lady seventeen.

STRATHFIELDSAYE.—Their Royal Highnesses the Duke and Duchess of Cambridge and the Princess Augusta were expected to arrive on Thursday on a visit to the Duke of Wellington. In addition to their Royal Highnesses, the Crown Prince of Wirtemburg was also expected, and several of the foreign corps diplomatique. Sir John and Lady Shelley had arrived, and Lord and Lady Henry Chomondeley. The Ambassadress of Douro and the Right Hon. Charles Arbuthnot are amongst his Grace's visitants. The Marquis of Douro embarked last week for Lisbon, on his way to visit the Duke of Wellington's estates in Portugal. His lordship will return to England early next month.

THE LATE EARL OF HOPETOUN.—The remains of this lamented nobleman were removed on Saturday from Stevens's Hotel, Bond-street, to the Scotch steamer at Barkwall, to be conveyed to the family mausoleum in Lord Hopetoun's estate. The funeral cortège was strictly private, consisting only of the late noble earl's two brothers and the servants.

DEATH OF LADY LUCY FRANCES LENNOX.—We have to announce the demise of the above young lady, third daughter of the Duke and Duchess of Richmond, who expired at Goodwood Park, the family seat in Sussex, at half-past twelve on Saturday night. The premature death of her ladyship in the flower of her youth has plunged the noble family into the deepest grief, although the fatal termination of her illness was feared by the medical gentlemen who have been in attendance during her indisposition. The deceased was born June 3, 1818. The Earl of March and Lord Alexander Lennox, who left town late on Saturday night, reached Goodwood at half-past four on Sunday morning.

We regret to announce the death of J. H. Allen, Esq., of Cresselly, Pembrokeshire, who formerly represented the borough of Pembroke in several Parliaments. The deceased gentleman married a daughter of the late Lord Robert Seymour, and was brother to the late Sir James Mackintosh and M. de Sismondi. He is succeeded in his estates in Wales by his son, Mr. Seymour Allen, of the 1st Life Guards.

CHURCH, UNIVERSITIES &c.

The Bishop of Salisbury consecrated Crockerton Church, Warminster, on Thursday. The right rev. prelate consecrated St. Peter's Church, Bishpert, Worcestershire, this day (Saturday).

CHINA.—The Bishop of London intends issuing a pastoral letter to the clergy of his diocese, directing that collections shall be made in every church and chapel on the Sunday after Ascension-day, in aid of the fund for providing religious instruction, in conformity with the principles of the Church of England, in China. A similar course is likely to be adopted by the other right rev. prelates.

The Bishop of Bangor has left London on a short visit to his diocese.

The Archdeaconry of Gibraltar has been conferred on the Rev. J. F. H. Le Mesurier, chaplain to the forces. Patron the bishop.

GENERAL POST-OFFICE ORDER.—CHINA.—The following notice has just been issued by the Postmaster General, and affixed at the branch offices at Charing-cross, Old Cavendish-street, and Blackman-street, Borough:—"Letters for China, the Australian colonies, New Zealand, the Mauritius, or other places beyond the territories of the East India Company, intended to be sent by the overland mails through India, must be addressed to the care of correspondents in that country; as it is understood that, under recent regulations, they will otherwise be detained at Bombay for payment of the transit and ship-letter postage due to the Indian Post-office for their conveyance to their destination. It is not necessary that letters for places within the territories of the East India Company, forwarded by the Indian mails, should be addressed to correspondents in India, provision being made for payment of the Indian postage above alluded to in those settlements. By command, W. L. MAHERLY, Secretary."

THE CASE OF THE PAUPER JOHN JONES.—In the course of the proceedings on Monday for the election of parish officers for the parish of St. Pancras, it was stated by Mr. M'Gibbey, the vestry clerk, that the Poor-law Commissioners had appointed a special commission to inquire into the conduct of the directors and guardians, and of their officers, in the case of John Jones, which was recently taken notice of in the House of Commons, and which formed the subject of a leader in this paper last week.

POSTSCRIPT.

Saturday Evening.

THE LATE DUKE OF SUSSEX.

Shortly after the demise of his Royal Highness the late Duke of Sussex Sir William Martins arrived at the palace, to make arrangements on the part of the Lord Chamberlain of her Majesty's household for the interment of the remains. Sir William remained at the palace until past five o'clock.

The royal corpse was laid out in the afternoon in the same room in which his Royal Highness died. The features and countenance a short time after the decease resumed their accustomed calm and expression.

MOURNING FOR THE LATE DUKE OF SUSSEX.

[SUPPLEMENT TO THE LONDON GAZETTE OF FRIDAY, APRIL 21.]

LORD CHAMBERLAIN'S OFFICE, Saturday, April 22.—Orders for the Court's going into Mourning, on Sunday next, the 23rd instant, for his late Royal Highness the Duke of Sussex, commands, these are to give public notice, that upon the melancholy occasion of the death of his late Royal Highness the Duke of Sussex, her Majesty's pleasure is that all persons do put themselves into decent mourning, for ten days, to commence from Sunday the 23rd inst.—Norolk, Earl Marshal.

LORD CHAMBERLAIN'S OFFICE, April .. —Notice is hereby given, that the Levee, intended to be held by his Royal Highness Prince Albert, at St. James's Palace, on Wednesday next, is postponed to Wednesday, the 7th of May next, at two o'clock.

CABINET MEETING.—The following Cabinet ministers had a meeting at eleven o'clock this morning, at the residence of Sir R. Peel, in Whitehall-gardens, viz.—The Lord Chancellor, the Duke of Buccleuch, the Earl of Aberdeen, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, Sir Henry Hardinge, Lord Wharncliffe, and Sir James Graham. After the meeting broke up the Lord Chancellor and some of the other ministers proceeded to St. James's Palace, for the purpose, it was supposed, of making arrangements respecting the funeral of the late Royal Highness the Duke of Sussex. The Lord Chancellor left the Court of Chancery at eleven o'clock to attend the meeting at Whitehall-gardens.

The mortal remains of H.R.H. late Royal Highness the Duke of Sussex will be deposited in the royal mausoleum in St George's Chapel, Windsor. The last receptacle of the royal family buried there was the late Princess Augusta, who died in August, 1840. His late Royal Highness officiated as chief mourner at the funeral of his late brother, King William IV., in July, 1837. The body will lie in state either at Kensington Palace or the Waterloo Chamber at Windsor Castle, and the funeral will be conducted in all respects similar to that of the late Duke of York.

The royal mausoleum was built by George III. under Cardinal Wolsey's magnificent tomb house, which reverted to the Crown upon the demise of that munificent minister.

There are stone stands for twelve coffins in the centre of the tomb, which are reserved for sovereigns. The coffins of the other members of the royal family are deposited on shelves at each side. The entrance is in the choir of St. George's Chapel.

The Queen and Prince Albert this morning took their usual walk in Buckingham Gardens. Her Majesty continues in excellent health.

Sir James Graham visited Sir Robert Peel this morning in Whitehall Gardens.

LEGAL PROMOTIONS.—We understand the following gentlemen of the common law bar have received silk gowns, and will take their seats as Queen's Counsel in a few days, viz.:—Sir Gregory Lewin, of the Northern Circuit; Mr. Roebuck, M.P. for Bath; Mr. Watson, M.P., Mr. Martin, and Mr. Talbot. Mr. Sergeant Wrightman receives a patent of precedence.

WALLINGFORD AGRICULTURAL DISTRESS.—The annual cattle, sheep, and horse fair at Wallingford took place on Thursday, and the agriculturists of the town and neighbourhood, and the friends of protection of British agriculture, dined together at the Town Hall, the meeting for the borough, W. S. Blackstone, Esq. in the chair, supported by Earl Stanhope, Viscount Barrington, M.P.; A. Baillie Cochrane, Esq., M.P.; F. Pusey, Esq., M.P., the Mayor; the Rev. Joseph Price, Rural Dean; Rev. Mr. Sibthorp, Loughboy, Bart.; the Rev. J. Dixon; and many other supporters of full protection to agriculture. About 120 persons sat down to table.

THE NEW INNS OF COURT IN LINCOLN'S INN.—On Thursday the first stone of the new courts of law in Lincoln's Inn was laid by the Vice-Chancellor Shadwell, assisted by Lord Lyndhurst, in the presence of a large assembly. After the ceremony was concluded a dinner took place in the court of the Lord Chancellor. It was originally intended that Prince Albert should have performed the ceremony, but, in consequence of not having a more suitable place to entertain his Royal Highness, it was abandoned. The Prince will, however, be invited to a sumptuous banquet on the completion of the buildings.

EAST SUFFOLK ELECTION.—IPSWICH, Friday Night, Ten o'clock.—FIRST DAY'S POLL.—Rendleshaw, 2554; Adair, 1643; Majority for Rendleshaw, 1011.

The packet-ship Europe, Captain Furber, which sailed from New York on the afternoon of the 1st instant, arrived at Liverpool on Thursday evening, after a fine run of 18 days. She has brought papers one day later than those received by the Columbia steam-ship, but they do not contain any news of interest.

VICE-CHANCELLORS' COURTS.—LORD HUNTINGTOWER'S BANKRUPTCY.—JUDGMENT.—His Honour (Vice-Chancellor Knight Bruce) delivered an elaborate judgment in the Court of Review, in the case of Forde v. Tollemache, which was a petition presented to set aside the commission of bankruptcy issued against Lord Huntingtower, of which his lordship was discharged from day to day. His Honour, after remarking on the principal facts of the case, concluded by ordering the petition to be dismissed with costs. This judgment establishes the validity of the commission pending against Lord Huntingtower.

MANSION HOUSE, Friday.—Shortly after one o'clock A. J. F Sintzenic was again placed at the bar of the Mansion House before the Lord Mayor and Mr. Alderman Farebrother, charged with attempting to shoot the Rev. Mr. Haddon, in St. Paul's Cathedral, on the afternoon of the 1st instant. After the depositions had been read and signed by the witnesses his lordship fully committed Sintzenic to take his trial at the ensuing Central Criminal Sessions.

FOREIGN.

PARIS, Wednesday.—The King and Queen of the Belgians arrived at St. Cloud in the afternoon of Tuesday. The political news is unimportant.

BELGIUM. The Belgian journals of Monday announce a change in the Belgian Ministry. The Moniteur Belge gives the following list:—M. de Theux, Cabinet and Foreign Affairs, General; Goblet d'Alviella, Justice. M. Jules d'Anethan, Advocate General of the Court of Appeal of Brussels, Finances. M. Edouard Mercier, member of the Chamber of Representatives, Public Works. M. Desclaimps, also member of the Chamber of Representatives; War. M. Dechamps, ex-colonel of artillery. M. Nothomb, who had sent in his resignation as Minister of the Interior, will retain his post; and M. de Muelenaere, who had also resigned, remains a member of the Council, without a portfolio.

Letters and journals from Calcutta of the 5th of March, brought to Alexandria by the extra steamer which left Suez on the 7th, by Cyclops, and to Marseilles by the Acheron, reached town yesterday morning. Colonel Fraser was a passenger, and the bearer, it was understood, of important despatches (official accounts, in all probability, of the victory obtained by Sir Charles Napier over the Ameers). The journals brought by this conveyance contain no news. Lord Ellenborough was at Agra, but was about to proceed to Delhi, in consequence of having received intelligence of the death of the Rajah of Gualior. There is nothing later than reached us by the late overland mail from either Scinde or Cabul.

The Medway Royal Mail Packet steamer reached Falmouth on Wednesday evening, bringing the important, though expected intelligence, that Pierre Boyer, the President of Hayti, had been compelled to fly, and to take refuge, with 32 of his adherents, on board her Majesty's ship Scylla, which sailed for Kingston, Jamaica, where she arrived on the 19th inst. Everything is clearly showing that the insurrectionists, or "patriots," as they call themselves, had continued their successful career, with little or no opposition. We must wait for the next arrival to know the individuals upon whom the future government of Hayti will fall, and the policy that they shall propose to adopt.

A court-martial was held on the 16th and 17th ult., on board her Majesty's ship Ironsun, on Lieutenant George Ordmixen, the officers and ship's company of her Majesty's late steam vessel Megæra, recently wrecked on Bare Bush Key. It appeared by the evidence adduced, that the wreck of the vessel was caused by an extraordinary current which was setting in shore on the night of the unfortunate disaster, and the court adjudged Lieutenant Ordmixen to be admonished in future, and the master, the second master, to be severely reprimanded; the other officers and ship's company to be acquitted.

ACCIDENTS AND OFFENCES.

Mr. Harley, a farmer, residing at Bolney, Sussex, committed suicide on Wednesday week, by hanging himself in a wood adjacent to his dwelling-house. He had been labouring for some time past under a general depression of spirits. Deceased was 50 years of age, and has left a wife and nine children unprovided for.

An alarming fire broke out at the residence of a gentleman named Fairway, on the Lewisham road, on Monday night last, which is supposed to be the work of an incendiary. The loss of property, which was only partially insured, is very considerable.

DREADFUL DEATH OF A CHILD THROUGH DRINKING SULPHURATED ACID.—On Tuesday, a fine little girl, named Elizabeth Conway, about three years of age, expired in the London Hospital, under the following shocking circumstances:—Her parents, who are poor but industrious people, reside at No. 26, Rosemary-lane, over an egg-merchant's shop, and who keeps, in rather a careless manner, a portion of sulphurated acid, or vitriol, in a ginger beer bottle, in the yard, for the purpose of giving a good colour to the ice. On the day since the unfortunate little creature went into the yard, and, finding the bottle, drank a quantity of the liquid, thinking it was water. No time was lost in removing her to the above institution, and a large portion of the poison was drawn off from the stomach; the sufferer, however, had received such severe injuries, that she died in the most excruciating pain, as above described.

ATTEMPTED SUICIDE AT HUNGERFORD PIER.—On Tuesday, between twelve and one o'clock, the crew on duty at the Hungerford Pier observed a respectably dressed female, apparently about forty years of age, pacing up and down the pier, who all of a sudden darted forward and threw herself from off the extreme end of the pier into the river. The tide at that time was running down very strong, and drifted her body to a considerable distance. Several watermen immediately put off to her assistance, and, fortunately, succeeded in rescuing her, and as she was immediately placed on a shutter, and conveyed to Charing-cross Hospital, where exertions were used to restore animation, and hopes are entertained of her recovery.

ROBBERY AT A CHURCH.—Information has been given to the lady named Boodle, residing at 18, Manchester-street, Manchester-square, was on the 11th instant, while leaving St. George's Church, robbed of a green silk purse containing two £10 bank notes, Nos. 35 381 and 35,382, dated 10th of February, and also a guinea, a sovereign, and 2s. 6d. in silver.

SOCIETY OF ARTS.—At a numerous special meeting, held last week, it was resolved, that, in consequence of the improvement in the funds and prospects of the society, it should resume the grants of gold and silver medals, and that engrossed or ornamented letters be occasionally given, by way of honorary testimonials.

The usual Easter dinner was given on Monday at the Mansion-house, when a large concourse of noblemen and members of Parliament partook of the civic hospitality.

It has been at length finally arranged to erect a new police court in the room of Union Hall, and a piece of ground has been purchased by Government for the purpose. The site of the intended new court is detached at Stones' End, in the Borough, at the eastern extremity of the Borough road, and within a short distance of the walls of the Queen's Bench Prison. Orders have been issued from the Home-office to commence the erection of the building immediately, so that it may be ready for business by the ensuing winter.

ALMACK'S.

Here, reader, you have such representation as inanimate art may effect of the mysterious arcanum of London Ton. Here is the temple of fashion, the once exclusive, ever dazzling, "Almack's." What magic once encircled its name—what charm once hung around its fascination—what power does it still exercise over the destinies of aristocracy and the ambition of the parvenus! To throw wide the door of Almack's was to put the crowning fiat upon the opening of the London season; to be the pet of its patroneesses was to bask in the very glow of fashionable sunshine; to be the habitué of the brilliant salons was to be par excellence of the haut monde—to be excluded was to expire on the threshhold of ton, or to bury grief in the meaner merriment of less recherché haunts. And so, with somewhat restricted influences, it still holds its reign. Still it leads off the gay pleasures which take their starting point from the London Easter—still it concentrates the fashion of the high world within its court of splendid elegance and refined display. Still it introduces the fresh beauty of the aristocratic heaven in bright galaxy of stars; still it honours foreign rank with its protection, and patronises native nobility with its regard; still it bestows its haughty frown upon the excluded or lavishes the smile of flattery and condescension upon those whom it has admitted to its shrine. Almack's is still most powerful, and where is the reader who does not find some interest at the announcement of its formidable name?

The series of balls which are given within its splendid rooms (those more vulgarly known as Willis's, in King-street, St. James's) are, all badinage apart, of most brilliant and recherché order. There is a pervading smile of triumph over the animated beauty of the assemblies which seems to mock the disappointed ambition of the rejected of Almack's, and not less does the gallant frowners of the devoted sex seem to glory in the sweet monopoly of loveliness which they there enjoy! The air of "exclusiveness," in a word, pervades all; and there is an unmistakeable free-masonry in its exercise which is interchanged with most delicious ease. Of course the leading rank of the nobility is there, and there is nothing plebeian in the atmosphere. Costume, manners, Terpsichorean pas and graces, gallopade, cotillon, mazourka—all are elegant alike. Exquisite beauty, lively wit, beau-ideal fashion, all sparkle in turn; but the brilliancy is one of repose, dazzling certainly, but full of sang froid and paradoxical, because both animated and nonchalant.

Almack's has formed a lively theme for the lyrist, the novelist, and the poet, and no doubt many a romance of life has been first fountained from its fashionable source. No doubt much frivolous love of false pleasure—much of the insincerity of ton-blandishments—much of the heartless devotion to selfish passion which love refuses to hallow with its name—much of the wickedness of worldliness the extravagance of ostentation—the wretched insolence of pride have been there engendered, and afterwards poured in streams of poison through society. No doubt it has been often, perhaps always, "school for scandal" and temple for detraction, and the insinuating slander of accomplished and fashionable envy. No doubt, also, that many a dream of happiness has been awakened there, and that some yet prosperous hath reclaiming, who look back to its scenes with joyous recollections and teeming memories of delight.

Those, however, who have been most prone to paint the world of Almack's, and give the relics to the dazzle of its coterie, have loved to cauterize it rather than to praise, and have spoken of its allurements with an evil voice. The writer, particularly, of a novel called "The Exclusives," which made a great sensation in its "moment"—for it hardly lived a day—made broad and glaring exposures of its mysteries, which greatly excited the world of fashion, and were anything but considered de rosse. The descriptions, however, were pungent, with a tinge of the poetical, and the characters were recognised (or affected so to be) as those of the Duke of Wellington, Lady Jersey, Lord Alvanley, Sir George Warrender, Princess Esterhazy, Princess Lieven, Lady Cowper (now Lady Palmerston), Lord Tullamore, Lord Ellenborough, the Hon. Spencer Percival, Frank Russell, the Hon. H. de Roos, Col. Trench, Lady Salisbury, the Dowager Duchess of Leeds, Lady Tankerville, Lady Hopetoun, George Anson, Lord Gower (since Lord Francis Egerton), and others, forming a very important section of fashionable life. Another novelist, who called his book "Almack's," without disguise, and who affected to be one of the initiated, thus couched his dedication:—

TO THAT MOST DISTINGUISHED AND DESPOTIC CONCLAVE,
Composed of their High Mightinesses
THE LADIES PATRONESSES OF THE BALLS AT ALMACK'S,
The Rulers of Fashion, the Arbiters of Taste,
The Leaders of Ton, and the Makers of Manners, Whose sovereign sway over "the world" of London has long been established on the firmest basis,
Whose Decrees are Laws, and from whose Judgment there is no appeal;

Who have formed, or who do form, any part of that

Whether Members of the Committee of Supply,
OR CABINET COUNSELLORS,

AN OLD SUBSCRIBER.

About the time of the introduction of the Mazourka into this country the "Songs of Almack's" were written by one of the Bayleys, and some of the incidental characteristics of the assemblies glanced at in verse. The necessity for combined grace and flexibility in the dance alluded to made more than one scion of the old school exclaim—

I used to like the minuet;
'Twas danced in my young days;
And now and then I do not mind
A gentle polonnaise.
A waltz is also passable;
I've shone in that before;
But this mazourka really is A very horrid bore!

Some ludicrous incidents in its dancing occurred that season Here is a playful quiz upon the happy contentment of a gentleman in the absence of his better half:—

My lord treads lightly o'er the floor—
My lord looks brave and gay;
From young and fair and debonair,
He does not turn away
As I have seen him turn before—
Tell me the reason pray.

My lord is laughing now as loud
As any man may laugh;
I never saw him smile before—
He seems more wise by half
Than when a dozen nights ago
I took him for—a calf!

My lord can flirt with Lady A,
And dance with Countess G——;
He look'd so stiff I often thought
He could not bend the knee—
But now I see in that quadrille
He trips it merrily.

My lord has twisted his moustache,
And curl'd his hair so bright,—
He promenades the gay saloon,
As if his heart were light;
And all because my Lady ——— fle!—
Has not been here to-night.

With this jeu d'esprit we dismiss those of our readers to Almack's as are of the favoured "received," and gently request those who may be rejected not to break their delicate hearts this summer; while to those who neither go, nor care to go, nor think of going, we can pay the compliment of believing that they entertain better ambitions, and have gratifications, if not more lively, at least of higher and more enduring cast—moreover we will further condescend to enlighten them with a technical description of the attraction from which they are contented to stay away.

Almack's Assembly Rooms are situate on the south side of King-street, St. James's, and are so called after Almack, the original proprietor, and often "Willis's Rooms," from the name of the present proprietor. The plan of the establishment is briefly as follows. To the left of the entrance-hall is a spacious supper-room, with orchestra-gallery, &c.; it is tastefully decorated, and to give stability to the dancing salon above are several supports, in the picturesque forms of palm-trees. From the hall you ascend by a handsome stone staircase to the suite of rooms, four in number, viz., an anti-room, tea-room, and the ball-room, to the right of which is a large card-room. The ball-room is one of the most spacious salons in the metropolis, its dimensions being about 100 feet in length, and 40 feet in width; it is chastely coloured—white and straw, relieved with gold and medallions of classic design; the draperies are blue and silver; and the vast apartment, when fully illuminated (with upwards of 500 wax-lights), has a most brilliant appearance. The greatest number of persons ever present in this room upon one occasion is stated at 1700.

LAUNCH OF HER MAJESTY'S STEAM FRIGATE "RATTLER."

On Thursday, the 13th, at half-past ten o'clock, about an hour before high water, the stupendous steam frigate Rattler was launched from the slips at the royal dockyard, Sheerness, into the waters of the Medway. This vessel is built on the principle of the invention of Mr. Smith, the patentee of the screw propeller, and will be immediately fitted up with boilers and engines and the necessary apparatus for working the screw. She is of a remarkably fine model, and from what can be judged of her appearance, will be a most efficient and warlike craft, when her masts, rigging, and guns are placed on board. She is of the same tonnage as the Polyphemus steam frigate, and of the same dimensions; that vessel has portable wheels in boxes, and is built in that respect upon the old principles of construction. The fact of this frigate, the Rattler, being now afloat, and about speedily to be fitted and completed for service, is important, because it will test the principle of the screw propeller effectually. The great advantages of this principle over the paddle-wheels and boxes, hitherto used in steam navigation, are that in vessels to be used as men-of-war the whole length of deck is uninterrupted, so that what is going on at the bows of the vessel can be seen from the stern, and vice versâ; and the whole battery of her guns can be worked uniformly, and under the direction of the captain. In short, the view not broken by paddle-boxes, and the deck, as it were, divided into two distinct parts. Another advantage is that the screw being under water is out of the way of mischief, and not liable to be damaged by shot; and a further advantage is, that she is capable of being turned about in a much smaller space than a steamer propelled by paddle-wheels, which, as everybody knows, takes an immense space in the water to perform her evolutions. Neither, it may be added, does the screw propeller retard the sailing powers of the vessel, which paddle-boxes must unavoidably do, from the awkwardness of their position and their largeness of dimensions. The Rattler was laid down about twelve months ago; she is built of oak, and constructed with great strength, which may be judged of from her deflexion or expansion upon the strain of launching being only half an inch. She does great credit to Mr. Atkins, the builder, who has shown his perfect professional knowledge in the building of this noble vessel. Her dimensions are as follow:—

	Feet.	In.
Length, extreme	195	0
Length on the deck	176	6
Length of the keel for tonnage	157	9½
Breadth, extreme	32	8½
Breadth, moulded	31	10
Depth in hold	18	7½

Burden in tons, 888 34 94

The Archimedes steamer started from Blackwall at eight in the morning, with a number of gentlemen on board, members of the "Patent Ship-propeller Company," and the friends of the patentees, with the intention of being present at the launch. Owing, however, to a change in the time of launching, the Archimedes did not reach the scene of action until an hour after the Rattler was gracefully floating on the bosom of the Medway. The Archimedes was laid alongside of the new steam frigate however, and the company expressed themselves highly gratified with the fine mould and beautiful appearance of the new vessel. If the Rattler succeeds, as there is every reason to think she will, it is probable that no steamer will in future be built for Government with paddles. It is hardly possible but that the screw will come into universal operation; and that this may be speedily the case, we trust, not only for the sake of navigation, but for that of the talented and enterprising individual whose exertions have done so much for applying, in the best and most scientific manner, the power of steam as a means of navigation.

After the Rattler had been duly inspected and admired, the Archimedes started for town, and screwed up the river against a strong ebb tide in an admirable manner, completing the distance from Sheerness to Blackwall in five hours and twenty minutes, and arriving at the latter place shortly after eight o'clock.

LABLACHE.

It is now upwards of a dozen years since the first welcome of the London public was bestowed on this most deserving favourite; and each season increasing, if there were any room for it, in public estimation, he has outgrown the very recollections of all his predecessors. It is hard properly to characterise the merit of Lablache; it is so Proteus-like that at one moment we would say, in the words written upon the Roman comedian, "Pro jocis, quibus cunctus oblectabat"—there never was such "a fellow of infinite humour;" and, in the next, we would esteem it as a "grande munus" if he would "reassume the weight and dignity of the tragic buskin." Lablache is essentially an actor, and of the greatest versatility; his singing powers, although extraordinary, are subservient, or rendered so, to the delicate discriminations of character which he is ever fond of making. His voice is uneven in its register; it is not a bass nor is it a barritone; it is stentorian in its middle and upper notes, and tells quoad vocem better in buffa music than in seria. It is his fine conception of acting that carries him through a tragic part, but in comedy he is revelling at his ease at home in the full luxuriance of his birthright—Neapolitan mirth. We have heard that Lablache was originally an orchestral performer—principal double-bass at San Carlo, and indebted to accident for the development of his dramatic genius. If so, what a discriminating old lady Dame Fortune often proves to be, blind as she is represented. To enumerate the characters, "from grave to gay," in which he is great, would be only to publish the contents of the Italian stage's repertoire: nothing comes amiss to him; and, like Persiani, he is always as ready to obligingly undertake a part as he is able to powerfully execute it. By-play forms the chief beauty of Lablache's acting. Who that ever saw him in Leporello, in the last scene, will not pronounce it inimitable? And again, the muttering his pater noster for his former wife, in "Il Turco in Italia;" could any but a mind deeply imbued with reflecting fun ever dream of such racy imaginings? We have yet a treat in store—his Don Pasquale: may we hope that it will be speedily produced, that "laughter, holding both his sides," may enjoy the highest comic treat that was ever coupled with sweet music. Oh! that he could but speak English (he could if he liked), and that we might hear him say, in the words of Sir John—"My lord, this is a poor mad soul; and she says, up and down the town, that her eldest son is like you." What a Falstaff would there be in the person of Lablache, and what a mind to "fill it withal!"

THE EXPLOSION AT WALTHAM ABBEY.

was our painful task to announce in our last the dreadful catastrophe which occurred at the gunpowder manufactory at Waltham Abbey, on Thursday, the 13th instant, by which seven unfortunate individuals were prematurely hurried into eternity, and we

FIRST EXPLOSION.

RUINS OF THE FOURTH MILL.

WALTHAM ABBEY—FUNERAL OF THE UNFORTUNATE WORKMEN.

this day lay before our readers a series of graphic sketches illustrative of the deplorable event and its consequences, which may perhaps be interesting to our readers.

The gunpowder mills at Waltham Abbey stand at some distance out of the town, on the side of a broad running stream, which branches out of the river Lea, is the property of Government, and is called Powder-mill River. Here a series of erections connected with the public service are found. They are built of wood, with slated roofs, and are termed Corning-houses, Press-houses, Washing-houses, and Glazing-mills. Four of these edifices, about 80 feet in length, and 29 or 30 feet in depth, have been destroyed—so completely demolished that nothing like the form of any one of them remains. Each is a black shapeless ruin. It is proper to state that they had been constructed on a plan which promised, in the event of an accident, to prevent the evil from extending beyond the place in which it originated. Between the corning-houses and the pressing and washing-houses, a strong brick buttress, 20 feet high, 15 feet thick, and 30 feet deep, had been built, which it was supposed would have proved an effectual barrier to the progress of fire. The hope, however, has proved vain. On Thursday se'nnight, the business being carried on in the usual way, about five minutes after three o'clock an explosion took place in the more northern corning-house. A few seconds afterwards the press-house and washing-house, separated from the corning-house by the buttress, also blew up. In a minute or two from that time the next corning-house, distant from the former about 200 yards, shared the same fate, and that in a few seconds was followed by a fourth explosion, and a second press-house and washing-house, separated, as in the other case, from the corning-house, were in an instant destroyed.

The corning-house No. 2, in which the explosion originated, was situated in the midst of a group of poplars and willows—trees being generally planted near buildings of this kind in consequence of the resistance they afford to any communication with a distant object, should an accident arise. In this instance they have been proved altogether ineffectual—trunks two feet in diameter have been snapped asunder and thrown to a distance of several hundred feet, while those which still keep the erect position are entirely bereft of branches.

It would be well if the ruin of the buildings, and the destruction of the stores, were all; but, unfortunately, in the works which first blew up a number of unfortunate persons were employed, not one of whom survives. Seven men were in an instant dismissed from life; five of them were carried over the river to a very considerable distance, and fell lifeless fragments in the marshes. One corpse was recovered from the ruins, and one dead body was found out of the building, but on the same side of the river. It was difficult to recognise the deceased, they were so blackened, shattered, and disfigured. The names of the unfortunate men who have perished are as follow:—Thomas Sadd, Edward Essex, John Newland, John Dudley, James Luck, Samuel Brown, and James Cole. Mr. Sadd was the master worker. On Thursday week he had been in the building but about ten minutes when the event occurred. The victims were all corning-housemen and persons of respectable character. Essex had worked on the establishment for more than half a century. Sadd's remains were soon identified by the blue coat which he wore, and by the loss of one tooth. He was said to have been carried not less than 130 yards from the corning-house, and to have lost one foot when he reached the ground. At a considerable distance from the ruins the impression made by the fall of one of the sufferers remains very distinct. The marks of the head, the shoulder, the hip, and the leg, were on Friday week most distinctly traced; and the indentation made by the body was in some parts nearly six inches deep.

Immediately after the accident many hundreds of persons repaired to the marshes. The bodies were collected, wrapped in sheets, and deposited in one of the buildings belonging to Government, at some distance from the ruins, there to await the orders which may be given for holding a coroner's inquest.

The alarm caused by this accident it is not easy to describe. A third and fourth building having been fired, from others that had exploded, distant from them 600 feet, it was not immediately clear that those which were still further off were safe. Not only were many windows in the town, and especially in the church, broken, but the effects of the shock were felt at a much greater distance. Almost incredible as it may appear, the report of the two explosions was distinctly audible in the metropolis. In Hyde-park, about ten minutes past three o'clock, they were heard, and amidst the prevailing stillness appeared so loud that several persons imagined that they proceed from the guns fired in celebration of her Majesty's accouchement. A lamp and several squares of glass at the Waltham Abbey station of the North-eastern Railway were broken by the concussion, and its mischievous effects were felt at Waltham Cross. The window of Trinity Chapel, the east end of Cheshunt parish church, which stands by the side of the main road, suffered considerably. Five females, who were collecting wood at a distance of more than a quarter of a mile from the mills, were thrown down, and for a moment deprived of sight by the explosion, and the accompanying glare. The quantity of gunpowder in the works at the time is supposed to have exceeded 4000 lb., and the amount of property destroyed is estimated at nearly £12,000.

The interest felt with respect to this deplorable catastrophe, so far from having diminished on Saturday, was, if possible, greatly increased, not only in the immediate locality, but in the surrounding country. At ten o'clock on the morning of that day Mr. Lewis, the coroner, attended on the spot, accompanied by a respectable jury, to inquire into the particulars of the shocking event. After the jury had been sworn they adjourned to a place called the Barrel, situated near the scene of the sad catastrophe, to view the blackened and mutilated remains of the poor men whose lives had been lost by this melancholy occurrence. Some of the corpses had the limbs detached in a most frightful manner.

On the return of the jury a great number of witnesses were examined, touching the state of the machinery and the circumstances under which the unfortunate men killed were last seen alive.

Capt. George St. Vincent Wattmore, commanding the Royal Engineers, deposed to the fact that a formal report was made to his office monthly of the state of the machinery, and the report he received on the 3rd instant was perfectly satisfactory. He said that had there been less powder in the corning-house than there was it would have had no effect upon the explosion. It would have been just the same whether the quantity were 40 barrels or 40 barrels. He further gave evidence to state that persons making powder in Government establishments were never hurried. There was no necessity that they should be hurried. They were never called on to make a particular quantity of powder by a particular day. The cause of the accident was quite unknown to him. An electric shock would ignite gunpowder, and make it explode.

Several other witnesses having been examined to the same effect, the coroner briefly addressed the jury, who retired for a few minutes, and returned with a verdict of "Accidental death," accompanied by an expression of their unanimous opinion that the manufactory appeared to have been conducted by Captain Tulloch, the inspector, with every possible precaution for the safety of the persons employed under his superintendence.

The deceased were all married men. Mr. Sadd has left a widow and one child; John Newland a widow and eight children, most of them, however, are grown up; Edward Essex, a widow and two grown-up children; James Cole, a widow and four children; James Luck, a widow and one child; John Dudley, a widow and one child; and Samuel Brown, a widow and two children.

The interment of the bodies, with the exception of that of Mr. Sadd, which was removed to a family burial-ground at some distance, took place on Saturday afternoon, at five o'clock, in the parish churchyard. A great number of persons assembled to witness the solemn scene, and a feeling of deep sorrow for the fate of the unfortunate men evidently filled the minds of all present. The tragical occurrence has made an impression on the people of the village and neighbourhood which will not be effaced during life.

In the course of Saturday some bulstickers from an obscure London weekly print, which appears desirous of acquiring notoriety at any sacrifice, came into the town and put up placards, announcing a full report of what had occurred. The townspeople did not feel flattered by this mark of attention, and the bills were torn down. Their remark was that all the particulars were already sufficiently known there, and those who were bereft of their friends did not wish to be further reminded of the calamity. The funerals were conducted in the most respectable manner—it was understood at the expense of the Government. Captain Tulloch, who has the chief direction of the works, is noticed in his most feeling way to the widows and others who are sufferers from this mournful accident that every effort will be made to alleviate their affliction.

MUSIC.

National Irish Minstrelsy.—We are glad to perceive that Mr. White, the Irish melodist, continues his highly popular entertainments, at the Hanover-square Rooms, with gradually increasing success, and that arrangements are being made for gratifying the lovers of Irish music by holding a Grand Bardic Festival, to be got up on an unprecedentedly magnificent scale, at one of the royal theatres. We cannot doubt that there is sufficient Irish patriotism in London to compensate this talented and enterprising gentleman for his novel and interesting undertaking. Mr. White's last entertainments were entitled "A Night with Tom Moore," on which occasion he delivered a beautiful lecture on the national minstrelsy of Ireland, in which full justice was done to the genius of the bard of Erin. The conclusion of the lecture we considered exceedingly appropriate. "My imagination leads me," said Mr. White, "at this moment to behold 'the bard of Erin' in the evening of his day, after a life of genius variously and honourably employed, peacefully reclining under the shade of his well-won laurels, enthroned amid a brilliant circle of those fair worshippers at the shrine of Irish genius whose 'sensitive hearts and sun-bright eyes' he celebrated in his youth, and thus exclaiming aloud in the fullness of heart—

'When youth's bright days are o'er,
And hope's young fancies flee!
And boyhood's dreams no more
Their halo round me shed—
When smiles that lit up joy
Through pleasure and through pain,—
When all those joys are gone
How can I love again?'"

DRAMATIC AND MUSICAL CHIT CHAT.

Handel in Italy.—It is with pride and pleasure we learn that the "Messiah" of our adopted musical Samson was to be produced at the Conservatoire of Milan during Passion-week. This shows there are yet some in Italy who have a taste beyond roulading and unmeaning foreiture. We question very much, however, if ample justice can be yet be done to that immortal work, even in the land of song—particularly in its choruses, which require long study and habitual acquaintance.

Fine Names.—Mdlle. Löwe is shortly to appear at Genoa, in the opera of "Nabucodonasar," with the tenore Eugenio Musick and the basso cantante Raffaele Perlotti!

National Encouragement.—We have heard that a certain illustrious personage at Madrid is about to erect a theatre for the exclusive production of native operas. If certain illustrious personages in our land were to follow the example, we should not so often read of the triumphs, in other lands, of exiled "sons of song!"

She Would and She Would Not!—It is with great pleasure we hear that the celebrated vocalist Mrs. Wood has returned from the gloom of a convent to the domestic cheerfulness of her home. We indulge in a reasonable hope that we may once more be gratified—nay, delighted—by hearing her "discourse most eloquent music."

NEW MUSIC.

Once more that Lay, my sweet Lucille. Ballad by Labitzki. Tolkien.

Labitzki, we believe, is the author of some favourite waltzes, à la Strauss, which have undergone all the contortions of mutilation, adaptation, and vocalisation, as in the present instance is most cruelly set forth, that is, if he ever published or acknowledged such a vile parody upon Reisiger's waltz (commonly called Weber's last) as this specimen of misapplied ingenuity exhibits. The discrepancies of the two prosodies, those of the poetry (?) and music, render the thing totally unworthy of serious criticism.

The Summer Flowers are nearly past. The words by Thomas Haynes Bayley, Esq.; the music by John Barnett. L. Williams and Son.

This must have been written when the early spring promises of Barnett's undoubted genius blossomed more under the influence of an ardent hope than of a matured judgment. He would not write so now, unless under the influence of carelessness or indifference—a state into which we trust he has not yet, nor ever will fall, whatever we may think of his late silence and the avowed cause of it.

The Hunter's Bride. Tyrolean Song, by Madame Stockhausen. The music by Edward F. Reinbault. L. Williams and Son.

A graceful, unobjectionable trifle, if it were not the echo of a thousand predecessors in the same style.

Deuxieme Grand Concerto, en F mineur, pour le Pianoforte; dédié à Madame Anderson (de Londres). Par Frederic Chopin (de Varsovie). Wessell and Stapleton.

The opening tutti of this concerto is spirited and well conceived: the subject at page 2, first played by the wind instruments and then taken up by the violins, is graceful and agreeably plaintive; but we do not exactly understand the connection between bar 5 (stave 3) and bar 1 (stave 4); neither is the harmony of bar 1 (stave 5) unexceptionable. But the chief fault of this composition is its restless excursiveness, its total want of figure, and scantiness of melody. The same passages for the two hands to be played simultaneously (with which every movement in this concerto abounds) produce a certain forcible effect, it is true; but such tours de force are not in the genius of the instrument: it has been shown to be capable of higher and better things; and he who makes it a corde volante to twirl his dexterities upon injures and debases it, at the same time that he compromises his own character as a musician.

Indian Quadrilles, Royal Scotch Quadrilles, Royal Highlanders' Quadrilles, Medley Country Dance, The Duke of Cornwall Quadrilles, composed and arranged by John Weippert for the Pianoforte. Weippert, Soho-square.

It would be uselessly taking up our own space and, what we value more, the attention of our readers, if we were to review this fasciculus of quadrilles seriatim. There is little or no real difference between one set of quadrilles and another, so far as true music is concerned. As long as they are metronomically constructed it is no matter whether they proceed from Kamschatka or Otaheite—India or the Highlands of Scotland. Moreover, whatever Mons. Quadrille touches he mutilates, and therefore we are not much inclined towards his habitual desecrations. Since the first set of the "Lancers" we have had nothing but arrangements and derangements of what should have been held sacred in the art. By the way we should like to know what is the meaning of the lithographic portrait of an elderly gentleman on the title-page of "The Duke of Cornwall Quadrilles." May there not be an error of the press, and for "Cornwall" read "Devonshire?"

THE FASHIONS.

Paris, Rue Chaussée d'Antin, April 17, 1845.

Mon cher Monsieur,—Our great and long-expected fête of Longchamps is at length past, and a more irksome and cumbrous affair, so far as fashion is concerned, has not been witnessed for many years; indeed, so poor was the assemblage that it would be unfair to form any judgment of our fashions by what was observable there: I shall, therefore, confine my observations to costumes I have met with in the public streets, in public promenades, and in close reunions wherein are to be seen the most fashionable women whom Paris can boast, and whose invariable good taste is a guarantee for the excellence of everything they wear. To the first place let me remark that the approaching season does not appear to have diminished in the slightest degree the vogue for black lace; on the contrary, it would appear to be an article of indispensable necessity in the completion of every description of toilette. We see it produced in every shape and form, lace cannaits, lace scarfs, lace flounces and lace trimmings; in fact, it appears to be an article of general use and general fashion. In our public promenades I have remarked, with much pleasure, the appearance of robes in Chinese Pekins of a dark colour, ornamented in alternate squares by an embroidery of pearl-coloured gauze, disposed lozenge fashion. The corsage of these robes is half high, with a triple fold, the front trimmed with a puffing of the same stuff laid upon the fold from the middle of it for about one half of the corsage, whence it springs on each side to the epaulette; an edging of pearl-coloured gauze placed upon the fold serves for a border, and the sleeves are quite plain. Another robe I observed was made of dark-coloured cashmere, worked in spots upon the front of the skirt. The corsage of this dress was high and plain, but entirely draped with embroidery: the sleeves plain, and worked in the form of Hungarian dresses. Both of these costumes were very pretty and very graceful. As a general observation, I am inclined to say, though I do not attach much importance to the alterations that at the present moment robes are made somewhat longer, but less wide, than has been the fashion latterly. The corsage of full-dress robes is plain, pointed, and made in three parts; half-dress robes are gathered in the back, and have the front plain, with three large plaits. It is very difficult, at the present moment, to say what is the prevailing mode in hats or cuputes, or to give any positive details for some few days yet to come. So far, however, as I can judge, I should say they are worn with the pane small, but with long side-pieces coming low on the face. The course of a very few days, however, will enable me to give more accurate details upon this subject. I have already mentioned to you the very general use of the hair tissues for under petticoats: the improvements that have been made in this invention and the perfection to which it has been brought are perfectly marvellous, and, as you may suppose, add greatly to the set of the upper garment. The article of pocket-handkerchiefs still continues to be made as much an article of luxury as ever, and, really, the taste with which they are got up here is beyond all praise. Only very recently I had an opportunity of examining some destined for the trousseaux of three very high and distinguished families, and I declare to you I have seldom or never seen anything more beautiful either in design or execution. The embroidery on them was perfectly exquisite; the lace and the bizzonry together gave them an air of extraordinary richness; and the whole formed a most consummately particular regent. I trust my next communication will be more valuable. Adieu, &c.,

Henriette de B.

TO THE COMET.

"Thereby hangs a tail."—Shakspere.

Lone wanderer of the trackless sky!
Companionless! Say, dost thou fly
Along thy solitary path,
A flaming messenger of wrath—
Warning with thy portentous train
Of earthquake, plague, and battle-pain?

Some say that thou dost never fail
To bring some misfortune in thy tail;
For ignorance doth ever see,
Wrapped in its vain credulity,
Coupled some dire mishap with thee.

Rare visitant! Since last thy light
Flamed on the starry brow of night
How much of change—of weal and woe—
Hath mingled in this scene below!
And thou the while, with thy lightning wing,
Whither hast thou been journeying?
Other systems hast thou been near,
Whose peopled planets have looked on thee
With the like feelings of awe and fear.

Eager to dive, as we are here,
Into the depths of thy mystery?
Or, of a higher intelligence,
Can they discern thy purpose clear,
And note the way thou dost dispense
The bounties of Beneficence?

Baffler of human wisdom! when
Wilt thou disclose to mortal ken
The wondrous mystery round thee thrown—
Thy purpose and thy being make known?
What art thou? Riddle of the sky!
Thou puzzle of philosophy!
Those office what? Hath human wit
In vague surmise conjectured it?
Or Science e'er one scheme revolved
Which hath aright the problem solved?

Art thou, as quaintly told in story,
For sinning souls a purgatory?
The fierce ordeal, cold and heat
Alternately in thee to meet:
Thick-ribbed in ice at thy aphelion,
And scorched with fire at perihelion.

Or, art thou some young runaway star,
Enticed from thine own bright system afar,
To rove awhile 'mid the orbs that lie
Far scattered throughout immensity?

Or, as some sage philosopher
Doth with dogmatic tone aver,
A liquid globe solidifying—
Thy garments in the sunbeams drying?

If true, there's then no fear thou'lt smoke us;
For quoth he (surely not to joke us)
"Th solve the riddle hocus-pocus—
'Tis nought but rays drawn to a focus"!

So doth sagaciously explain
The marvel of thy fiery train.

Or, if we cannot credit these
So fanciful hypotheses,
Shall we one jot be nearer right,
If in opinion we unite
With chymisters, in thinking thee
A mass of electricity,
Which round Creation's skirts doth run,
Collecting fuel for the sun?

Art thou, as some incline to think,
With other worlds connecting link?

Or, if thou'rt neath Sol's sole domination
(As seems most orthodox opinion),
What is the twofold power which still Fashions thy course and sped at will?
First dost thou flee on a headlong race
Far in illimitable space;
And then, anon, with slackened pace,
As repented, homeward turns thy face
Coming with force centrifugal
Its opposite, centripetal,
In mixture strange—as sometimes seen
'Mong mortals in the snug terrene.
Just as some maids, if lovers burn,
Quick into icicles will turn;
But, should their ardour cool, why they
Melt into loving mood straightway:
As though, when the ruforic went
From me now 'twas into Ottilie's sent.
So, when thou'rt furthest to thy course
The sun exhibits most his force;
And then exertest most thine own
When near'st thy monarch's burning throne.

But 'tis in vain we speculate
In what may be thy mystic state:
Vague guesses all! We cannot part
The gloom which hangs o'er what thou art.

Enough for us—thou dost fulfil
The mandate of Jehovah's will—
In thine erratic mansion sent Wide through the starry firmament.

As genius on its devious way—
Though to the plodding sons of care
Lawless it seems to go astray—
Hath its appointed limits there:
So thou, though seeming'st run riot,
Art bound by the Almighty fiat—
Urged by the same unerring Cause
That gave the circling planets wave.

NATIONAL SPORTS.

NEWMARKET CRAVEN MEETING.

Of all the weeks in the year, the motto of that whose end we have now to deplore is sua cuique voluptas. Easter is everybody's holyday, from the exquisite who lives upon the air—of the last new opera, and moves by the grace of one of Adams's double-spring barouches, to the indigent who "bolts" fat bacon, and swings upon a gate. Cudgel-playing and the ancient concerts, Greenwich fair and the British Gallery, Windsor Castle and the Eagle Tavern—these, and a thousand similar treats, await the true-born Briton who, in the spirit of a proper patriotism, "lives at home at ease." And to such as may not, haply, be so placed as that these pleasures should be within scope of their immediate enjoyment, are there not these columns, wherein they may read of all that passes in this happy land, as in a library, and look upon each scene in its counterfeit presentment, even as in nature itself? Such being the case, leaving to others to cater for other tastes—and well they will provide—we enter upon our peculiar province, and hasten to tell of all that befel, and promises to arise out of, the event named at the head of our paper. The Newmarket Craven week set in with the good old fashioned weather once common to the season, and both for company and meet preparation was all that need have been desired. If the sport was not the most brilliant, certainly the deductions from it are of great moment to very many whom they will concern. Cotherstone, the previous outsider for the Derby during the greater portion of the winter, won in a canter both the great races—the Riddleworth and the Column—and is now the best favourite for the great Epsom event! Here is a revolution for the book makers. Then some another outsider, Gaper, lately at 50 to 1., now at one-fifth of that price, and looking up! There Cataract, a horse backed by his party for "a mint of money," runs on Wednesday for 100 sovs, sweepstakes, with 3 to 1 on him, and is beaten by an "Irisher" with an awful name, one "Bourra Tomacha," with graceful ease. All these things have put the cup the qui rive. Already has the spring running murdered the sleep of the speculative. There will be great efforts made to square accounts of the Craven. The shape they will assume at Chester will most probably be a cross—this is our "ex post."

We understand that Lord Verolam has challenged all England with Robert de Gorham, to run the two middle miles at Newmarket, for 500 guineas a side, provided he is allowed 3 lb., to which he considers his position, as a public challenger, entitles him. It is rumoured that the Duke of Bedford has accepted with Bovoy. Should the match come off, of which we entertain but little doubt, it will excite greater interest than has been known at Newmarket since the days of Scamblesons and Diamond.

"Several members of the Jockey Club," says the Press, "persuaded that the breed of French horses can only be improved by the introduction of thoroughbred English blood, and that the success of the superior cavalry of the Arab breed are only imaginary, have proposed a wager of 5000 lb. as the French horses against all others, of no matter what origin, Turk, Arab, Persian, African, &c., to go from Paris to Bordeaux. They allow their challenge to remain open for six months."

LAW INTELLIGENCE.

Easter term commenced on Wednesday. The judges, Queen's counsel, serjeants, and other dignitaries of the law, after breakfasting with the Lord Chancellor in George street, Hanover-square, proceeded in state to Westminster Hall and opened the usual formalities with the usual formalities. In the Queen's Bench their lordships took their seats on the bench at half-past one o'clock, but in this, and in the other courts, the business was uninteresting, except to parties concerned.

COURT OF CHANCERY.

WEDNESDAY.—This was the first day of the sittings in Easter Term. The court was opened by the Lord Chancellor and the other equity judges, at half-past one, and his lordship heard motions of appeal.

NEEDHAM V. NEEDHAM.

Mr Wright moved to discharge an order of the Vice-Chancellor Wigram, directing the defendant Colonel Needham to pay £18,000 into court, on the ground that the interest on which the money was to be paid had been added to a supplemental order, instead of forming part of the decree itself.—Mr. Calvert opposed the motion, stating that the order had been made by the Vice-Chancellor, and afterwards, after hearing the opinion of one of the other judges of the court and the officers, who thought that such a course was perfectly regular—The Lord Chancellor, as the sum was a large one, said he would consult the officers, and, probably, some of the other judges before he decided.

COURT OF QUEEN'S BENCH.

WEDNESDAY.—The judges, after breakfasting with the Lord Chancellor, came down to Westminster in procession, and then entered their respective courts The judges who took their seats in the full court for the term were Lord Denman, Mr. Justice Patteson, Mr. Justice Williams, and Mr. Justice Wightman.

EXPARTE THE TOWN COUNCIL OF MAIDENHEAD V. THE DIRECTORS OF THE GREAT WESTERN RAILWAY.

The Attorney-General moved for a rule to show cause why a mandamus should not issue to the defendants, commanding them to pay a sum of £2000 to the town-council of the borough of Maidenhead. The circumstances out of which the application arose were these:—The corporation of Maidenhead was possessed of an ancient bridge over the Thames, and was entitled to receive certain tolls in respect of the same. There had been in respect of this bridge a debt of nearly £30,000 incurred, and when some years ago, the first bill for making a railway from Bristol was passing through Parliament, there had been the necessary steps taken to protect the corporation from the loss which would happen in the tolls on account of the decreased traffic on the road, at the time the company should make a railway from Bristol to join the Birmingham railway at a place mentioned in the bill; and the bill, with a view to secure the corporation of Maidenhead from loss, contained a clause to the effect that if, during the first three years, to be computed from the expiration of one calendar month after the making of the Bristol railway, to a space within thirty miles of its proposed junction with the Birmingham railway, there should be a decrease in the tolls received on account of the Maidenhead-bridge, then the railway directors should pay a sum equal to ten years' purchase of such amount of decrease, so as such sum shall not exceed £2000. The original plan for the railway from Bristol was afterwards altered, and instead of its joining the Birmingham, and so coming to London, it was determined to bring it to London, and give it a terminus of its own. The tolls taken in respect of the Maidenhead-bridge had decreased considerably, and the town council, with a view to obtain money to discharge a part of the debt incurred on account of it, had applied to the directors of the company for payment, under the provisions of the act which the last first mentioned to the court. The directors, however, answered that the subscription act, which enlarged the remains, had in fact repealed the former act for this purpose, and had put an end to their liability. It was to have this question decided that this mandamus was now applied for.—The court granted a rule to show cause.

POLICE.

BOW-STREET.—A young woman, elegantly attired, and of highly-respectable appearance, who gave the name of Jane Smith, was committed to Newgate by Mr. Hall, from this office, on Monday last, on a charge of stealing a quantity of lace, valued at about £5 9s., the property of a Mr. Simons, a lacemen, residing at 319, High Holborn.

Henry Turner, a middle-aged man of respectable appearance, was charged before Mr. Twyford, on suspicion of receiving four diamond rings, the property of a Mr. Smith, knowing them to have been stolen. Mr. Dennett attended for the prosecution, and stated that on the 19th of December two persons called at the shop of Mr. Smith, a jeweller in Duke-street, Lincoln's Inn Fields, and desired to look at some rings. After they had looked at several "trays of rings," they left a piece of jewellery, of little value to be repaired, and then went away. In the course of the same evening Mr. Smith discovered that four diamond rings were gone, one of them being worth upwards of £50. The prisoner was followed on the following morning offering three of the "stones" at his own house to a Mr. Rotherhild, who afterwards transferred them to a Mr. Charman, a jeweller, in Berwick-street, Soho. By the latter person the prisoner was traced, and that on the 19th of December two persons called at the shop of Mr. Smith, a jeweller in Duke-street, Lincoln's Inn Fields, and desired to look at some rings. After they had looked at several "trays of rings," they left a piece of jewellery of little value to be repaired, and then went away. In the course of the same evening Mr. Smith discovered that four diamond rings were gone, one of them being worth upwards of £50. The prisoner was followed on the following morning offering three of the "stones" at his own house to a Mr. Rotherhild, who afterwards transferred them to a Mr. Charman, a jeweller, in Berwick-street, Soho. By the latter person the diamonds would be produced, and would be identified by Mr. Smith, the prosecutor.—Evidence was adduced to confirm the statement of the learned barrister, who said that on a future occasion he should be enabled to produce additional evidence against the prisoner. In the meantime he begged that the magistrate would remand him for a few days.—Upon this Mr. Twyford remanded the prisoner for a week.

QUEEN CAROLINE.—Sarah Parlbeck, a middle-aged woman, was brought before the magistrate, Mr. Bond, charged with having attempted to defraud T. Gledstone, Esq., brother to the M.P. for Newark, residing at No. 1, Upper Belgrave-street. From the facts it appeared that the prisoner was one of the most impudent and accomplished members of that highly-ingenious and select community known to the Mendicity as the honourable Society of Begging-letter Impostors.—Complaint stated that the prisoner, who was a perfect stranger to him, came to his house, and stated herself to be a widow with four children, in great distress, and produced letters confirmatory of her account from various persons named Fuller and Osborne, the former of whom was the proprietor or manager of Boodle's Club. She said she was desirous of getting one of her children into the Caledonian Asylum, but as he was only eight years of age, he was too young for the vacancies. She said she wished to raise a trifle of money from the benevolent until she should be able to get the child off her hands. She added that she was a native of Peterhead, in Scotland, and that the place of residence of her complainant's father's estates was situate, and produced a book containing the signatures of different gentlemen, with the sums they had subscribed. In the list were, Mr. Fuller, £2; Mr. Hoare, £1; Mr. Hankey, £1; Mr. Ley, 15s.; Mr Husband, 10s. The woman's account was so plausible that he gave perfect credence to it; but, as he thought it would be better to make some inquiries, he requested her to call again in a few days. On seeing Mr Fuller in the interim, that gentleman informed him that she was a gross impostor, and on her calling on complainant that evening he sent for a constable and gave her into custody.—The prisoner was sentenced to three months' hard labour in the House of Correction.

MARLBOROUGH-STREET.—A FEROCIOUS DOG.—William Marley, a dog fancier, was summoned for suffering to go at large, unmuzzled, a ferocious dog —John Philips, a respectable youth, stated, that whilst he was standing at his master's door, No. 3, Duke-street, Portman-square, on Tuesday morning, he was suddenly set upon by the dog, which had broken away from a boy who was leading it by a chain. The dog seized him by the trousers, which were torn into shreds, and was on the point of taking him by the leg, when fortunately the boy came up, and, calling the dog by name, managed to secure the exasperated brute and lead it off. The defendant, it appeared, was the owner of the dog, and was in charge of a house in Portman-square, in which he kept a lot of fancy animals of this description.—Mr. Rawlinson: That is certainly an extraordinary purpose to which to apply a house in Portman-square. Where is the dog now?—Defendant: Gone to France, sir; Boulogne.—I went to Mr. Philips's yesterday to get the trousers, that I might have them replaced, but they refused to let me have them.—Don't you think the complainant ought to have satisfaction for the terror occasioned by your great bull-dog attacking him?—It was not a bull-dog, sir, but a Scotch bull terrier, I dare say?—I don't know.—Oh, don't tell me; you a dogfancier, and don't know! What do you say to giving the complainant 20s? —I can't afford it, sir?—Mr. Rawlinson: Then you must indeed do so.—Subsequently an arrangement was entered into between the parties, and the fine was taken off on the defendant paying Philips 20s. and the costs.

UNION HALL.—(Before Mr. Wyatt.)—William Edgar, a fashionably-dressed young man, described in the police sheet as a "gentleman," was brought before Mr. Cottingham, charged with attempting to destroy himself with arsenic. A solicitor, who attended on behalf of the prisoner, addressing the magistrate, said that he had instructions his client had not taken poison, although it was alleged that he had; and that he had undergone a very painful operation—that of having the stomach pump introduced into his stomach, although he resisted, and declared that he had swallowed nothing of a deleterious nature. It appeared that the defendant had expressed his intention of poisoning himself to a policeman, and had subsequently taken a quantity of arsenic which he found in his pocket book. Defendant: I had no idea of destroying myself, and I told the surgeon so: yet for all that I was fastened down to a table, had the pump introduced into my stomach, and was compelled to go to an hospital, and kept there all morning. Mr. Cottingham said that he was inclined to believe the defendant did not intend to destroy himself, but there was no doubt he had by the singularity of his conduct fraudulently brought himself into the unpleasant predicament in which he was placed. He was then discharged.

THAMES OFFICE.—James Lee, a tall athletic man, a drover, was brought before Mr. Broderip for final examination, on a charge of wounding William Hayes, a corn meter, by striking him on the head with a poker. It appeared from the evidence that the prosecutor went to the black Horse public-house in the Mile End-road, and, after calling for a glass of ale at the bar, was about to enter the taproom, where there was a quarrel going on between two prisoner and another person, when he received a violent blow on the temple from a poker, which laid him prostrate on the floor, and caused him to bleed profusely. The prisoner was the person who struck the blow, and he did not deny it, but said he joined the fray after the prosecutor was quarrelling with. The prosecutor was anxious to decline prosecuting, but the magistrate would not permit it. The prisoner said that when he got a drop of liquor in his head he was quite insane, and did not know what he did.—Mr. Broderip: That is the very reason you should abstain from using liquors altogether.—The Solicitor: It is on account of his infirmity we wish to be discharged.—Mr. Broderip: I am told by the doctor that he is very liquor he is insane, and you wish me to let him loose on the public.—The prosecutor: He never intended me any harm.—Mr. Broderip: But if a man takes up a poker and strikes people right and left, he intends to do harm; and unless he was prosecuted no man's life would be safe. He has nearly beaten your brains out, and he may go and do the like again. I shall commit him for trial.—The witnesses were then bound over in the usual way.

COURT OF ASSIZES OF BRABANT.—TRIAL OF M. CAUMARTIN FOR THE MURDER OF M. SIRET.—Never, in the memory of the oldest inhabitant, was there witnessed so great a crowd as thronged the court on the present occasion. The court was opened at nine o'clock, and a few minutes every place open to the public was occupied, and long before the president appeared the crush was so terrific that the door leading to the reserved seats was forced in, and the gendarmerie were obliged to clear it. Soon, for the parvis civile, demanded damages in the name of the widow of Siret, M. Vervoort spoke with great talent and energy in defence of the prisoner.—After a few words from M. Chaix-D'Est-Ange, the president declared the pleadings closed, and put the following question to the jury:—Is the Edouard Caumartin guilty of having, on the 19th November, 1842, voluntarily taken the life of the late Siret, which occasioned his death? It was the said wound provoked by great violence and blows against the person of the prisoner?—The jury retired at nine o'clock, and in a quarter of an hour returned with a verdict in the negative on the first question; the second question was consequently left unanswered, as it fell to the ground by the negation of the first.—The prisoner was called in, and his acquittal was pronounced by the president. He left the bench of the accused and took his seat by the side of his counsel during the discussion of the question of damages.—The demand made by M. Roussel for the condemnation of M. Caumartin to the costs of the suit was opposed by M. Vervoort.—M. Caumartin sai l that if the deposit of 1000f., which he had made as a guarantee of costs, was in question, he would abandon it.—M. Roussel said he demanded all the costs of the suit, and the Advocate General supported the demand.—The court, considering that M. Caumartin had carried prohibited arms, condemned him to all the expenses of the process.

THE MARKETS.

CORN EXCHANGE.—Since our last reports the arrivals of English Wheat up to Mark-lane have been somewhat on the increase and of very superior quality. In consequence of the holidays and the thin attendance of dealers the demand for all descriptions of that grain has ruled extremely dull, and the prices have suffered a decline of from 1s to 2s per quarter There has been a fair quantity of Foreign Wheat offering, but the sales effected in it have been to a very limited extent, and we have no alteration to notice in its value. Barley has met a slow inquiry at barely late rates. Good sound Malt has sold at full quotations, but the middling and inferior parcels have been sold on rather easier terms. Oats have been in good supply and heavy inquiry, and, in some instances, a decline of 6d per quarter. Beans Peas, and Flour have remained unaltered.

Duties on Foreign Corn.—Wheat, 20s; Barley, 9s; Oats, 5s; Rye, 11s 6d; Beans, 11s 6d Peas, 11s 6d.

Tea.—There has been a fair amount of business doing in the Tea market this week, and full prices have been generally paid. Several vessels are reported off the coast of China, laden with Tea. For public competition next week 33,000 packages are already declared.

Sugar.—We have to report a very steady inquiry for all kinds of Sugar, and the late advance is firmly sustained

Coffee.—Although not much business has been doing in coffee, the quotations are generally supported.

Indigo.—The public sales have been fairly attended with buyers, and the following are the terms, and prices have given way from 2d to 4d per lb.

Oil.—The demand for Cod oil is rather languish. Linseed is held at 32s 6d to 33s per cwt. At public sale full prices have been paid.

Metals.—This market is very dull, and prices are generally droopier.

Tallow.—The demand for P.C. on the spot is good, and prices are firm at 42s 6d per cwt. on the spot, and for delivery in the last three months 43s 3d cash.

Provisions.—There is little change to notice in the demand for Irish butter, and prices may be considered quite as low as they can be. Foreign butter is very inquiry, but the prices continue to realise 100s to 104s per cwt. Lard is very dull. The bacon market is more steady than for some time past.—Waterford, Limerick, or Sligo, at 51s to 53s, choice, 56s per cwt. Irish hams is fair demand, at 44s to 47s per cwt.

Wool.—In the public sales considerably more attention very little is doing by private contract, and prices remain unaltered.

Hops.—Fine qualities of hops are quite as dear; but all other descriptions command very little attention

Potatoes.—The supplies of potatoes being good, and those of great vegetables on the increase, the demand is heavy, at prices varying from 30s to 50s per ton.

Smithfield.—The demand for all kinds of stock in this market during the present week has ruled dull, and the quotations have been rather drooping. Beef, from 3s to 4s; mutton, 3s to 4s 4d; veal, 3s to 4s; pork, 3s 10d to 4s per stone of 8lbs. Inquiry, however, has been made for lots by the grocers, and prices are rather dearer than they were the last. Of teas the usual quantities have also been sent into consumption, and in the demand for, and prices of, coffees likewise there is an evident tendency to improvement Here my general sale of the private contract wheats is now in progress in the means of the productive commercial and manufacturing labourers to increase their consumption of various necessaries of life.

On the English Stock Exchange a considerable degree of dullness has prevailed during the week, and the Consols are declined a fraction per cent. from the highest quotations of them during the preceding one.

There is a commercially failing away also in the late activity displayed by the dealers in railway shares. The present dullness is occasioned by the state of the Manchester money market, rather than by any want of confidence in their solidity existing in the minds of the London money dealers. The fact is that as Manchester the present was improvement in commerce requires additional capital, and the amount of money now unemployed there is by no means attended by this favourable result. A larger sum than formerly is now embarked in affording productive labour to the people, and in withdrawn from speculative operations for the present as it, events. The cause of railway shares may for a time suffer by this alteration, but still the change is a most profitable one to the community in general

ZOOLOGICAL SOCIETY'S GARDENS, REGENT'S PARK.—NEW HOUSE FOR CARNIVORA.

This capacious range of cages for the larger carnivora, as lions tigers, leopards, &c., is in course of construction from the designs of Mr. E. W. Elmslie, and will, when completed, be one of the most important buildings in the society's gardens. Its site ranges with the bear-pit and great terrace; and of the latter the structure itself will form a continuation.

The building is in length divided into six compartments by substantial walls, and in width into three, also by walls, the outside compartments thus formed being about 25 feet long by 10 feet wide and serving as the day-cages. The middle division is longitudinally divided into twenty-four, giving four sleeping apartments to the length of each outer den. Two of these will communicate with each of the outer dens by means of a lifting door, which will be worked from the exterior of the outer cage. All the sleeping dens can be thrown into one for the purpose of moving the animals from one part of the building to another, or for cleaning, &c. The outer or day cages will be 10 feet high in the clear, and raised on arches 2 feet 6 inches from the level of the lawn, and the sleeping dens 3 feet 6 inches, in the same way. The outer cages will be enclosed on three sides with walls, and on the fourth side with strong iron railings, through which the animals will be seen. The roof is formed by a cast-iron framing filled in with arches and covered with asphalte in such a manner that the tops of the cages will form a terrace-walk, commanding a view of the whole of the gardens.

WRESTLING IN CUMBERLAND.

Most of the principal and even smaller towns in Cumberland have their yearly sports, of which wrestling appears to be the most attractive, and generally lasts for two or three days. The wrestlers are divided into two classes, the light weights (men of eleven stone and under) and men of all weights. Nearly all the light weights enter for both prizes; and, in the absence of Jackson, the champion of England, the heavy prize is generally won by Donaldson, champion of the light weights, who thus carries off both the first prizes. Several others of the little ones come so near the heavy prize as to win a portion of the subscribed money, showing that although, ceteris paribus, strength and weight must win, they are of no use in themselves against skill and activity.

On great occasions the wrestlers frequently amount to two hundred and upwards. After the light weights have been weighed by the stewards, the name of each wrestler is written on a separate slip of paper, and put into a hat, from whence the names are drawn in couples, the men whose names are thus drawn wrestling together. The names of the winners of the first heat are again drawn in the same manner, and so on till the number is reduced to two. Of the last twenty or thirty standers, each receives a prize varying from half-a-crown to two pounds, according to their proximity to the last couple.

Our sketch represents the two champions engaged in their last struggle for the heavy-weight prize at Keswick. Jackson's favourite chip is what wrestlers term the hype and swing, which consists in his raising his adversary from the ground, and swinging him round three or four times, when, by suddenly striking the inside of the thigh with his knee, and reversing the swing, he lays him on the ground. Upon the last occasion, however, he failed in this: the light weight (who had often been thrown by the same means before), by an extraordinary exertion of muscular strength, avoided the chip by keeping his body extended in the air nearly at a right angle from his adversary for several seconds, and on coming to the ground bore upon him with such energy as to be on the point of success, when he suddenly stopped to breathe, and in an instant was on his back.

The loss which will fall upon the insurers of the Solway royal mail in London and Glasgow is estimated at £40,000. The difference between this sum and £60,000, which, in round numbers, is stated to be about the value of the vessel, including all the property she had on board, will constitute another item of loss in the accounts of the company, who appear to have had a most unfortunate career since they commenced operations. The non-insurance to the full amount, however, is not the fault of the directors, the terms of their policies binding them to take a portion of the risk on all their vessels. Of the £40,000 about £30,000 is distributed among the London offices, the underwriters at Lloyd's having fortunately escaped with very trifling damage. Glasgow suffers to the extent of about £10,000.

FATAL ACCIDENT.—On Thursday week, as Mr. J. B. Herring, the extensive wholesale druggist in Aldergate-street, was proceeding in his Brougham down the hill opposite the House of Correction, Coldbath-fields, driven by his servant, at a careful pace, a lad named Stone, who was playing with a hoop, which had just run into the road, ran from off the pavement to snatch it from the wheels of the vehicle, which, however, struck him in the back and chest, and according to the statement of Mr. Headland, a surgeon, who was called in to attend the deceased, lacerated his lungs, which caused death in three hours, by an effusion of blood into the chest. An inquest was afterwards held, when the jury, being of opinion that no blame could be traced to the coachman returned a verdict of "Accidental death."

THE CHURCHES OF THE METROPOLIS.—No. XXXI.

BARNES CHURCH.

Few suburban villages are so rife with interesting associations as that of Barnes, situate on the Surrey bank of the Thames, about six miles west of the metropolis. Yet the place consists but of a few straggling houses opposite a common, of a mean street leading to the river side, and of a row of elegant houses facing the Thames, on a broad terrace nearly half a mile long. The church is situated on the common, at the distance of a quarter of a mile from the village; it is dedicated to St. Mary, and is one of the most ancient structures near the metropolis. It appears that in the reign of Richard I. an hospital was founded within the liberties of St. Paul's Cathedral, by Henry of Northampton, one of the canons of the cathedral; and to this hospital the dean and chapter gave the church of Barnes, with glebe and tithes. Now, as there is no mention of a church at Barnes in the Conqueror's survey, it is supposed to have been built about the above period; and in the north wall and chancel are some narrow windows, with early pointed or lancet arches of this date, an architectural corroboration as interesting as it is decisive. The windows in the southern wall and nave are of later date; at the east end are three narrow windows stopped up; the walls are of stone and flint. The tower is of square form, built of brick, with buttresses, and has a staircase and turret at the south-east corner; the quoins are of soft stone, the windows are square and plain, and the structure is of the latter end of the 15th century, or later. The church was enlarged on the north and south in 1786 and 1787.

The interior contains a few antique monuments to attract the visitor; Beale, who read the warrant for the execution of Mary Queen of Scots, upon the scaffold at Fotheringhay, is buried here. But curiosity will be more gratified by a tablet on the outside southern wall, placed between two buttresses, to the memory of Edward Rose, a citizen of London, who died in July, 1655; the ground between the buttresses is inclosed with wooden paling, within which are planted rose-trees. It appears that this simple-minded citizen, by will, directed his body to be buried at Barnes, and bequeathed £5 for making a frame of wood (or paling) in the churchyard, where he had appointed his burying-place; and ordered three rose-trees, or more, to be planted about the place where he was interred. He also directed the purchase of an acre of land, and, out of the profits thereof, the minister and churchwardens were to keep the same frame of wood in repair; and the said rose-trees to be preserved, or others planted in their places from time to time; the residue of the profits to be given to the poor. These terms have been strictly complied with; and thus through nearly two centuries has been preserved this pleasing conceit, upon which there appeared, a few years since, in the "Literary Gazette," the following touching lines:—

BARNES CHURCH.

Oh, plant them above me, the soft, the bright,
The touched with the sunset's crimson light,
The warm with the earliest breath of spring,
The sweet with the sweep of the west wind's wing:
Let the green bough and the red leaf wave—
Plant the glad rose-tree upon my grave.

Why should the mournful willow weep
O'er the quiet rest of a dreamless sleep?
Weep for life with its toil and care,
Its crime to shun, and its sorrow to bear;
Let tears and the sign of tears be shed
Over the living, not over the dead.

Plant not the cypress nor yet the yew;
Too heavy their shadow, too gloomy their hue,
For one who is sleeping in faith and in love,
With a hope that is treasur'd in heaven above;
In a holy trust are my ashes laid—
Cast ye no darkness, throw ye no shade.

Plant the green sod with the crimson rose,
Let my friends rejoice o'er my calm repose:
Let my memory be like the odours they shed,
My hope like the promise of early red;
Let strangers, too, share in their breath and their bloom—
Plant ye bright roses over my tomb.

Barnes is one of the peculiars of the see of Canterbury; the living is a rectory, and the incumbent Dr. Edward Reginald Copleston, instituted 1840; the patrons are the Dean and Chapter of St. Paul's, and the value of the living in 1831 was stated at £375.

At Barn-elms (so called from its myrtles, now no more), about a quarter of a mile from the village, lived the great Sir Francis Walsingham, Secretary of State to Queen Elizabeth, who often visited that great and good statesman here. The mansion has long since disappeared: adjoining it was a house belonging to Jacob Tonson, the bookseller, at the time he was secretary to the Kitcat Club; and here he built a room for the members and their portraits painted by Kneller. Cowley, the poet, sojourned for a time at Barn-elms; as did Fielding the novelist, and Handel the composer. William Cobbett practised rural economy at "Barn-elm," as he would write it. The present occupant of Barn-elms House, a modern villa facing the Thames, is the Right Hon. Sir Launcelot Shadwell, Vice-Chancellor of England.

OPENING OF A NEW TOWN-HALL AT LIMEHOUSE.—On Tuesday morning, at ten o'clock, the ceremony of publicly opening the new Town-hall, which has been recently erected in Church-lane, Limehouse, was performed by the churchwardens and other parochial officers of the parish of St. Anne, assisted by G. T. Young, Esq., a county magistrate, and Wm. Baker, Esq., coroner for Middlesex. The hall is in every way worthy of this part of the metropolis. It contains a very spacious board-room, in which special sessions, registration committees, and parish meetings will be held; also numerous smaller offices, intended for private affairs, are situated in the lower part of the building.

GREENWICH HOSPITAL.—The following statement of visitors to the Painted Hall and Chapel will perhaps be deemed interesting:—On Monday 1785 persons visited the Painted Hall, and 4478 the Chapel. On Sunday 1640 persons visited the Painted Hall, and 224 went into the Chapel, which was on that day only opened for lay inspection from one to two o'clock, Divine service being performed therein in the morning and afternoon: 4476 persons also went in on Monday. The calculation of receipts for the benefit of the institution can be readily made, each person paying 3d.

THE RIGHT HON. THE LORD MAYOR, ATTENDED BY HIS ESQUIRES, THE SWORD AND MACE BEARERS.

By the kind permission of his Lordship, our artist, J. Jarvis, Esq., was favoured with a sitting to make the sketch for our highly-finished engraving, we have endeavoured to acknowledge this compliment by exhibiting, for the first time, a full-length portrait of a lord mayor of London dressed in the state robes and full insignia of his office, and attended by the great officers of his household. The sword is the celebrated "pearl-sword" presented to the corporation by Queen Elizabeth when the Exchange was founded; and the mace is the great gold mace presented to the corporation by Charles I.

We present to our readers an engraving of the Egyptian-hall at the Mansion-house during the splendid banquet given by the Lord Mayor on Wednesday, the 12th inst., to the members of the late Government and his other political associates, although it was by no means a political occasion, and which we made mention of in the last number of this paper. All the arrangements of the festival —for the entertainment deserves that name—were on a scale of magnificence we have seldom seen surpassed on similar occasions; and the presence of so many ladies, as it will be seen by the subjoined list, who honoured the banquet with their company gave an additional charm to the scene, which it would be a flagrant breach of gallantry not to mention with especial honour. It would be superfluous to add that every luxury which the yet early period of the season admitted of was to be found in profusion at this elegant entertainment, and that the display of plate was of the most gorgeous and costly description.

The following list comprises the names of the principal guests at the banquet:—Duke and Duchess of Bedford, Lord and Lady John Russell, Viscount and Viscountess Palmerston, Marquis of Lansdowne, Earl of Auckland and Hon. Miss Eden, Lord and Lady Marcus Hill, Lord and Lady Colborne, Lord and Lady Worsley, Lord and Lady F. G. Halliburton, Lord Lilford, Lord Campbell and the Hon. Miss Campbell, Lord Ebrington, Lord E. Russell, Lord A. Paget, the Hon. G. and Lady A. Byng, Lord H. Vane, Lord Foley, Hon. Misses Foley (two), Lord D. Stuart, Lord Seymour, Viscount and Viscountess Duncan, Earl and Countess of Errol, Earl of Leicester, the Hon. Captain J. C. Vivian and Mrs. Vivian, the Hon. F. H. and Lady M. Berkeley, the Hon. W. F. F. and Lady C. Berkeley, the Earl of Rosebery and Lady A. Primrose, Lord C. Russell, Sir G. and Lady Grey, Sir R. and Lady Phillips, Lady C. Maxse, Sir W. and Lady Gossett, Right Hon. T. B. Macaulay, Lord Monteagle, Earl and Countess of Clarendon, Sir Denis Le Marchant, Right Hon. E. Ellice and Mrs. Ellice, Right Hon. Vernon and Mrs. Smith, Sir J. Easthope, Sir Charles Napier, the Saxon and Spanish ministers, Sir Isaac Lyon Goldsmid, Sir James Duke, General Dyson, Mr. Cameron, Mr. Ricardo, M.P., Mr. E. Strutt, M.P., and Mrs. Strutt, Mr. E. J. and Mrs. Stanley, Mr. J. Matheson, M.P., Mr. Tufnell, M.P., and Mrs. Tufnell, Mr. J. H. Vivian, M.P., and Mrs. Vivian, Sir B. Hall, M.P., Mr. C. Buller, M.P., Captain Bernal, M.P., Mr. T. Duncombe, M.P., Mr. B. Wall, M.P., Mr. W. J. Denison, M.P., Mr. B. Wood, M.P. &c.

A ROMANCE OF REAL LIFE.

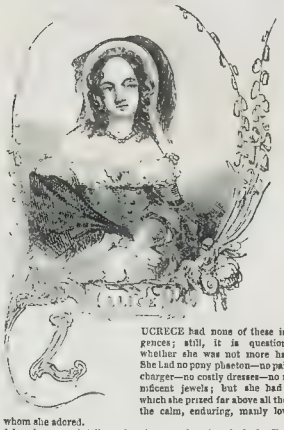
CHAPTER VII.
ON PREDESTINATION.



UCRECE had none of these indulgences; still, it is questionable whether she was not more happy. She had no pony phaeton—no painted charger—no costly dresses—no magnificent jewels; but she had that which she prized far above all these—the calm, enduring, manly love of Charles, whom she adored.

She had, besides, more intellectual society than her sister had; for Charles, who was enamoured of his profession, and who would suffer no pecuniary expectations to interfere with his progress, secured the friendship of many of the most eminent men of the age; and as Lucrece, by her gentleness, beauty, and tranquil elegance, soon won the hearts of their ladies, she found herself the centre of a circle composed of amiable mothers, affectionate children, fond husbands, and highly intellectual friends.

Being naturally unwilling to commence practice until what he deemed an excellent opportunity offered, and wishing to defer the purchase of furniture, and so on, until he had become settled, Charles engaged a furnished house, in North Audley-street, where they were constantly visited by Sir Arthur and Caroline, and still more constantly by Greville and Fred.

The visits of Fred, however, were not ascribable solely to his love of the society of Charles and Lucrece. He had been introduced by Charles to Dr. Hawtree, with whom he had dined; and, having become enamoured of Alice, the doctor's only child—a most elegant and amiable girl—he repaired every morning to North Audley-street with the strict regularity of the sun, in the fond hope that Alice would call upon Lucrece—which, they being like sisters, did by no means unfrequently happen.

But the visits even of Alice were not attributable entirely to her affection for Lucrece. It is true she was excessively fond of her, and their mutual attachment was therefore pure as far as it went; but she invariably called at a certain time—invariably lingered, if Fred had not arrived, without any ostensible motive—and invariably in his presence appeared to be confused.

Of course, Lucrece failed not to notice these little peculiarities; but not a syllable, having reference to them, escaped her, until Fred himself explained precisely how the matter stood, when she deemed it correct to name the subject to Charles, not only that he might not in any way be compromised but that Fred might have the benefit of his advice.

Charles, on being made acquainted with the facts, embraced the earliest opportunity of speaking to Fred on the subject, not with the view of withering his hopes or of depreciating his pretensions, but in order to point out the only means by which he imagined the doctor's consent could be obtained.

"Fred," said he, "Alice Hawtree is a favourite of yours, is she not?"

"She is, indeed," replied Fred.

"Ay, a most decided favourite?"

"The only creature whom I ever felt that I loved!"

"And an interesting creature she is: an amiable, good girl. You meet her here frequently, I believe? Understand me: I do not object to your meeting her here; I merely wish to know whether I am justified in inferring from these frequent meetings that the attachment is mutual?"

"Why it is but a fair inference: I hope, I believe, nay I feel, in fact, sure that it is so."

"Very well: I have not the slightest doubt of it myself. You have never, I presume, spoken to the doctor on the subject?"

"I never have; but I wish you would break the ice for me I know you have great influence; I know that a word from you would guide him. Do break the matter to him, there's a good fellow: I only want the subject to be opened—for, never having trick my hand at anything of the kind, I know that I should feel at first awkward."

"I believe," said Charles, "that you know I would do all in my power to serve you?"

"I do, my dear fellow, I do, I have proved it."

"Then allow me to give you a further proof.—Imagine me to be the Doctor. Here I am: Dr. Hawtree. Very well. Now you only want the subject to be opened. Imagine it to be opened. (I give you this rehearsal in order that, when the time arrives for having an interview with him, you may see your way clearly.) Well, then, you, as the character of Dr. Hawtree, say to you, 'Well, Mr. Greville, it appears that having conceived an affection for my girl you wish to marry her?' Now answer me precisely as you would answer him.—'You wish to marry her?'"

"I do; with your consent," replied Fred.

"'Exactly, Mr. Greville; I love my child. She is a good girl, an excellent girl; and her happiness is one of the chief objects I have in view. What means have you of supporting her in the style to which she has ever been accustomed?'"

"But would he ask such a question as that?"

"I know him too well, my dear fellow, to doubt it. Now then—'What means have you to support her in the style to which she has ever been accustomed?'"

"Why," replied Fred, with considerable hesitation, "I have certainly no immediate means;—but I believe you know my father?"

"'I do: I know him to be a respectable man, but comparatively poor. Do you propose me to live upon him?'"

"Certainly not."

"'Do you expect me to give you sufficient to live upon?'"

"No."

"'Have you any profession?'"

"I have not."

"'Well, then, how do you propose to live?'"

"Oh; he'd never think of asking such questions as these!"

"I assure you that these are the very questions he would ask, and expect to have them answered satisfactorily, too! But now—! How do you propose to live?"

"Oh, if that's to be the sort of thing, of course I should look like a fool!"

"I will not say that," replied Charles, "but you would look like a man who has never considered the responsibility which marriage involves. The doctor is not a vain man, he is not a man fond of display, nor would he sell the happiness of his daughter for the proudest title in the realm; but he is at the same time so much a man of the world, and would look at my proposal thus made so much as a matter of business, that, unless you could satisfy him that you had at your command the means of supporting his child as your wife, he'd not listen to your proposal for a moment. 'No, Mr Greville,' he would say, 'I can have no objection to you personally; I believe you to be an upright, honorable man; I moreover believe you to be sincerely attached to my Alice; but I, as her father, will never consent to her marriage with a man whose expectances, sir, form his only prospect of averting destitution.'"

"Destitution!" echoed Fred; "that's quite out of the question.

"It would not be with him," replied Charles.

"Oh! but I hadn't the least idea of his being such a hard-mouthed fellow as that!"

"He is one of the best fellows alive, Fred; I don't know a man whose general character I more highly admire."

"Then why won't he come down handsomely at once? He's rich, I believe, is he not?"

"Yes, and might, without impoverishing himself, put down sufficient for you both; but 'How can you have the face,' he would say, in effect, 'to come here and ask me to support you for life?' That would be his question, and one which would, under the circumstances, puzzle the best of us. If," he would add, 'you are not a man of property, you ought, sir, to have some profession to fly to, something to fall back upon, sir, in the event of a reverse. He who has neither the one nor the other shall never, with my sanction, marry my child.'"

"Well, and when you look at the thing in the right light, there is some reason in it," said Fred. "It would be like asking him to support me! Hut what am I to do? Is the fact of my having no profession to be a perpetual bar to my success? Am I, in consequence of the governor being fool enough to preach up the doctrine that I should get on as well without profession as with one, to abandon every hope of gaining Alice?"

"Certainly not!"

"How, then, am I to act?"

"I'll explain. Go to the doctor; you have the privilege now of calling when you please; go to him, not as a supplicant, but with a firm, manly bearing, and say, in your own words, something to this effect:—'Doctor Hawtree, my father is known to you; you know that he is not a rich man; you know, also, that I have no profession, and therefore no means at present, independently of my father, of supporting an establishment. Now, Doctor Hawtree, I love your daughter, and I flatter myself that the attachment is mutual; I therefore deem it correct to state that when I am, as I hope to be soon, in a position to make her in every respect happy, I shall do myself the pleasure of soliciting her hand.'"

"But how can I state that I hope to be soon in this position?"

"Why, you have every reason to hope! My uncle has promised to do something for you, and he is not a man to promise that which he does not intend to perform. This you can explain to the doctor; and I know him so well, that I feel quite convinced he would be highly pleased with your candour that he would never let my uncle rest until he had procured for you some lucrative appointment; if, indeed, he did not encourage your visits to Alice, and eventually say—whether you had an appointment or not—'Well, marry at once, and be happy.'"

"But in doing this should I not be placing myself in a humiliating position?"

"Not at all: unless it be possible for the parent of a highly honourable course to be humiliating."

"But wouldn't it be more the thing—wou dn't it look better—wouldn't it, in a word, develop a little more spirit—if, under the circumstances, an elopement were effected?"

"Do not think of it, Fred; do not dream of it, for a moment. In the first place, I do not believe that she would ever consent to elope; and in the next, it is a bad first lesson to teach a wife, when viewed with reference to her husband's future happiness, that, to obtain her own ends, by means of girlish affections, would urge her to elope. There are few fathers now, Fred—I hope, nay, I believe, that there is not in the present day one to be found—so tyrannous as to sacrifice the happiness of their children by forcing them to marry those whom they despise; and every woman must despise the man who usurps the place and title of him whom she loves. An elopement, Fred, is not the sign of mutual confidence, nor is it the germ of enduring affection; it is, on the contrary, indicative of doubt and cupidity, and almost invariably springs from folly on the one hand and venality on the other."

"Well, but Sir Arthur threatened to run away with Caroline, in the event of the governor withholding his consent!"

"So he did, in playfulness—merely as a jest; but that is not an analogous case: Caroline was of age, and therefore for own mistress; the consent of her father was not essential to the union; he could not have prevented it, for the fact of the man being older than the woman is considered no 'just cause or impediment why those two persons should not be joined together.' Now, Alice is not of age: she is not, in fact, more than nineteen."

"Oh, I perceive that the cases are different; but I don't at all like the idea of doing that which you suggest. It wouldn't appear to come from me naturally: I'm not the sort of fellow you know to put a bold face and deliver a regular raw-boned speech. I know I should make a mess of it. I know I should break down in the middle, and look like a fool. I know it. I'm sure of it! Now, will you do me a favour? Will you, as you can do anything to him, will you just state that it is my intention when so and so happens, you know, to do so and so? You know how to manage the thing: I don't. Now, be my ambassador in this affair, there's a good fellow! You can do the thing for me, I know, much better than I shall be able to do it for myself."

"Well so I can see no impropriety in stating your intention, I will do so. but, Fred, I shall expect you, in the first place, to act with the most perfect candour—I shall require you to assure me, upon your honour, as a man, that you really love Alice."

"Charles, upon my honour, I feel that, if a man ever yet loved a woman, I love her."

"I am satisfied; and, being satisfied also that Alice is worthy of your love, I'll do all in my power to promote the object you have in view."

"You are a good fellow, Charles. But when will you see him?"

"Why, there's no necessity for any immediate haste!"

"No; but I'm anxious to hear! I wish you'd go to-day?"

"To-day it will be impossible to do anything."

"Well, then, to-morrow! don't let to-morrow pass without doing something."

"Well, I'll see him in the morning, and open the subject."

"There's a dear fellow! you don't know how much I feel obliged! You'll do the best you can for me?"

"Of that be assured," replied Charles; and Fred, being assured, returned to his father, whom he began to reproach for having neglected to give him a profession.

It is true Greville did not pretend to understand this sort of conduct, but sought to persuade himself that he was not at all angry; because he felt that Fred had been preordained to reprove him, and that, therefore, of course, he couldn't help it. He did, however, notwithstanding, deem it his duty to have an interview with Charles on the subject; not, indeed, with a view to censure him for having made the suggestion, because, seeing that it had been made by him, it followed that he had been compelled to make it—but in order to prove the unexampled soundness and beauty of that great principle by which he was actuated, and to which he had been utterly unable to make Charles a convert!

"I say, my good fellow," said he at this interview, "it's all very fine; but what have you been sending Fred to me for blowing up about his position in society?"

"I!" said Charles, smiling, "I never sent him to 'blow up' about his position!"

"Well it's all the same thing! you have been telling him that he ought to have had a profession!

"Certainly, I have said, and I do say still that if he had he would be now in a better position.

"But how could he be? Bless my life and soul!—now you are a man of sense—I know you to be a man of sound sterling sense, and yet, so inexplicable are the workings of the great whole, that you—even you—cannot see that everything in nature has been preordained! But I suppose you are not to see it."

"Well I suppose that I am not," returned Charles, "for I know that I never shall see it until I can banish from my mind all ideas having reference either to the responsibility of man, or to the justice of God."

"Now then let us have an argument. The subject has been now fairly opened, and, as I mean to pin you to every point, I shall lead you right on to conviction. Now then: in the first place, do you believe in the omniscience of the Deity?"

"I do."

"You believe that God knows all things—that he is cognizant of all our actions?"

"I do."

"Then how can you reconcile that belief with your disbelief in universal preordination?"

"The belief that God knows all our actions does not, as you imagine, involve the belief that he guides all our actions. He knows of the disobedience of our first parents; but are we to believe that, by virtue of preordination, he forced them to eat the fruit which he forbade them to eat, and punished them for disobedience, when he compelled that disobedience? If we believe that Adam and Eve were disobedient we cannot believe that they were predestined to partake of the fruit so expressly forbidden; and if we believe that they were thus predestined we cannot believe that they were virtually disobedient. They could not eat and abstain from eating; nor can it be conceived that God said in effect, 'You must not eat, but you shall!' It hence follows that, assuming the doctrine of preordination to be sound, the punishment inflicted upon them by Him who ordained them to do that for which they were punished does not at all accord with our ideas of Divine justice."

"Yes, that's all very well: but how can He know all our actions if those actions have not been predestined?"

"As a man is a man but not before he has being, and a house a house, but not before it is built, so a man is not a man, but absolutely nothing before it becomes an action. That He knows all our actions is admitted, but that does not involve the admission that He guides or compels all our actions. A man may believe in the omniscience of God, and yet not believe in predestination, but he cannot believe in preordination and yet have faith in the justice of God."

"Well, but now just let us go to another point. Now then: do you or do you not believe that whatever is is right?"

"I do not: if I did, I must believe that there can be nothing wrong."

"Nor can there be!—that is the basis of all!"

"Well, it appears to be rather an unsound basis. Is it not, for example, wrong to commit murder?"

"Why, it appears to be wrong: we believe it to be wrong."

"When it is in reality right?"

"Exactly."

"Then you believe it to be right, and you believe it to be wrong?"

"No no!"

"You believe that whatever is is right, and you believe that to commit murder is wrong."

"Yes, but wrong, I mean, according to our notions. The point is, what is it considered by the Creator of the universe?"

"Manifestly wrong."

"But how is it possible for us to know?"

"When Cain," replied Charles, "had slain Abel, the Lord said, 'What hast thou done? The voice of thy brother's blood crieth unto me from the ground; and thou are cursed from the earth, which hath opened her mouth to receive thy brother's blood from thy hand. When thou tillest the ground it shall not henceforth yield unto thee her strength: a fugitive and a vagabond shalt thou be in the earth.' It is manifest, therefore, that the Creator held murder to be wrong; and I now ask you whether you so far adhere to your favourite doctrine as to believe it at God, by virtue of preordination, compelled Cain to commit that murder which he has thus cursed?"

"Ay, that's all very well; but don't go right back to the Creation: Let us come nearer home! Do you or do you not believe that we are the creatures of circumstance?"

"Certainly I do; but I at the same time believe that we are also the creators of circumstances."

"The creators of—the creatures!"

"Exactly. We daily, nay hourly, create circumstances which we cannot control."

"Do you believe that?"

"I do most firmly."

"Then I see that I shall be able to do nothing with you. I am satisfied now that you do not wish to be convinced."

"I confess that upon that point I do not, being fully persuaded that the doctrine is so pernicious that, were it to obtain, society would soon become a wreck."

"But how could it?"

"In the first place, if the doctrine were established, there would be no such thing remaining as justice. All laws, divine and human, would be held to be tyrannous, all care for the future absurd, all caution utterly useless, all exertion utterly vain. How unjust would it then appear to censure or to punish—how ridiculous to praise or to reward! What blame could be attached to men who committed heinous crimes? What merit could be due to those who performe l noble actions?"

"Well, I never in the whole course of my long life knew a man of sense to take so superficial a view of any subject. You say that all exertion would be held to be useless; but do you not perceive that men can't help exerting themselves—that it is the impulse of their nature—when exertions are essential to the attainment of any specific object?"

"Oh, that's the point, is it?"

"Do be sure!—you wouldn't let me explain!—you see it clearly enough now, do you not?"

"I hear it. But suppose that you were robbed?——"

"Ay, that's the point! Let us come home!—we don't want to go before the Pood for illustrations! I am robbe l: good: now put the case!"

"Well, the robber has been, of course, predestined to plunder you: that we assume; but in the event of his being apprehended would you prosecute?"

"Dubtless."

"As a matter of justice?"

"No; but because if I did prosecute I of course should have been predestined to prosecute."

"Well, the man is in consequence punished."

"Exactly."

"As a matter of justice? as a matter of example? or as a matter of vengeance?"

"Why, he is punished because our legislators have been predestined to frame laws prescribing that punishment; and the judge could no more help passing sentence upon a criminal than the executioner could help carrying that sentence into effect. Of course you see that, do you not?"

"No! upon my honour."

"You do not?" exclaimed Greville, as he rose from his chair; "then I'm done. If you can't see that, then you have no lie up your mind not to see!"

"Well, but I can't help it!" rejoined Charles, smiling.

"Certainly not; however, I'll think of a few facts that will startle you when we argue the point again, and one of them shall be that professions are useless, seeing that one man shall struggle all his life and never get on, while another shall make no effort at all, and yet be prosperous."

"But a stronger one than that would be conveyed in a series of illustrations of the ancient apothegm, that he who is born to be hanged will never be drowned. But do you imagine that you have been predestined to make a convert of me?"

"Why, I feel bi if predestined to think that I have! Difference of opinion, however," he added, shaking Charles cordially by the hand as he left the room, "will never, my dear boy, I hope, interfere with our friendship; but, depend upon it, things must take their course."

On the following morning Charles called upon Dr. Hawtree, to whom, after having conversed with him for a time on a variety of subjects, he communicated Fred's intention to propose for the hand of Alice. As Charles had anticipated, the doctor was much struck with the idea of this proposal being deferred until Fred should be in a position to support an establishment.

"It looks well," said he; "it proves that his objects are not mercenary. But his be—oh, by the course he has hat—ably of those ridiculous predestinarian notions of his father?"

"He laugns at them; except, indeed, when he views them with reference to his own position."

"I see! he has been sacrificed, I see. Well, something must be done for him. But what can be done? He's a fine young fellow; but what is he fit for? What can he do? Nothing, so, we must see after something. But you say that he is convinced that the attachment is mutual? How has that conviction been reduced? He has dined here but once! What means has he ever had of ascertaining what the girl's feelings are towards him?"

"Why, they have happened, I think, on several occasions to meet at my house."

"Ah! I know that he often calls: ah is come there now, I believe."

"But of this I feel assured," continued Charles, "that he has never on any occasion uttered a syllable on the subject to her."

"Good!" said the doctor, "good! Then tell him from me that I am not at all displeased with his intentions; but, if he values my favour, if he hopes to acquire my esteem, he will never in any way allude to it before her until he has obtained my permission. There's plenty of time yet; she is now but a child; and, although I love to see the early bud of affection, I would not have its leaves prematurely expanded, having too often witnessed in such cases the withering effects of the slightest touch of the World's frost. We know not what may happen; therefore, tell him that I expect him to abstain from even hinting at the subject in her presence: get him to promise this, and, without even attempting to check the silent growth of their affection, I'll rely upon his honour."

Charles, on the part of Fred, promised that this injunction should be obeyed; and it would have been obeyed, but that it came too late; for, even while it was being delivered, Fred was explaining to Alice the nature of the communication he had commissioned Charles to make, and, although he explained nothing more than this, for Alice this was quite enough.

DEDICATED (BY PERMISSION) TO HIS GRACE THE DUKE OF RUTLAND AND THE RIGHT HON THOMAS GREN VILLE.
In three vols. £1 11s. 6d., greatly enlarged,
ON the BEAUTIFUL, HARMONIES and SUBLIMITIES of NATURE. By CHARLES BUCKE, Esq.
This is one of the most beautiful books I ever read: it stands a-the very head of its class in modern times; nor do I recollect any work that shows a more amiable or a more expressive spirit mind."—Sir James Mackintosh.
"This work embraces a most extensive subject; the whole field of nature, with its relative associations; and what has been said of Lord Bacon might, with great truth, be applied to the author of it, viz.—"that his feeling for nature was the main side on which his philosophy and his poetry, and united itself in a very genuine, as well as grand, enthusiasm, befitting one of the high priests of wisdom."—Literary Chronicle.
"It is impossible to convey by an analysis an exact notion of a work which professes to discuss a subject so various in its details, so unlimited in its extent, and so magnificent in its contributions; and which has realised its promises with a fidelity, bordering upon [illegible] offspring of a heart overflowing with generous sensibilities, and an imagination teeming with the noblest conceptions, and luxuriant conceptions of originality. Were an allegorical [illegible] and Perseverance surmounting the triple realm of Nature, and consigning their rich spoils to be separated, sublimated, and embodied in the laboratory of Genius. The reader is congratulated of Davidson's "Travels of Anachronism;" and Montesquieu's "Spirit of Laws" scarcely furnishes a more ample display of manners, customs, and institutions of the different communities of the Earth."—Cambridge Carnoticle
"The more we search into it we are always less able to criticise. These notes display amazing attention to the subject, and the references place before us an infinite host of authorities, of the whole work impatient in the most superficial in the most beautiful, and fashionable part of Devon. The advantages being peculiarly great, liberal terms expected [illegible] The cost of fashion" Monthly Magazine of the Courts of London and Paris, to be published on the 1st of May, will be, therefore, a perfect gallery of Fashions.—Published by BELL, 29, Strand (near the New Church), London. Orders received by all Booksellers, wherever residing. Price only Two Shillings

IMPORTANT TO THE PUBLIC.—The numerous complaints which have been justly made of the very inferior quality and exorbitant price of the Bottled Stout hitherto sold in London have induced Messrs. KINAHAN and CO. to undertake a large supply of a peculiar description of STOUT, for which their Dublin House has been long celebrated. KINAHAN'S DUBLIN STOUT will be found to surpass in flavour and delicacy any other spirit. To prevent the possibility of adulteration by agents, each Dublin Stout will be bottled at their own establishment, and every one branded "Kinahan and Co." The trade supplied on liberal terms.—Kinahan's LL Whisky, Wine, and Foreign Spirit Stores, 23, King William-street, Strand

PORTRAIT OF THE DUKE.

DEATH OF HIS ROYAL HIGHNESS THE DUKE OF SUSSEX.

It is with a sincere participation in the general sorrow which this intelligence will occasion to the public that we have to announce the death of that respected and amiable prince the Duke of Sussex, who expired at Kensington Palace, at twelve o'clock, on Friday, the 21st instant. A melancholy interest will now be taken by our readers in that expressive portrait of his Royal Highness which graced the columns of one of our earlier numbers, and we now at once reprint it, surrounded by those mourning lines of sorrow which are taken as the symbols of a national regret. The Prince was beyond question greatly beloved by the people, and few among the lofty ones of earth who depart for the presence of the "Great Ruler" above leave memories behind them more affectionately entwined with the prayers and blessings of their country than will be that of the Royal Duke is no more. His Royal Highness reached the grave by a process of gradual dissolution, and after an illness for which could hardly be anticipated any less gloomy result. The Duke was in the 71st year of his age.

Below, for the information of our readers, we have hastily thrown together some brief memorials of his career:—

For several days past not the slightest hopes were entertained of his Royal Highness's ultimate recovery, and the bulletin of the last day or two had prepared the public to expect a fatal termination of the Royal Duke's disease at no distant period.

Dr. Holland and Dr. Chambers sat up with the illustrious patient on Thursday night, and at half-past seven o'clock on Friday morning the official bulletin, containing a most unfavourable account of the Royal sufferer's condition, was issued.

His Royal Highness, who was still sensible, shortly afterwards expressed a wish that his servants, by whom his Royal Highness was greatly respected and beloved, should be called to take their leave of him, and directions were given that all the domestics who could be spared should attend the bed-side of their dying master. They accordingly repaired to the painful scene—for it was now but too evident that the minutes of the Duke's life were numbered. When the servants entered the room he made an effort to speak, but the effort failed him—he could not articulate—and in a few seconds his Royal Highness was no more.

The Duke of Cambridge, who had been with his suffering brother all the morning, the Duchess of Inverness, who had sat up with her Royal Highness the three previous nights, his Royal Highness's four equerries, the medical gentlemen, and the servants, were the persons present when death terminated the scene.

The intelligence of the event quickly spread through the neighbourhood of Kensington, upon which it cast a deep gloom, for the Duke of Sussex was greatly beloved by all who had the honour of knowing him, as well as by those amongst whom he had so long resided.

The Duke of Cambridge took his departure for town shortly afterwards. His Royal Highness appeared deeply absorbed in grief.

The inquiries at Kensington Palace had been very numerous during the whole of the morning, and carriages were still arriving when the melancholy intelligence of what had taken place confirmed their worst apprehensions.

At one o'clock the painful intelligence of the illustrious Duke's death reached the head-quarters of the Hon. Artillery Company, of which corps his late Royal Highness was colonel, and a meeting of the regiment was immediately summoned for this evening.

So unexpected was the last fatal illness by the illustrious deceased, that we are informed his Royal Highness caused an intimation to be made to the usual board of stewards for conducting the great annual Masonic festival, that it was his intention to dine with them at the Freemasons' Hall, on the day fixed, namely Wednesday next. This festival will, of course, be postponed for the present.

His Royal Highness Prince Augustus Frederick was the ninth child and fifth son of his Majesty George the Third, and was born the 27th of January, 1773, being, consequently, in the 71st year of his age. His titles, beside the Ducal one, were Earl of Inverness, and Baron of Arklow; he was a Knight of the Garter, a Knight of the Thistle, Grand Cross of Hanover, and a Privy Councillor; High Steward of Plymouth, Ranger of St. James's and Hyde Parks, Colonel of the Hon. Artillery Company, Grand Master of the United Order of Freemasons of England and Wales, President of the Society of Arts, and an Official Trustee of the British and Hunterian Museums.

The Duke of Sussex was twice married, although neither of the marriages received the sanction of the Royal Marriage Act. First, to Lady Augusta de Ameland Murray, at Rome, in April, 1793, and in London, Dec. 5, 1793, which marriage was declared null by the Prerogative Court in August following. The issue of this marriage were—Sir Augustus d'Este, born January 13, 1794, and Ellen Augusta Mademoiselle D'Este, born August 11, 1801. Lady Augusta Murray survived her separation from her illustrious husband until March 1830. The Duke's second wife, Lady Cecilia Gore, daughter of the second Earl of Arran, survives his Royal Highness: she was created Duchess of Inverness by her present Majesty, March the 30th, 1840.

Immediately after his Royal Highness died messengers were sent off to her Majesty at Buckingham Palace, the Queen Dowager, the Duchess of Kent, and other branches of the royal family; to Sir R. Peel, the Home and other public offices.

The bells of Kensington Church and St. Margaret's, Westminster, were immediately tolled to announce the melancholy event.

A solemn and impressive service was performed on Thursday night and Friday morning, in all the City synagogues, for the recovery of his Royal Highness, it being the Passion holidays of the Hebrews.

In the evening all the metropolitan theatres were closed.

 Next week we shall give an original and authentic memoir of his late Royal Highness, with three engravings.

Her Majesty and Prince Albert arrived at Kensington Palace at four o'clock, in an open carriage. Mr. Walker, the comptroller of the household of the Duke of Sussex, attended her Majesty and his Royal Highness, and communicated the state of his Royal Highness when her Majesty appeared much affected.

The Duchess of Kent arrived at Kensington Palace soon after her Majesty, to inquire after the Royal Duke.

The Duchess of Gloucester and the Duke of Cambridge also paid visits in the afternoon.

Her Royal Highness the Princess Sophia Matilda sent to learn the state of his Royal Highness.

Nearly the whole of the diplomatic corps, Sir R. Peel, and most of the ministers in town, and about 300 of the nobility and gentry, called in the course of the day to inquire after the health of his Royal Highness.

Throughout the whole of Thursday a feeling of most painful excitement pervaded the town and neighbourhood of Kensington on the subject of the Duke of Sussex's health, the bulletin of the previous evening having from its tenor excited fears of his Royal Highness's ultimate recovery, which fears were strengthened by the terms of the bulletin issued at eight o'clock that morning. From an early hour until nearly dark groups of well-dressed persons from all parts of the metropolis promenaded the avenue leading to the Palace, anxious to obtain the slightest information respecting the progress of the illustrious Duke.

His Royal Highness, as far as his limited means allowed, was an ardent encourager of learning and science, and the patron of all deserving aspirants in the walks of art, as well as the benevolent supporter of most of the various charities which adorn and distinguish the British metropolis.

NOOKS AND CORNERS OF OLD ENGLAND.

MOORE'S COTTAGE.

Our sketches of residences of "the poets" having caused us to receive many expressions of pleasure from our readers, we are induced to present them with another, the present abode of Thomas Moore, given us by a particular friend of that poet, if we may presume thus to individualise any who enjoy that privilege towards him, whom Byron styled—

The beloved of all circles,
And the idol of his own.

We accompanied our sketch of Moore's cottage at Ashbourne with an humble but well-merited eulogy of the poet's "even tenour of life:" to this we can add but a few words relative to Sloperton Cottage. Extremely secluded, it yet draws many travellers aside to catch a glimpse of the retreat of him whom Mrs. Norton has said, keeps "a honey-bag of poetry," so smooth, polished, sweet are his lines. Mr. Moore took possession of Sloperton soon after his return from Italy, where Byron, Moore, and Shelley together shone out as no mean stars of the genius and poetry of England. It appears to have been chosen with the same tone of feeling as his previous cottage at Ashbourne—abstraction from the glare and glitter of the metropolis—the vicinage of kindred spirits (being but a short distance from Bowood, the beautiful domain of the Marquis of Lansdowne, as Ashbourne was of "the princely line o' Talbots"—the Earl of Shrewsbury), as well as of the poetic companionship of the Rev. Lisle Bowles, whose charming sonnets must ever remain favourites with the public. Here often have assembled at Moore's frugal but elegant table the élite of talent, wealth, and fame—Rogers, Southey, Lord Lansdowne, and others, too many to name, visitors to their merry companion of wit and feeling. His poetic invitation, as one of the Irish melodies, is very expressive:—

Though humble the banquet to which I invite thee,
Thou'lt find there the best a poor bard can command:
Eyes, beaming with welcome, shall throng round to light thee,
And love serve the feast with his own willing hand.

* * * * * * * *

Then come, if a board so untempting hath power
To win thee from grandeur, its best shall be thine;
And there's one, long the light of the bard's happy bower,
Who, smiling, will bland her bright welcome with mine!

MOORE'S SLOPERTON COTTAGE.

His invitation to Lord Lansdowne is also happy, but too recently before the public to need repetition here. Of his cottage he has again sung—

And that dear home, that saving ark,
Where love's true light at last I've found
Cheering within, when all grows dark,
And comforties, and stormy round.

But now, alas! the gloom of parental suffering has o'ershadowed it—has reached his very hearth—Mr. Moore's youngest son, a beautiful youth of eighteen, having but a short time since departed from a world whose sins had not yet soiled his bright spirit, of an illness caused by too early exposure in his military career in India.

In addition to many other honours, Mr. Moore has lately received the distinguished one of the "Order of Merit" at the hands of his Majesty the King of Prussia, Faraday and Herschel being the only two other English subjects receiving a similar gratifying proof of their renown in Europe.

Many portraits have appeared of Moore, but all been considered complete failures—by his friends—not even excepting that done by Sir Thomas Lawrence. Messrs. Longman intend publishing a magnificent edition of the melodies, illustrated by Maclise, and a most successful portrait, by Richmond, will much increase the value. By the favoured few who have seen it it is pronounced a faithful likeness of Erin's bard.

INTERESTING CEREMONY AT VIENNA.—Wednesday, the 5th inst., being the fiftieth anniversary of his Imperial Highness Archduke Charles having received the grand cross of the military order of Maria Theresa, the whole garrison, to which two regiments bearing the name of the venerable prince had been added, marched out to the Glacis to a most magnificent parade. Several splendid tents had been erected for the imperial family and their suite. At ten o'clock his Majesty the Emperor arrived on horseback, accompanied by the Archdukes, and the general officers of the garrison, and escorted by the Life Guards. Their Majesties, the two Empresses, and the other illustrious members of the imperial family followed in open carriages, and attended the high mass and "Te Deums," performed in front of the troops, previously to which salutes had been fired from all the guns on the ramparts; and, immediately after the conclusion of the solemn service, the Emperor, embracing the Archduke Charles, decorated him with the cross of Maria Theresa, superbly set in diamonds, in sight of the immense crowd of spectators, and during their loud and repeated acclamations and hurrahs. The Archduke then received the warm congratulations of the members of the imperial family, the other knights of the order, the generals, &c. The troops having afterwards defiled before his Majesty the Emperor, the whole imperial family and suite returned to the castle, where at two o'clock a sumptuous banquet took place in the hall of the Knights of Maria Theresa, beautifully decorated for this occasion. Of course all the knights of the order were invited.

An order for the liberation of Ensign Maclachlan arrived at Malta by the last packet from England. In compliance with this order, the young officer was liberated within half an hour after the delivery of the despatches. It may be remembered that Ensign Maclachlan was condemned to six months' imprisonment by the criminal court at Malta for an alleged insult to a religious procession.

THE LATE DUKE OF SUSSEX

IN our later editions of last week's Illustrated News we had the sorrow to announce to the public the melancholy circumstance of the death of the Duke of Sussex; and we now, on another page of this journal, present to our readers a biography of the prince, from the private and public memorials of his amiable career. The departure of his Royal Highness, like that of all mortals who go from high places to the grave, is another illustration of the mutability of human greatness from grandeur to decay — of the "regum turres" levelled with the "pauperum tabernæ"—of the palace stricken with the same solemn visitation which carries mourning and affliction into the cot. So far the common moral warning is pointed to the world; and the thinking portion of the community are subdued into wholesome reflection by the event which bids them grieve. But with regard to the death of his late Royal Highness, other evidences are deducible, pregnant with lofty and even holy meaning—evidences which declare society to be so far independent and pure of heart as still to pay the highest tribute to goodness rather than to greatness, to worth rather than to wisdom, to virtue rather than renown. The Duke of Sussex lived popular, and has died most honestly, most honourably, most universally regretted. Why was this? Not for his princedom; for the voice of free thought—particularly among those classes with whom his Royal Highness identified his political opinions—pays but small respect to princes, and perhaps holds royalty cheap; not for any fame achieved, any deeds of glory done in the service of his country—for the duke had neither naval nor military renown, nor did he affect a character for statesmanship beyond a simple though hearty espousal of a cause he deemed the best; not for any considerations of widespread magnificence, leaving its train of profit wherever it might be displayed—for his Royal Highness was proverbially poor.

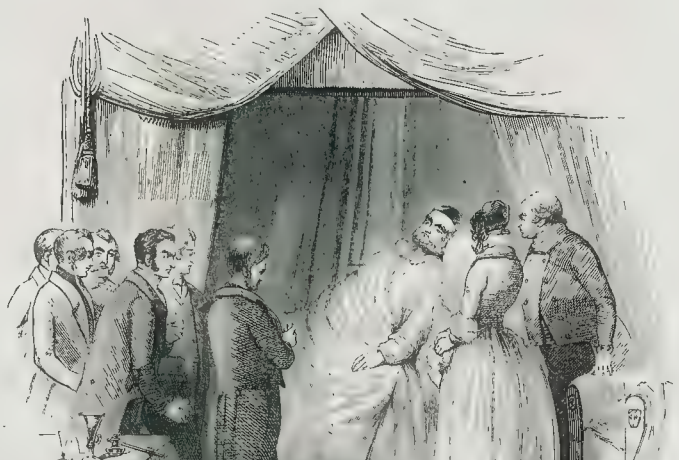
From none of these causes did the people of England pay to the Duke of Sussex the tribute of popularity during his life-time, of sincere lament and regretfulness when he passed from among them, another traveller to the tomb. They gave their respect to a higher reason—a reason which ennobled the gift; they gave it in recognition of three of the loftiest virtues of the human heart—charity, honesty, and the love of brotherhood; they gave it for qualities which added to the lustre of the prince, but were only regarded as the beautiful endowments of the man.

The Duke of Sussex was, beyond question, a champion in the holy cause of charity, and to its benevolence he made his rank subservient. This was a fine example. He presided over all public institutions with a cheerful spirit and a free abounding grace; he gave his hearty voice in favour of every project of humanity, every alleviation of worldly distress; and, though poor, he made his pocket readily pour out its evidence of the sincerity of what his tongue professed. That he was honest—we mean in purpose, intention, and political practice—we may gather from his consistent adherence to his party, which Sir Robert Peel, in moving the address of condolence to her Majesty, characterised as entitling him "to the attachment of his friends, and the respect of those who differed from him on public affairs;" and, for his love of brotherhood, we have only to point to that great brotherly foundation, over which he presided with so much earnest zeal and cordial sympathy—the beautiful institution of Freemasonry, which now mourns his departure with an almost affectionate regret.

In his character as a civilian, too, the Duke of Sussex shone conspicuous, and with a peculiar identity with the people. Educated at a celebrated seat of learning abroad, he had carefully fostered the advantages of study, and fitted himself for a very high order of intellectual converse with mankind. To ordinary abilities he united extraordinary accomplishments of mind, and these he strengthened with the weight of his position, in upholding everything connected with the advancement of literature, science, and the arts. Of these it was his pride to be the liberal patron; and there is no doubt that his share in aiding the bright progress of modern civilisation was comprehensive in proportion to his means.

The circumstance of his first marriage, too, was one which greatly endeared him to many virtuous minds. He made his contract before heaven and his country, not with one unworthy of his rank and birth, but with a noble English maiden, every way a credit to his choice, and in defiance of that unnatural law which limits the affections of royalty, and only affiances it to creatures too often of its own kindred, always of its own degree. Virtuous men held that this conscientious alliance was more honourable to the duke's heart than to have yielded to the allurements of profligacy, or to have played the part of the seducer; that it gave out a better moral example to the people; and that it betrayed an inherent generosity and manliness of nature which commanded their admiration and respect. It broke down, too, a barrier which communities have always regarded with jealousy, and drew royalty one step nearer to the popular heart. It is, nevertheless, to be deeply regretted that the law put its veto upon an act of wisdom and of virtue, and that the wife whom the prince had chosen, and the people loved and honoured, was not legally elevated to the position she was so well calculated to adorn. Let us hope that so foolish and mischievous an enactment may be abrogated by the less prejudiced intelligence of improved legislation, and that the time may soon come when our royalty will not be looked upon as tainted by a healthy blending with purely English blood.

We have thus briefly scanned the chief elements of the popularity of the late prince, and we repeat that it was creditable to the taste and virtue of society as evincing its disposition to set up the example of goodness above even the most lustrous realisations of ambition—the most dazzling attraction of personal glory and renown. We do not, however, claim for the memory of his Royal Highness more than an honourably qualified regard. Like other men he had his failings, but they are not to be recorded here; and our hearts would indeed be less charitable than was his for whom we sorrow, if we allowed any traces of their recollection to remain upon our happier knowledge of those purer qualities by which the late Duke of Sussex became endeared to the nation.



LAST MOMENTS OF THE DUKE OF SUSSEX.

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

FRANCE.—(From our own correspondent.)—Paris, April 25.—The affairs of Greece continue to occupy the serious attention of our diplomatists, and with little probability of a satisfactory result. All that Lord Aberdeen has been able to obtain from M. Guizot is a promise of a strict neutrality, and orders have been sent to that effect to M. de Bourqueney, the French representative at Constantinople. M. Guizot, I am confidently informed, is strongly desirous of acting with Lord Aberdeen, but there is a power superior to that of the French Foreign Minister, and that power is decidedly in favour of Russia. Most of our statements are for courting the favour of the Emperor Nicholas. Molé, Thiers, the whole of the Opposition, and a great part of the Conservatives are Russians, backed by the King. I do not go so far as to say that a war would be hailed with delight; but, the general opinion is that the French alliance is so necessary to England that no risk is run in that quarter, whilst much is to be obtained from a closer alliance with Nicholas. Indeed, such is the fear of offending the Emperor that in our courts of law any allusion to Poland is most strictly forbidden. The following anecdote is a striking proof of servility:—In a cause lately heard at the Cour Royale, before the Chief President, M. Seguier, M. Maud'heux, the barrister, called Prince Czartoriski "the Chief of the Polish Emigration."

"President Seguier—That title cannot be admitted."

"M. Maud'heux—It is not a title—it is a mere denomination."

"President Seguier—Everything is reported that is said here, and we are exposing ourselves to a reclamation from the Russian ambassador. I cannot permit it."

M. Maud'heux was obliged to give way, thus establishing the precedent that to allude in a speech to the cause of the Polish emigration, I trust Lord Aberdeen will not place much faith in the promised neutrality, for, sooner or later, he will find that Russian influence is all-powerful at the court of the Tuileries.

The Chamber will soon break up, and the deputies return to their departments. It is difficult to surmise what account they will render to their constituents of their labours, for they have literally done nothing but the public service: they have stormed about "the right of search," and, after much blustering, given way; they have discussed the lines of railroads, without coming to any definitive conclusion; and they have thrown overboard the Belgian Custom Unity; but, on the other hand, they have tried to upset the ministry; they have voted the secret service money, and will vote the budget. By the by, as regards the budget, the following curious anecdote is going the round of our papers:—"A celebrated sporting banker lately proposed a wager of £1000, that if 20 sous per minute had been paid into the Royal Treasury from the foundation of Rome to the present day, it would not amount to the sum demanded for the public service in the budget for 1843." The wager was accepted. After a minute calculation, it was found that 2696 years had gone by since the foundation of Rome; that 20 sous per minute make 60 francs per hour, 1440 francs per day, 43,200 francs per month, and 518,400 francs per year. This sum, multiplied by 2696, gives a product of 1,345,766,400 francs. The budget for 1843 amounts to 1,404,513,710 francs. The banker won the wager!

There is no truth in the report that Admiral Roussin, the Minister of Marine, had sent in his resignation. There has been a misunderstanding between the admiral and M. Guizot as to the right of search, and in the Otaheitan and Marquesas Islands, but it is amicably arranged. The opposition journals do not see that there is no longer any occasion for a Minister of Marine, for the disarmament of the fleet is decided on, and being carried into execution with great activity!

Balfe's opera was brought out at the Opera Comique, on the 17th, and was well received. The music is light, agreeable, and very melodious. In the overture an adagio was greatly applauded. Mr. Balfe is much indebted to the principal actors, who did all they could to ensure success. In the first act Mesdames Thillon and Ugalde sang a most delicious duet to a waltz movement. The second act is not so rich as the first; the third is, perhaps, the best of the three acts. Mr. Balfe is a great admirer of wind instruments, and uses them too often; he also too strongly imitates the Italian school; but, on the whole, Mr. Balfe is an excellent musician, and it is sincerely to be wished that his opera may meet with that success it so justly merits. The libretto of the opera, "The Well of St. John," is by Messrs. Second De Leuven, and is rather common-place. It is as follows:—During the reign of one of our Edwards the Earl of Salisbury, travelling in Ireland, becomes enamoured of Geraldine, a young Irish maid; the earl, disguised as a sailor, courts and gains her heart. King Edward, about to be married to a princess of Hainault, is desirous that the earl should marry a rich heiress, to whom he is already related by the ties of blood. He soon learned that Geraldine was in London, sends her back a ring which she had given to him as Tony the sailor; at the same time she is informed that he is dead, and that with his last breath he blessed her. The principal artists have also made choice of Geraldine there is a well, called "the well of love," from a young girl having thrown herself into it, slighted in her love—poor Geraldine follows the example. Edward, before taking a step of so serious a nature, resolves, previous to giving a grand entertainment to his most intimate friends. During the fête the king expresses a wish of putting to the test the sincerity of his followers, and calls on those who love him to throw themselves into the "cuve pit of love." The King had previously by an ingenious piece of mechanism caused not only the bottom of the pit to be lined with down cushions, but the persons taking the leap to be conveyed unperceived to a most sumptuously furnished saloon. The surprise of the king and his companions is great, on finding the place already occupied by a most beautiful girl. Geraldine who had thrown herself into the well believes herself to be dead, and an inhabitant of another world. The king favours this delusion, and entertains it with fantastical masquerade and demoniacal scenes. The king becomes enamoured with Geraldine, and, previous to granting a grand entertainment to his most intimate friends. The king pursues them, but the earl having in his possession certain written documents proving a too close intimacy with the heiress destined as his bride, generously gives them to the king—and the king as a reward consents to his marriage with Geraldine.

A new opera, of which report speaks well, is now in repetition at the Opera Comique, commenced by Auber, but not finished until after his visit to Paris—many have already been heard. Offenbach, the principal artists have also taken their departure; Thalberg has left for Vienna; after staying a short time in the Austrian capital he will embark for America. Savoi has gone to Brussels, and from thence to London. Servais, the celebrated violoncelliste, violoncellist, has received a most brilliant offer from a German court for a certain number of concerts. This truly talented artist has not yet decided whether he will cross the ocean or the Rhine on the Channel. It is to be hoped that concerts are over it is but an act of justice to give publicity to the protection given to artists by Louis Philippe and the whole of the royal family—a certain number of tickets are taken at every concert; it would be as well were the example followed elsewhere.

On Sunday last Miss Rebecca Felix, sister to Miss Rachel, aged only thirteen years, made a début in the Salle Chaptal, in the character of Eryphile, in the tragedy of "Iphigénie." Rebecca, who it was generally supposed would be a mean copy of her sister, greatly astonished a most numerous audience. She tries to imitate, not copy; and, although so young, she is graceful and dignified. Her voice is powerful, and not monotonous, and her recitations truly classical. It is said that her father is her only master: she does him great credit, and she is destined to be a most brilliant actress. On the same occasion, a young brother of Rachel and Rebecca also made his début in the character of Achille, but with little success. Raphael Felix would make a better comedian than tragedian, and should study Molière and Regnard instead of Racine and Corneille.

We continue to have most strange weather. In the south of France the cold rains and frosts have completely destroyed the vines, and in the north, fine weather and continued sunshine have greatly advanced vegetation. In the south, the price of wine has greatly increased; in the north, oil has fallen; the corn is most forward and promising. In Paris we have much sickness; all the hospitals are full.

A few days since an English gentleman, Mr. D——, was arrested by the police and confined for twenty-four hours at the Prefecture; his boxes were broken open and his papers seized. Mr. D——, during his imprisonment, wrote to the British ambassador, but, on being liberated, the letter was given back to him. "I have not thought proper to forward your letter," said the police functionary, "for it was my duty to arrest you as an illegal liberty." Mr. [illegible] was suspected of being accompanied by a Spanish [illegible] servant, whom the French Government had expelled from France [illegible] Paris on a philanthropic mission. He left on a journey forth on Sunday last at the house of a Miss Knight, a Quakeress, living in the Faubourg du Roule.

The Princess Clementine was married on the 21st, at the Palace of St. Cloud. It might be called strictly private, for none of the Ambassadors were present. The absence of the Infanted Duke of Orleans cast a gloom on the countenances of all members of the royal family. It is said that the Princess and her illustrious husband, the Prince of Saxe Coburg, intend visiting Queen Victoria.

Too much publicity cannot be given to the monomania of English ladies for titled foreigners. I know a Lincolnshire family of whom three members are married to two counts and a marquis. These marriages are generally unhappy. There is a difference in taste and habits, to say nothing of religion. In most cases the lady brings the money, the husband an empty title. It is reported to-day that a Miss L——, an English lady of fortune and great beauty, has eloped from Paris with a ruined debauché Italian marquis. Several of the respectable portion of our English residents have already quitted Paris for the season.

ONE O'CLOCK.—The demand made yesterday by the Minister of Marine in the Chamber of Deputies for a grant of 5,227,000 francs, for organising establishments in the islands of Marquesas and Otaheite, has met with general approbation.

It is officially announced that the Duke of Nemours will be present at the opening of the Rouen railroad on the 3rd of May.

Yesterday the saloons of the Palais Royal were opened for the sale of objects—gifts of different persons—to be applied to the Guadaloupe fund. The receipts amounted to nearly £2000. The sale will last three days.

SPAIN.—MADRID, April 17.—The sittings of the Cortes still continue to be uninteresting. The Regent has been very unwell, and though now better he still continues to suffer much pain at times. It is observed, by his highness's medical attendants, that when his mind is agitated and excited by political events the complaint always returns with renewed virulence; thus, whilst at Zaragoza, in 1841, on receiving the San Sebastian, he suffered severely; and a few weeks before, when he received the news of the bombardment of Pampeluna, by Olozaga, he also experienced another sudden attack. The same thing occurred at Valencia on those extraordinary events which led to the retirement of Queen Christina from Spain, and made him regent; and during the sittings at Sarria, after the Barcelona insurrection, he was confined to his bed most of the time.

According to the Sol of the 17th the following Cabinet was formed on the evening of the 16th:—Minister of State and President of the Council, General Campuzano; Grace and Justice, Senor Joan Alonso; Interior, General Iriarte; War, General Chacon; Exchequer, Senor Pita Pizarro; Marine, Senor Cagaz. President of the Deputies, Senor Lopez.

The idea that a prolongation of the Queen's minority is meditated occupies a great deal of attention in Spain. It is said that numerous agents have been sent into the provinces, for the purpose of preparing the public mind, and to induce the different municipal and provincial authorities to forward addresses to the Regent in favour of this measure, which, I cannot but think, would lead to all sorts of miseries if attempted.

MADRID, April 18.—The debates of this week in the Madrid Congress were rather interesting. The elections of the Infante, Count de Parsent, and Senor Ortega, were unanimously approved. After this the verification of the Madrid elections took place. Senor Mata stood up, and strongly condemned the election of Senor Arguelles, the Queen's guardian: he said it was directly in contravention of the 57th article of the Electoral Code, which expressly states that none can be a Deputy who is connected with the Queen's household. This was the only valid argument brought by Senor Mata against this election, which the Cortes of 1841 sanctioned by one hundred votes against three or four. Senor Arguelles defended his election in an able speech, and was afterwards admitted as a Deputy by eighty-two votes against thirty. On this occasion the opposition (who have a decided majority in the Congress) could not throw Senor Arguelles out, because the partisans of the Infante were obliged to vote with the Government on this occasion to prevent a precedent being established which would afterwards have been used against him, for he is likewise a member of the Queen's household; and therefore, if Senor Arguelles had been voted incapable of holding his seat, the Prince would likewise be compelled to remove into the Senate.

TURKEY.—Letters from Constantinople of the 7th have reached us. The bearer of the ultimatum of the Emperor Nicholas relative to the Servian question, presented by M. Bontenef to Sarim Effendi, had been instructed to wait eight days for a reply. The Turkish government seems determined to make no approach to concession; and should no satisfactory answer be forthcoming within the time prescribed, the Russian Ambassador will, it is believed, demand his passports.

CAPE OF GOOD HOPE.—Advices from the Cape of Good Hope to the 28th of February reached us on the 24th inst. by the packet, papers and letters having been put ashore at Plymouth from the ship Seringapatam. The accounts possess considerable importance, when the lately threatening attitude assumed by a great number of the Boers on the frontier is considered, and the strong probability that for some time existed that they would not be brought to reason without a collision with the troops. For the present the affair with the Boers may be considered disposed of. It is quite obvious, however, from a number of apparently trifling incidents related, that there is at bottom but little abatement of their hostile feelings, and that in reality they have only succumbed to superior force, committing to the courts of law proceedings of the Lieut.-Governor, who seems to have reaped golden opinions from all parties for his wisdom and energy.

AMERICA.—We have received New York papers to the 7th inst. inclusive by the packet ship Independence, Captain Nye, which arrived at Liverpool on Tuesday forenoon, after a remarkably quick passage of 17 days. They are six days later than those previously received.

The papers contain two sets of correspondence between Mr. Webster, the American Secretary of State, and Mr. Fox, our Minister at Washington, both relating to disputed territory on the north-eastern boundary. The first set had reference to a resolution of the legislature of the State of Maine, relative to certain proceedings of the government of New Brunswick, appointed to be in continuation of the decree of the treaty of the 9th of August, between the United States and Great Britain, by attempting to collect from American citizens bonds or securities for timber cut, belonging to the disputed territory, and the surrender of them to Great Britain to the states of Maine and Massachusetts under that treaty. Mr. Fox, in acknowledging the receipt of Mr. Webster's letter, promises to inquire from the Lieutenant-Governor of New Brunswick if such a proceeding existed, and when it did, gives the result of the inquiry. The lieutenant-governor had, so long ago as October last, on receiving intelligence from Lord Ashburton of the signature of the treaty of Washington, issued a proclamation to the sheriff-general of the province to suspend all proceedings upon the bonds in question: the attorney-general had duly obeyed the order. "It appears, therefore," says Mr. Fox, "that the measures complained of by the United States, have been grounded on an accurate statement of facts." The second set of correspondence had reference to the seizure, by the British authorities, of an American citizen, named Baird, on the disputed territory of the United States, and by them forcibly carried into the territory of New Brunswick. Mr. Webster's letter enclosed a statement of the abduction of Savage from the official report furnished by the commanding officer of the American post on the disputed territory. Mr. Fox, in his letter acknowledging the receipt of the letter and the statement, says that he had not received any information of the occurrence from the British authorities at Washington, "if it shall have been found that any indiscretion or irregularity had been committed by persons serving under the authority of the British provincial government, he has no doubt that the matter will have been already set to rights by the lieutenant-governor."

The papers also contain a letter from Mr. Webster to Mr. Everett, the American minister at London, dated the 24th of March last, on the subject of the right of visitation. It is a vindication of the passage in the President's message at the opening of Congress relative to the right of search, which, it will be remembered, gave rise to discussion in the British Parliament. It occupies about two columns in the New York papers, and is too long for publication in our columns.

The publication of the correspondence between Mr. Webster and General Cass, on the right of search question, is continued in the papers before us. It is very voluminous.

Neither the stock nor the money market had presented any features of interest. Prices of state securities were improving.

Bills on London were in limited demand for the Independence. The rat was 109½ to 106 per cent. premium. On Paris the rate was 5f. 42½c. to 5f. 41½c.

The finding of the court-martial in the case of Commander M'Keenie had not been promulgated.

The papers contain a report of the trial of a man named White for the murder of his father in Genesee county, Western New York. The trial, which took place at Batavia, is described as one of the most remarkable on record in the United States. In the defence the counsel for White set up the plea of insanity, and brought forward a variety of facts, showing singular eccentricity of mind and habit in the criminal; but the jury found a verdict of such defence. The jury found the prisoner guilty, and the judge sentenced him to be hung.

Accounts from Vera Cruz to the 3rd of March had been received, viâ New Orleans. Santa Anna had left his residence near Vera Cruz on the 27th of February for the city of Mexico, where his presence was much wanted. The correspondents of the papers there are of opinion that the existence of a conspiracy in the capital against the president, who, it is said, had ordered troops destined for Yucatan to march on the capital. It was reported at Vera Cruz that a large conducta of specie had been sent from Mexico to Santa Anna.

Accounts from Texas to the 18th ult. had been received at New Orleans. It was rumoured, but the rumour wanted confirmation, that a proposition had been made by England to the British consul-general at the Texian government, to abolish slavery within the limits of the republic; and that, upon its agreeing to do so, he was authorised to say that England would effect the immediate recognition of Texan independence by Mexico. The comet had formed the subject of equal wonder and speculation in Texas.

No later accounts than those previously in our possession had been received from Campeachy.

Montevideo papers to the 15th of February, a week later than those previously received in England, had reached Baltimore. It appears on that day the inhabitants were driven from their breastworks around the town, and all the houses outside the works, for the distance of half a mile, were taken down to leave the plain open. Rosas, the Buenos Ayrean general, with an army of 9000 men, was supposed to be at the distance of ten or twelve miles from Montevideo, preparing for an attack. No business was doing, every one being engaged in preparations for the expected attack. The vessels were all lying idle.

The accounts from Kingston state that Sir Charles Bagot still lingered, with but slight hopes of ultimate recovery. His successor, Sir Charles Metcalfe, had entered on the duties of his government.

IMPERIAL PARLIAMENT.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—MONDAY.

The house did not meet.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—MONDAY.

The house resumed its sittings after the Easter recess.—A great number of petitions, principally against the education clauses of the Factories Regulations Bill, were presented.—Petitions were also presented against the returns for the boroughs of Athlone and Nottingham.—The SPEAKER informed the house that the sureties for the due prosecution of the petitions against the returns for Cambridge and Nottingham were unexceptionable.—Mr. ROEBUCK gave notice of amendments on the third, fourth, and fifth resolutions to be proposed, on the 2nd of May, by Lord John Russell, on the subject of education.—Sir J. GRAHAM informed the house that, on Monday next, he would state the alterations he proposed to make in the clauses, relative to education, of the Factories Bill. He then gave notice of his intention to move a committee of the house, pro formâ, on the bill, for the purpose of receiving those alterations, as by that course the discussion could be taken upon all the clauses seriatim.—The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER gave notice that he would, on the 8th of May, bring forward his budget.—Sir R. PEEL gave notice that, on Tuesday, he would move an address of condolence to her Majesty on the death of his Royal Highness the Duke of Sussex.—In reply to a question from Mr. D'Israeli, respecting the affairs of Servia, Sir R. PEEL, after briefly stating the origin and actual position of the controversy pending between Russia and the Porte on this question, said he could give no more specific assurance as to the conduct of the British Cabinet in the matter, than that their only wish was to see the dispute amicably and fairly arranged.—The resumed debate upon the Ecclesiastical Courts Bill was fixed for Friday.—Sir J. GRAHAM, in answer to Mr. Ewart, stated that the Government had no intention of proposing any new code of criminal laws, or any alteration in the bankrupt law of last session.—The resolution of the Committee of Supply, granting £9,000,000 on account of Exchequer bills, was read a second time, and the bill founded on it ordered to be brought in, after a speech from Mr. WILLIAMS, complaining of the rate of interest paid on those bills.—On going into committee of supply, Lord J. RUSSELL asked if the statements he had seen in the newspapers of the failure of the commercial treaties with Portugal and Brazil were true? Sir R. PEEL replied that he would on Tuesday be prepared to give a distinct answer to these questions.—In reply to questions from Lord J. RUSSELL, respecting the bill which it was proposed to bring in respecting the importation of Canadian corn, and also respecting the intention of the legislature of Jamaica upon the produce of this country and of Ireland, Lord STANLEY said he was ready to lay upon the table the information which he had received from the Governor-General of Canada respecting the measure passed by the legislature of that colony, and he hoped in a few days to be able to give notice of the precise day on which he would introduce a bill upon the subject. With respect to Jamaica he agreed with the noble lord that it was most objectionable in principle that the colony of Jamaica should impose taxes on the produce of this country. It was only that morning, however, that he had received a communication from the Governor of Jamaica upon the subject, and he would only then say that he would shortly give every information on the subject.—On the motion for the house resolving itself into a committee of supply, Mr. COCHRANE moved for a return of the sums unnecessary for him to mention, oppose the vote for the College of Maynooth.—Mr. WILLIAMS entered into a long statement, in the course of which he endeavoured to show that our colonies were an encumbrance to the country—particularly our possessions in the West Indies.—Mr. BERNAL said that his hon. friend was altogether mistaken if he supposed those colonies were no very expensive to this country. There was a large amount contributed to their own expenditure, as was evidenced by the fact that for his property in Jamaica, like all other proprietors of property in that colony, he had of late years received nothing. In fact, recently, the only remittance which he paid on his property was five times greater than the returns he received from it.—Lord STANLEY said that the Government were quite agreed in principle with the hon. member, that those colonies should, as far as possible, be made to support their own expenditure; but it was a principle which should be gradually applied, and very many of the colonies already contributed largely to that object.—Sir R. INGLIS called the attention of the Government to the insufficiency of funds in the colonies for the purpose of spreading the Gospel. The Church Missionary Society not only had not funds to provide additional missionaries, but they were unable to keep faith with those who had been already sent out.—In reply to a question from the LORD MAYOR respecting the powers of the Government as regarded emigration, Lord STANLEY said he felt great uneasiness at the hardships to which some emigrants had recently been exposed; but anticipating a question upon the subject, he was prepared to show that no blame whatever could be attributed to the Government. In this, as in the very case referred to, the interference of the Government had been carried to the very extent of its powers. In October last they had received information that the ship Barbadoes was loading, and was about to sail, and was going to Prince Edward's Island. Having reason to suppose that a case of probable deception was going on, the Government emigration agent was instructed to inquire into the matter, and to give every assistance to the intending emigrants. It turned out that the vessel was well found, that she had an abundant supply of provisions, and that, in fact, the provisions of the PASSENGERS Act had been fully complied with. It was represented to the Government by the emigration agent that they had purchased 72,000 acres of land in Prince Edward's Island, and as this land was alleged to have been purchased from private individuals and not from the Government, it was the duty of the Government to ascertain the fact. The emigration commissioners went even beyond their powers in this case. They remonstrated with the company—represented to them the period of the year—and pointed out the attempt extremely hazardous; but they were met by assurances that every possible precaution had been taken. The Government, however, sent information to the governor of the island, and instructions should the vessel arrive, that he was to afford every protection to the emigrants, and to compel the company to perform towards them the obligations it had undertaken. The ship sailed on the 1st of November, and on the 20th of December arrived back to the Cove of Cork. The emigration agent in the port, on inquiry, ascertained that it was the intention of the company to support the emigrants on board until the ship should be ready to sail, and that he could see no more provisioned for the voyage. It was held out in February that the vessel would sail in March, and yet at that very time the company was insolvent, and the owners of the vessel. Here was a distinct fraud. Application was made to the Treasury for its interference, and the crown solicitor was employed, but when the dissolution of the company took place it was found that there was no legal remedy. As, however, this company had been sanctioned by gentlemen of high station, whose names must have had considerable influence in enabling the company to collect that unfortunate body upon the hardship sufferers, though not legally obliged, still he trusted they would feel the moral obligation to remedy the great evil which their high names and character had been a chief means of contributing to encourage and promote.—After a few observations from Mr. V. SMITH and the CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER, the house went into committee of supply.—The votes were of a miscellaneous character, and related to deficiencies in the civil list. Some conversation arose on the expenses of New Zealand and the West India colonies, and on the grant for the consular establishments.—After some objections from Mr. WILLIAMS, Dr. BOWRING pointed out the importance and necessity of educating those who were to fill consular establishments, and insisted that consuls should at all events be able to speak the language of the country to which they were accredited.—Sir R. PEEL said that the subject was under the consideration of Government.—The remaining votes passed, with some general remarks; but on the vote for the expenses of steam navigation to the East Indies by way of the Red Sea, after some remarks from Dr. BOWRING, Sir R. PEEL highly eulogised the conduct of the Pacha of Egypt, who had evinced towards us a most enlightened spirit under circumstances calculated to make him act very differently.—Sir R. PEEL HIGGINS concurred in the compliment.—The votes having been gone through, the chairman reported progress, and after the few remaining orders were disposed of, the house adjourned at nine o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—TUESDAY.

Their lordships met on Tuesday for the first time since the Easter recess.—Lord WHARNCLIFFE gave notice that on Monday he would move the second reading of the Engl.sh Registration Bill.—The Schoolmasters (Scotland) and the Ministers' Money Bills were read a first time.—Lord MONTEAGLE moved for a return showing the number of pauper lunatics in Ireland, and complained of the practice there of confining lunatics in the gaols. He recommended the appointment of a committee of inquiry, for the improvement of the Irish Poor-law, that the confinement of pauper lunatics in the poorhouses should be prohibited.—The Duke of WELLINGTON promised that, in the measure to be shortly referred, the fullest we ght would be given to his suggestions.—The returns were ordered.—The Duke of WELLINGTON moved an address to the Queen on the birth of the Princess. His Grace said, that your lordships have all heard the joyful event which has been announced to the public this day—I mean the birth of a Princess. I take the earliest opportunity, according to usage, of moving an address to congratulate her Majesty upon this happy occasion. The same humble address be presented to her Majesty to congratulate her Majesty on the birth of another Princess, and to assure her Majesty that every addition to her domestic happiness affords the highest satisfaction to the House of Lords.—The address was agreed to in the accustomed word.—The Duke of WELLINGTON gave notice that, on Thursday, he would move an address of condolence to her Majesty on the decease of the Duke of Sussex.—The LORD CHANCELLOR stated, in reply to questions put by Lord Campbell, that he had prepared a bill on the subject of the Fleas of Insanity, which bill had also been considered by the law-officers of the Crown; but that he thought it better not to lay it on the table until the opinion of the judges had been taken. He said that he had requested the chief justice of the Common Pleas to consult the other judges as to the time when they would be convenient for them to attend, and had not yet received a definite answer. No delay would be had in consulting them on this subject, so he can also be consulted on the question of Irish marriages.—The Marquis of CLANRICARDE gave the LORD CHANCELLOR notice that, in reply to questions put by Lord Campbell, that he had prepared a bill on the subject of the Flea of Insanity, which bill had also been considered by the law-officers of the Crown; but that he thought it better not to lay it on the table until the opinion of the judges had been taken. He said that he had requested the chief justice of the Common Pleas to consult the other judges as to the time when they would be convenient for them to attend, and had not yet received a definite answer. No delay would be had in consulting them on this subject, so he can also be consulted on the question of Irish marriages.—The Marquis of CLANRICARDE gave the LORD CHANCELLOR notice that, on Thursday, he would move an address of condolence to her Majesty on the decease of the Duke of Sussex.—The LORD CHANCELLOR stated, in reply to questions put by Lord Campbell, that he had prepared a bill on the subject of the Flea of Insanity, which bill had also been considered by the law-officers of the Crown; but that he thought it better not to lay it on the table until the opinion of the judges had been taken. He said that he had requested the chief justice of the Common Pleas to consult the other judges as to the time when they would be convenient for them to attend, and had not yet received a definite answer. No delay would be had in consulting them on this subject, so he can also be consulted on the question of Irish marriages.—The Marquis of CLANRICARDE gave

Mr. T. Duncombe presented a petition from the Rev. W. Browne, complaining of having been dismissed from the chaplaincy of Knutsford Gaol, and praying for inquiry.—Several petitions were presented in favour of the South-eastern and London and Croydon (Bricklayers' Arms Extension and Station) Railway Bill.—The report on the bill was brought up, further considered, and the bill read a second time.—Viscount Marsham rose to move some additional clauses to the bill. The noble lord explained that one clause was to compel the company to carry its passengers, should any of them desire it, to the London station, otherwise than by the line proposed by the Bricklayers' Arms. The second clause was to regulate the fares, in order, as we understood, to prevent the Croydon Company charging less for passengers on the latter part of their line, whereby the Greenwich Company would be injured.—The clauses were brought up and read a first time.—On the question that they be read a second time, Mr. B. Cochrane, as chairman of the committee to which the bill had been referred, felt himself compelled to oppose the motion.—Mr. Kemble thought the clauses quite unnecessary, for the interest of the company would induce it to carry its passengers, who desired it, to London-bridge. The parties who were now opposing the bill had declared they would oppose it in all its stages, and they took this opportunity of opposing it, which was unfair, in order to take the chance of throwing it out in the Lords. He declared that he considered this bill no breach of faith with the Greenwich Company, or he would be the last man to support it. He approved of the bill, and opposed the clauses because he thought that the bill as it stood would place all the companies on an equal footing.—Lord Howard, as a selected member of the committee to which the bill was referred, supported the clauses, which he thought necessary.—The Lord Mayor supported the clauses. If they were not adopted, the Croydon Company, by withholding its passengers, would compel the Greenwich Company to take off the toll it now collected from the passengers of other companies using its line.—After a brief conversation the clauses were withdrawn.—Lord Marsham then moved that the bill be recommitted.—

Gladstone opposed the motion; and after a few words from Sir Edward Knatchbull in support of the motion, and from Mr. Kemble in opposition, [illegible] after a few words from the Lord Mayor and Mr. Aldham in favour of the motion, [illegible] For the reasons of the noble lord, Mr. Kemble, and Mr. Aldham, he should oppose the motion. Mr. Hume and Mr. Villiers supported the motion, as the [illegible] the 4th to the 9th May.—Sir J. Graham, in reply to Mr. Macaulay, said he hoped to be able to introduce the contemplated measure for the regulation of the medical profession, which he expected to pass during the present session.—Sir R. Peel, according to his promise on Monday night, entered into an explanation of the negotiations respecting a commercial treaty between Portugal and this country. We had proposed to Portugal that the duties imposed upon the importation of the wines, &c., of that country into Great Britain should be reduced, provided the Portuguese Government consented to a reduction of the duties on our woollens, cottons, hardware, &c., into Portugal. The negotiations, however, had proved unsuccessful, and the announcement to that effect having been made by the Government of Portugal. The Brazilian Government, with whom negotiations had been also in progress with a similar view, had recognised the construction placed upon the existing treaty by the British Government, and that treaty will therefore continue in force until the year 1844. The propositions, however, made by this country for a re-adjustment of the commercial relations between the two countries had been replied to by a demand that the sugar, tobacco, &c., of the Brazils should be allowed to be imported into Great Britain upon the same terms as we admitted our own colonial produce. Mr. Ellis, the gentleman who was sent to the Brazils by the British Government, intimated his inability to agree to such a proposal, upon which the Brazilian Government proposed that we should in no case impose a duty of more than 10 per cent. upon Brazilian produce than that which we imposed upon colonial produce. This Mr. Ellis could not concede, and the negotiations had been in consequence suspended.—Sir R. Peel: I dare say Sir that any gentleman who may have given notice of a motion which stands for to-night will permit me, in conformity with usual courtesy, shortly to interpose, for the purpose of carrying out the intention of which I gave notice last night, of proposing an address of condolence to her Majesty, on account of the loss which the country and her Majesty have sustained by the lamented death of his Royal Highness the Duke of Sussex. (Hear, hear.) The motion with which I shall conclude of course contains an address of sympathy to her Majesty, and a tribute of public respect to the character and services of the Duke of Sussex. (Hear, hear.) Though the Duke of Sussex was not called upon to perform distinguished military services, and though, by his position, he was precluded from rendering any great services in a civil capacity, yet, by the force of his own character and conduct, he succeeded in establishing claims on the respect and public attachment of his country. (Hear, hear.) His long residence by preference in England—his truly English habits—his constitutional manners and demeanour—his habits of friendly and social converse with all classes of society—his zeal in the promotion of every object connected with science and literature, a zeal the more effectual on account of his own literary and scientific attainments—the readiness with which he, in common with all other members of the Royal family, made every sacrifice of time and personal interest for the advancement of every object connected with charity and benevolence; all these constitute claims on the grateful remembrance which must long endear his name to the people of this country. (Hear, hear.) I must also add, that the consistency, firmness, and disinterestedness with which his Royal Highness maintained throughout life those political opinions which he professed must have naturally established for him a strong point of connection and attachment between those who shared those opinions with him; whilst they entitled him no less to the respect of those who differed from him. (Loud cheers.) His Royal Highness combined the firm maintenance of his own political opinions in matters with such an absence of asperity towards those who differed with him, that it is impossible he should have left behind him a political enemy. (Hear, hear.) I have thus, in calm and simple language, endeavoured to enumerate the strong titles which his Royal Highness had to public respect, and which every one will admit. (Cheers.) I have said nothing but in the most precise conformity with the truth, and I trust that I shall be simple statement of the truth forms a panegyric much more suitable to the character of his Royal Highness than any elaborate or inflated encomium which could have been passed upon him. (Loud cheers.) Without a few more observations, I shall submit to the house a motion which I hope will meet with their unanimous concurrence. I beg to move that the house would present a humble address to her Majesty to express the deep concern of the house at the loss which her Majesty and the country had sustained by the death of his Royal Highness the Duke of Sussex, to condole with her Majesty on the melancholy occasion, and to assure her Majesty that this house will ever participate with affectionate and dutiful attachment in whatever concerns the feelings of her Majesty and of her illustrious house.—Lord J. Russell: The right hon. gentleman well perhaps allow me the honour to second the motion. I should hardly have added a word to what has been so well and so feelingly said by him on this subject, but that I had the honour of an intimate acquaintance with the late Duke of Sussex, and was most sincerely attached to him. (Cheers) With regard to his political opinions, what the right hon. baronet has said is perfectly true, that their consistency attended the respect not only of his friends, but also of his political opponents. (Hear, hear.) I will not say one word as to whether these opinions were right or erroneous, but I will say that they were opinions taken up from honourable motives, and which he maintained with much earnestness in conformity with his birth or rank, but opinions which he considered as tending to the maintenance of the constitution under which he was born, and to the benefit of the people amongst whom he lived. (Hear, hear.) With respect to his attachment to science and literature, there was nothing of ostentation in his devotion to these pursuits. There was nothing [illegible] a pretence of conferring honour upon those with whom he associated. (Hear, hear.) It was, on the contrary, a love of these objects on which he was well entitled by his attainments and study to speak, by which he was animated, and which enabled him freely to converse on such subjects with those who had devoted their time to them. I shall only add that I sincerely agree with the regret which the right hon. gentleman has expressed, and in the expressions of condolence and deep sympathy to her Majesty for the great loss which she and the country have also sustained. (Cheers.)—The motion was then agreed to nem. con., and the address ordered to be presented by such members of the house as were members of her Majesty's Privy Council.—Sir R. Peel [illegible] in the house at this time [illegible] (the birth of a [illegible] these [illegible] congratulations [illegible] an I feel perfectly convinced that the address [illegible] Majesty. (Cheers.)—[illegible] I rise most cordially to second the motion of the right hon. baronet in this address. All must agree in the sentiment which [illegible] derives from her high station; and all must concur in congratulating [illegible] Majesty on an event which promises so much to both. (Cheers.)—The motion was agreed to nem. con.—Mr. Ricardo then brought forward a motion, that an humble address be presented to her Majesty, respectfully expressing the opinion of this house, that it is not expedient that any contemplated remission of import duties be postponed, with the view of making such remission a basis of commercial negotiations with foreign countries. A long discussion ensued.—The motion was supported by Lord Howick, Lord John Russell, Mr. Ewart, Mr. Villiers, and Mr. Cobden. It was opposed by Mr. Gladstone, Lord Sandon, Mr. D'Israeli, Sir Howard Douglas, and Sir Robert Peel.—On a division, the motion was rejected by 184 against 61.—Mr. Villiers, on the part of Sir T. Wilde, postponed the motion of which he had given notice on the petition of Mr. Rowland Hill.—Adjourned at half-past 12 o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—Wednesday.

The house did not sit.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—Wednesday.

Mr. M. Gibson asked if there was any objection on the part of the Government to state the exact amount of protection to the West India proprietors which Mr. Ellis was instructed to stipulate for in the negotiations with the Government of Brazil. The Brazilian Minister had offered to assent to a differential duty of ten per cent., as had been stated by the right hon. baronet; but he thought the house ought to know the amount required upon by the West India interests.—Sir R. Peel regretted he could not reward the perseverng attempts of the hon. member to obtain this information, which it was not desirable to communicate. In reply to another question from the same hon. member, Sir R. Peel said that if the treaty had been brought to a successful conclusion with Portugal, the duty on port wine would be reduced, but it by no means followed that the duties on French and Spanish wines would be similarly reduced, unless treaties were also concluded with those countries.—Mr. M. Gibson wished to ask if the treaty with Brazil was looked at upon the ground of the slave trade, or upon the question of protection to the West India interests. Was it, in fact, broken off upon a question of morals or of finance?—Sir R. Peel said it was broken off because Mr. Ellis was not authorised to agree to a differential duty of not more than 10 per cent.—Mr. Barnard, in reference to the treaty with Portugal was absolutely broken off?—Sir R. Peel said he had said on previous evenings that the Portuguese Government had announced that it was broken off, though he thought the word used might be translated interrupted. The fact was, that this country had made a proposition, which proposition had not been accepted, and since then we had made no new propositions.—Lord John Russell then moved the second reading of the Municipal Corporations Bill, which he understood was to be opposed, though upon what principle he could hardly conceive, unless it was proposed to adopt some other mode of correcting the abuses in those smaller corporations to which his bill referred. The noble lord stated the causes existing for the present municipal corporations, and said he proposed to abolish, or re-model, all those contained in schedule A, while the government of those in schedule B might be entrusted to vestries. If any borough were considered of sufficient importance to have a constitution, he proposed that the governing body should be elected by persons resident three years in the borough, and paying rates and taxes. If these corporations were to exist, he thought they should not be self elected. Nor could he see, after dealing with the larger corporations of the kingdom, why they should refuse justice to the smaller ones.—Mr. W. Williams seconded the motion, but regretted that no attempt was made to reform the corporation of London, and as the noble lord had not included it in his bill, he hoped the Government would take steps to put an end to the monstrous nuisance.—Sir James Graham said his time was too much occupied to enter upon a reform of the corporation of London. He was not prepared to be its assailant, or to enter upon its defence, but he was convinced that the noble lord would find it very difficult to deal with the subject required. It not only abolished eighty-five charters, but clause 4, by which thirty-four corporations were abolished, introduced a new principle, accordingly objectionable, for it put an end to representation, and gave [illegible] payers power over the vestries. The right hon. baronet stated other objections to the bill, and said he was of opinion that the bill, with all these objections, ought not to be allowed to proceed further during the present session. He therefore moved that the bill should be read a second time that day six months.—After a few observations from the Lord Mayor, in explanation of the city expenditure, Lord J. Russell replied. After which the house divided, and the motion was rejected by a majority of 99 to 46.—The other orders of the day were then disposed of, and the house adjourned.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—Thursday.

Lord Abinger brought in a bill, which was read a first time, to amend the act of last session for the regulation of the Court of Exchequer.—The Duke of Wellington, after a short speech, but in which he spoke most highly of the late illustrious duke, moved that an address of condolence and sympathy be presented to her Majesty, on the death of his Royal Highness the late Duke of Sussex.—The address was seconded by the Marquis of Lansdowne, who eulogised at some length the late Duke of the late royal duke, and carried nem. dis.—Lord Campbell introduced a bill to regulate the succession of moveable property in Scotland.—The Duke of Cleveland presented three petitions against the proposed Canada Corn Bill.—Adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—Thursday.

The St. Helen's Waterworks Bill was read a third time and passed.—A great many petitions against the educational clauses in the Factories Bill were presented.—Mr. Lane Fox gave notice that, on the 11th of May, he would call the attention of the house to the agitation now going on for the purpose of effecting a repeal of the legislative union between the countries of England and Ireland. He should move that it was the duty of her Majesty's Government to take immediate steps to put an end to that agitation; and, if the law were not sufficiently powerful to enable them to do so, it was their duty to apply to Parliament to grant them a power for putting an effectual and final termination to that agitation.—Mr. T. Duncombe postponed, to this day fortnight, a motion for a select committee on prison discipline.—Mr. B. Disraeli gave notice that tomorrow, at the time of public business, he would put a question to her Majesty's Government respecting certain diplomatic proceedings which had lately occurred at Constantinople with regard to the affairs of Servia.—Mr. Mackinnon moved for a select committee to ascertain the revenue, expenditure, and condition of the harbours and navigation on the coast of the Thames to Postmouth. His object was to ascertain whether or not in the collection of these revenues there was not considerable mismanagement, and to have the surplus revenues of the harbours applied to the improvement of harbours of refuge.—Mr. Corbett, Sir C. Burrell, Sir E. Knatchbull, Mr. Rice, Captain Pechell, and Sir Charles Napier, spoke on the motion. After considerable discussion on the house divided, when there appeared—For the motion, 34; against it, 79: majority, 45.—Mr. John Jarvis obtained leave to bring in a bill to facilitate the recovery of debts not exceeding £20

DESTRUCTION OF POINTE-A-PITRE.

THE RECENT EARTHQUAKES AT GUADALOUPE.

The annexed representation of the destruction of Pointe-à-Pitre, by the terrific earthquake which visited the island of Guadaloupe on the 8th of February last, has been derived from the information of M. Lemourier de la Croix, who was, for ten years, located as surveyor of buildings at Pointe-à-Pitre, and who, accordingly, must be well qualified to furnish these illustrative details of the melancholy spectacle. Accounts of the catastrophe will be found in our papers of March 18 and April 15.

Pointe-à-Pitre, or St. Louis, the capital of the island, stands or rather stood, on Grand Terre, at the south entrance of the Rivière Salée. The harbour is sheltered, and the anchorage good. The town was originally built in 1763, but in 1780 was reduced to ashes by fire. The town was soon rebuilt, with regularity and elegance, and soon became the most flourishing commercial station of the French colonies in the Antilles. It appears, however, to have fallen in the earthquake, a if from a thunder stroke; and fires breaking out at various points, completed the work of destruction and death. From the immense gaps burst forth torrents of water, flames, and smoke, which engulphed more than 2000 victims. The loss of merchandise is estimated at £30,000,000, and the other property at £40,000,000. In recounting the details of destruction, it is feelingly stated in the French papers, that it will require some years to rebuild a town of 900 elegant stone mansions, vast warehouses, and public edifices, such as have been destroyed by the recent earthquake.

The scene of the engraving is one of as frightful desolation as the pencil of the artist ever illustrated. The over-toppling buildings on the one side, the devastating flames on the other, and the terrified people rushing to escape from the chaos in a few boats, some of which are overcrowded with the sufferers, make up, indeed, a heart-rending spectacle. As a contrast to this scene of turmoil and woe, the second engraving shows the great road of Pointe-à-Pitre, with a portion of the town before the disaster, and the smoking Souffrière in the distance. In the short space of sixty-six seconds, how the serenity of this scene of beautiful nature changed to a carnival of terror and destruction! Nor did the destroyer stop here, for by the Weekly (New York) Herald, April 1, we learn from Capt. Smith, of the schooner Francis Cannady, just arrived, that a second shock of an earthquake was experienced at the north part of Guadaloupe, on the 3rd of March. At the time, the captain of a vessel off the north point of the island stated that it shook his vessel with such severity, that it was with difficulty the crew could keep their feet. A dense cloud of smoke ascended from the vicinity of Basseterre, and serious fears were entertained for the safety of that place. It was quite sickly at Pointe-à-Pitre, caused from the offensiveness of the ruins of the town.

Meanwhile the call of the Governor of Guadaloupe for succour to the afflicted population has been munificently responded to throughout France. The Government have voted 2,500,000 francs towards the aid of the sufferers; well-organised subscriptions have been commenced in every department; and in Paris ingenuity has been ceaselessly exercised in the charitable work; even the fair fingers of royalty have been emulous in the sacred cause. Nor has the practical benevolence of England been withheld, but freely and liberally exercised in the pure spirit of Christian charity; a large sum has been raised for the immediate relief of the sufferers, and in aid of the restoration of the ruined churches, chapels, and school-houses; the list being headed by her Majesty the Queen and the Queen Dowager, each of whom has contributed the munificent sum of £500.

GUADALOUPE.

COUNT MOLE.

Louis Mathieu Molé was born in 1780. At the commencement of the Revolution he emigrated with his father, but returning to France without permission they were arrested; the father died on the scaffold, and young Molé was set at liberty. Although threatened with death, Molé refused divulging the secret residence of his mother, his sister, and the Marchioness of Lamoignon, his grandmother. Not feeling in security in France Molé and his family retired into Switzerland, and from thence to England. At the death of Robespierre he re-entered France.

In 1806 Molé was named by Napoleon auditor to the Council of State, and in 1807 he was raised to a seat at the board, and created a Count of the empire. Molé was held in great estimation by Napoleon, and in 1813 was named Minister of Justice. On the fall of Napoleon he accompanied Marie Louise to Blois, and remained in retirement during the first Restoration; at the same time he signed, as one of the members of the municipality of the Seine, an address to Louis XVIII., in which was a violent attack on Napoleon.

On the return of Napoleon from the island of Elba, Molé resumed his place as Director of Bridges and Highways, but refused signing the declaration of the 25th of May, separating the family of the Bourbons for ever from the throne of France. After the battle of Waterloo Molé was confirmed in his appointment by Louis XVIII., who, at the same time, created him a Peer of France.

In the month of August, 1817, he was named Minister of Marine, but was obliged to retire at the end of the first session. In 1820 he separated himself from the Ultra-Royalists; in 1822 took his seat in the Chamber of Peers, during the administration of M. Villèle, on the benches of the Opposition.

The 7th of August, 1830, on the first ministry named by Louis Philippe, Molé took the department for Foreign Affairs, and assured Europe of his determination to preserve peace; he at the same time laid down the principle of non-intervention, and Talleyrand proposed the Quadruple Alliance. Molé remained only three months in office, and was replaced by M. Sebastiani. In the month of September, 1833, Molé formed an administration with Guizot, but was driven from office by Thiers and Soult.

On the 15th of April, 1837, M. Molé formed an administration which lasted two years; but Guizot having formed a coalition with the Radicals, the Doctrinaires, and the Legitimists, he was again forced to retire.

COUNT MOLE.

Count Molé is considered a truly honest man, of good judgment, but not possessing sufficient nerve or firmness of character for days of trouble; his language is good but not fluent, and carries not conviction with it. Molé is a firm Aristocrat, and labours hard to give consideration.

Count Molé is now the rival of M. Guizot, and should the latter retire from office there is little doubt the Count will be called on to form a Conservative Peace administration—it will be a change of men, not measures.

IRISH CENSUS FOR 1841.—The census, which was simultaneously taken in every parish in Ireland on a given day in 1841, and which has occupied a considerable staff in its preparation for publication, will soon be printed and laid before Parliament. A variety of curious and interesting details will be supplied for the first time. The exact amount of the population, ranked according to sex and age—the diseases which are most prevalent and fatal—the number of insane persons under restraint—with other statistical details, will, we understand, be given with a surprising degree of accuracy. The following is a return of the population:—

	Males.	Females.
Leinster	963,747	1,009,084
Munster	1,[illegible],129	1,209,971
Connaught	[illegible],884	711,072
Ulster	1,161,840	1,224,379
	4,019,667	4,155,666
Total Population	8,175,273
In 1821 the population was		6,801,827
In 1831 it was		7,767,401
In 1841 it was		8,175,273
Increase between 1821 and 1831		965,574
Increase between 1831 and 1841		407,872

From this it appears that the increase during the ten years up to 1841 was 557,702 less than it had been in the ten years preceding. This extreme reduced rate of increase is a very remarkable and extraordinary fact. It is evident that, during the last ten years, there has been a very decided check to the progress of population in Ireland. The increase in England during the ten years from 1831 to 1841, was 2,004,794, which was more than one-seventh upon the population of 1831. The increase in Ireland, during the same ten years, was 407,872, which was little more than one-twentieth of the population of 1831. The increase in England has been in the ratio of nearly 3 to 1, as compared with Ireland. This is the first time that Ireland has shown a less degree of increase than England.

NOOKS AND CORNERS OF OLD ENGLAND.

DUNSTABLE PRIORY CHURCH.

Dunstable, one of the principal market-towns of the county of Bedford, and situate at its southern extremity, was, in very early times, a place of considerable importance. Indeed, its situation at the point of contact of the Ikinald and Watling-streets would denote its ancient importance, were there no existing relics of its former greatness. The venerable pile represented in the engraving is, however, of a period long subsequent to the early British and Roman epochs, when the above streets or roads were constructed by our ancestors, or adapted by their conquerors. It shows all that remains of a priory for Black Canons, founded by King Henry I. in the latter part of his reign, and exhibits the Norman intermingled with the early English style of architecture.

The entire church was in the form of a cross, with a tower in the centre, supported on four lofty arches, with clustered columns and hexagonal capitals; of these a portion remains at the western end. In its pristine state, the church must have been a magnificent structure. At the dissolution, the gross revenue of the priory was £402 14s. 7d., and the clear revenue £344 13s. 3d. per annum. Henry VIII. is stated to have intended the church for a cathedral, and Dr. Day for the bishop; and this design being abandoned, it is probable that a considerable part of the edifice was demolished, as the portion now standing reaches only from the western door to the choir entrance, and consists of the nave and two side aisles, about forty yards in length. The nave is supported on each side upon six circular and lofty arches; the arches of the upper windows are also circular, as well as the groined arches at the east end, which is walled up. Over the western entrance is a beautifully constructed stone roof, formed by four pointed arches, supported on clustered columns; beneath it is a richly-carved wooden screen, with an oaken roof, embellished with knots of flowers, &c., and the beams are supported by angels, horizontally and perpendicularly. About the church are several grotesque heads and figures, sculptured in stone.

The western doorway presents a singular intermixture of circular and pointed arches, and elaborate embellishment. On each side of the greater doorway are four columns, with Norman capitals, whence spring five varieties of mouldings: the outermost consists of bold zigzag; the second has angels and foliage in alternate ovals; the third, beasts' heads and foliage; the fourth, a spread-eagle, with the signs of the zodiac, of which Pisces and Capricorn remain; the fifth, flowers, &c. On the capitals of the columns are sculptured David playing the harp, a bishop in pontificalibus, and other figures. The lesser doorway has seven mouldings on five columns, exclusive of the innermost moulding, composed of roses, interlaced-work, and nail-headed quatrefoils. The moulding of the arch between the two doorways is half zig-zag and half straight; and the interlaced arches within it rest on grotesquely-sculptured capitals. The space over the small doorway is embellished with flowers in compartments. Above the large doorway are three rows of flattened arches, the first having pedestals for statues; and beneath the main arch are three ornamented niches.

DUNSTABLE PRIORY CHURCH.

The tower is attached to the north-west angle of the edifice, and has two rows of vacant niches. Originally there was on the opposite side a corresponding tower. According to the "Chronicle of Dunstable," two towers fell in the year 1221, and destroyed the prior's hall and part of the church. The body was repaired in 1273, chiefly at the expense of one Henry Chedde. Stone coffins have been dug up, at various times, on the site of the eastern part of the church; and in 1745 one was found containing a skeleton, nearly entire, with a glass urn, &c.

The church is rich in monuments. In the middle aisle was formerly a large black slab, inscribed with an epitaph so quaint and ambiguous as to have given rise to the tradition of one woman having had nineteen children at five births. The edifice is now the parish church of Dunstable. Over the altar is a large painting of the Lord's Supper, by Sir James Thornhill, which, with the communion-plate and a rich pulpit-cloth, was presented to the parish by two sisters, in the year 1720. In this church there was formerly a fraternity of St. John the Baptist, to whom is said to have been presented, about 1514, a very richly-embroidered altar-cloth, an early and very beautiful specimen of needlework, stated to have retained its freshness for two centuries.

The eastern part of the chancel is raised upon two steps, and was originally the choir; the ancient stalls remain, and under each seat (visible when turned up for kneeling to prayer) are some carcaturæ carvings, supposed to ridicule the Black Friars of a convent founded at Dunstable in 1259, and held by the prior and canons to be intruders!

Such is the church of Dunstable, a fragment of the magnificent priory, yet one of the finest specimens of our early architecture that time and the great despoiler, man, have spared for the admiration of our age. The spring of piety which rose with this noble foundation has "welled forth away" to our times; for there are in the parish a richly-endowed charity school, besides almshouses for widows and unmarried gentlewomen.

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.

Among our notices of this season's brilliant performances at her Majesty's Theatre our readers will have observed a mention of a very beautiful feature of that department which is sacred to the muse of dancing, in a revival of the graceful "minuet de la cour" of the days of Louis XIV., which has not been danced upon our Anglo-Italian stage since the time of the celebrated Vestris and Milaine until our present tasteful entrépreneur confided it to the charming execution of Elssler and Dumilâtre—the one en cavalier, the other as lady of the court. A few days back this minuet was again introduced, we believe for the last time, and our artist has here represented it for "those who love the dance." It is picturesque enough to see the sprightly Elssler, with her powdered hair and cavalier costume, threading the graceful mazes of the minuet with a "dame de la cour" of the first water of the fashion of the day, and presenting a lovely contrast to her enchanted partner. Those who would enjoy the scene, however, in its more animated reality, should have gone to worship Terpsichore before our Italian stage.

THE MINUET DE LA COUR.

ART UNION OF LONDON.—DRAWING PRIZES.

Tuesday being the day appointed for the drawing of prizes in the Art Union, a most crowded auditory assembled at Drury-lane Theatre on the occasion. The Marquis of Northampton, in consequence of the lamented decease of the late Duke of Sussex, presided. Mr. Godwin then, at the request of his lordship, read the report, which stated, that notwithstanding the pressure of the times, and the various descriptions of opposition which had been set up against the Art Union, the subscription for the present year amounted to £12,338 11s. Last year 269 pictures and one piece of sculpture had been purchased at a cost of £10,036 9s., being £1136 9s. more than the amount apportioned by the society. The amount set apart in the present year for the purchase of works of art is £2000, and is thus allotted:—50 works of art, value £10 each; 30 of £15, 40 of £20, 28 of £25, 23 of £30, 18 of £40, 12 of £50, 10 of £60, 8 of £70, 6 of £80, 5 of £100, 2 of £150, 2 of £200, 1 of £300, and 1 of £400. To these are to be added 20 bronzes of Sir Richard Westmacott's "Nymph and Child," and 30 medals of Chantrey; making in the whole 280 works of fine art. To save time the medals will be allotted to the first 30 names drawn consecutively at the close of the distribution.

The drawing of prizes then took place, the most conspicuous amounts being thus declared:—The prize of £400 was drawn in favour of Mr. J. Harman, Earl-street, Blackfriars; that of £300 was gained by Mr. C. Legge, of Bermondsey; one of £200 by Mr. T. Stone, of Thame, in Oxfordshire; one of £200 by Mr. J. Newcomb, of Upper-near Eton; one of £150 was awarded to the Rev. T. H. Russell, of Printing-house-square, Blackfriars; one of £150 to Mr. C. A. Darley, of Burtonfield-house, near York; one of £100 to Mr. H. J. Aveling, of Bayham-cottages, Camden-town; one of £100 to Mr. Marshall, of Cheltenham; one of £100 to Mr. J. J. Bywater; one of £100 to Dr. W. Price, of Swansea; one of £100 to Mr. A. Weekes, of the London-road, Brighton; one of £80 to Mr. W. Horsley, of Clarges-street, Picadilly; one of £80 to Mr. J. Kent, of Trafalgar-road, Greenwich; one of £80 to Mr. C. Goodall, of Maidavale; one of £80 to Mr. N. Freeman, of Northampton; one of £80 to Dr. E. James, of Kingtown, Herefordshire; and one of £80 to Miss Atkinson, of Jermyn-street, &c.

At the conclusion of the business of the day a vote of thanks was given to the noble marquis for his impartial conduct in the chair, which having been duly acknowledged by his lordship, the vast assemblage quitted the theatre.

Our rebuke both to publisher and author ought to have been sufficient. Unquestionably, nothing could purchase an opinion in this journal, and we are sure that the possibility of such a degradation cannot apply (but with very rare exceptions) to the London press.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON, SATURDAY, APRIL 30, 1842.

ANNIVERSARY OF THE ESTABLISHMENT OF THE "ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS."

On the 14th of May, 1842, the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS made its first appearance, with an amount of promise to the public which it has since carefully endeavoured to fulfil. At the conclusion of an address couched in sanguine terms it thus saluted its (then future) readers:—

Here we make our bow, determined to pursue our great experiment with boldness; to associate its principle with a purity of tone that may secure and hold fast for our journal the fearless patronage of families; to seek in all things to uphold the great cause of public morality; to keep continually before the eye of the world a living and moving panorama of all its actions and influences; and to withhold from society no point that its literature can furnish or its art adorn, so long as the genius of that literature and the spirit of that art can be brought within the reach and compass of the Editors of the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS!

Correspondence from all quarters, and, what is much better, the most unprecedented patronage from the community, form our claim to the fulfilment of the pledge of hope which we then made to the public. Scarcely a twelvemonth has passed, and yet the Government, by its stamp returns, has placed us at the head of the poll—by many thousands—in the general election of newspaper representatives for the empire. We trust, above all points of our promise, that we have upheld the cause of public morality; we know that we have thus secured the patronage of families, and that Art and Intelligence have been linked together in a brotherhood never known before. We have crushed rivalry, and provoked envy—without a wish or an effort to touch either; but we have so exceeded the bounds of ordinary prosperity in the midst of opposition, that we were last week obliged to have recourse to an experiment unprecedented in the history of the newspaper press. We have not condescended to reply to any attacks made upon us, on the score of perhaps natural jealousy, by journals accustomed to head the stamp returns until we outstripped them; but we now simply announce the fact that we this week commence a double establishment—that we print our journal twice over—that we have two sets of engravings—and that those who doubt our circulation may see two different machines working those numbers of the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS which the one impression was not adequate to supply. This is the expedient to which we have recourse until our new machines are completed, and this expedient settles the question of our demand.

But as we commenced this notice by recording the birth of the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS, so do we conclude it with the announcement that the

will not only now (but always) be attended with due celebration. In this first instance, and on the 20th of May, we shall produce at one publication in which all that we have ever promised will be exceeded—while the novelty and attraction of the subjects produced will surpass anything that has yet been attempted in the columns of a newspaper.

TWO NUMBERS OF THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS,

We have this week to congratulate our readers upon the birth of a Princess—of another scion of that royal stock which has so completely won upon the affections of the people, in the persons of our loved Sovereign Victoria and of her much-respected consort. Whatever increases the happiness of our Queen must add to that of her subjects; and thus it is that a general rejoicing fills the heart of society whenever any fresh affections are awakened in her bosom who can shed maternal love so gracefully, not only upon her beautiful children, but upon all the land she sways. It often happens by the unerring will of Heaven, and thus in the fulfilment of her human destiny has our royal mistress had the grief which may have bowed her spirit over her uncle's melancholy death softened by the sweet and happy pride which a young mother must ever experience in the birth of a child. So does the congratulation of the country upon the glad event blend with its condolence over the gloomy; so does the cry of mourning come half-stifled by the hand of joy. And while all respect the memory of the illustrious duke who has departed, and the affectionate sorrow of his royal niece, their Queen, yet they breathe still deeper aspirations for the future happiness of the little stranger she has brought them, and breathe a fervent prayer for the mother and her new-born child.

That bitter Sorrow's sad alloy
Comes chastened by some touch of joy;

It is with very sincere gratification that we extract the following paragraph from the daily journals:—"On Sunday afternoon the open-air preachers commenced their season campaign in the Regent's Park. One gentleman, who had taken up snug quarters under a capacious tree, commenced the display, when he was unceremoniously consigned to the tender mercies of a police officer, who conducted him to the station-house. Another lecturer was about to address an assembly in the course of the evening, but, happening to hear of the fate of his predecessor, he speedily decamped without delivering his intended exhortation. The Commissioners of Woods and Forests have ordered such proceedings to be taken in order to put an end to the revolting and blasphemous discussions which prevailed to so great an extent during the last summer." This is as it should be, and the authorities deserve every approbation for their alacrity in thus reproving and putting down one of the most disgusting nuisances that ever offended the decency and feelings of society. At periods of every sabbath, during the last summer, itinerant brawlers would infest the broad public walks—congregations around them—crowds of the curious, whom they endeavoured to deprave with violent blasphemies—loud and careless profanations of the most sacred names—horrible pernicious political doctrines—attacks upon peace and order—loathful adjurations and hollow mockeries of prayer, which alternately produced discord, derision, and disgust. These exhibitions had, in fact, assumed an aspect almost alarming—they tended to the spread of vice—they interfered with the harmless cheerfulness of the sabbath-evening walk of the humbler classes—they disturbed the minds of weak listeners—they sickened the serious and right-thinking with ineffable disgust—and they made points of rendezvous for thieves and pickpockets, hardly more criminal or less respectable than the itinerant vagabonds themselves. They are now, however, so far as the parks of the metropolis are concerned, deterred from the pursuit of their impious calling; and we hope that public authorities generally will extend the sphere of this useful prohibition to all parts of the country in which such a wicked style of open-air lecturing as that which has been too long suffered to obtain in London may be henceforth discovered to prevail.

THE COURT AND HAUT TON.

On Sunday morning her Majesty and Prince Albert attended divine service in the newly-consecrated Chapel-royal of Buckingham Palace, upon which solemn occasion the Bishop of Llandaff preached the sermon. After luncheon the Queen walked in the private garden of the palace, with Prince Albert, for more than an hour, without any appearance of fatigue. There were no guests at the royal table that day, and the Queen retired at the customary hour.

Tuesday was the birthday of the Duchess of Gloucester, who received visits of congratulation from the several members of the royal family.

The Gazette of Tuesday contained the following notification:—"LORD CHAMBERLAIN'S OFFICE, April 26.—Notice is hereby given that the Levee intended to be held by his Royal Highness the Prince Albert, at St. James's Palace, on Wednesday next, is postponed to Wednesday, the 17th of May next, at two o'clock."

PRINCE GEORGE OF CAMBRIDGE.—The report that has gone the round of the papers, of his Royal Highness's appointment as colonel on the staff in the Ionian Islands, is premature, if not unfounded.

MARRIAGE IN HIGH LIFE.—On Tuesday, April 25, at St. George's Church, Hanover-square, by the Rev. P. P. Mosley, Major William Fawkner Chetwynd, late of the Life Guards, second son of the late Sir George and brother of the present Sir George Chetwynd, Bart., to Mary Anne, daughter of Sir Oswald Mosley, Bart.

A licence for the marriage of Sir Thomas Moncrieffe, Bart., with the Lady Louisa Hay, daughter of the Earl of Kinnoull, was taken out on Tuesday. Sir Thomas Moncrieffe is in his 21st year, and the Lady Louisa Hay is not yet eighteen.

METROPOLITAN NEWS.

THE SHERIFFS' FUND.—On Tuesday a meeting of the president, vice-president, and friends of the Sheriffs' Fund, the object of which is to afford assistance to criminals who have undergone their period of punishment, in order that they may be enabled to be placed in situations to obtain a livelihood, was held at the London Coffee-house, Ludgate-hill, for the purpose of electing a trustee, and on other business connected with the charity. Mr. Sheriff Hooper having been appointed trustee, Mr. Wire said that their stock amounted to £6000, and that, with a little more assistance, they would be able to accomplish great benefit. The meeting then separated.

DISCOVERY OF MR. BUSFIELD FERRAND'S BODY.—At two o'clock on Thursday morning four men, fishing in the Thames, drew up the body of a gentleman, upon whom papers were found, sufficient to identify it as the body of the late Mr. Busfield Ferrand. Decomposition had taken place to a much less degree than might have been expected. Upon shipping the body no marks of violence appeared. The head had evidently received severe contusions, but none of them were indicative of any circumstance leading to the conclusion that any other than accidental causes had produced the death of the gentleman. The body now lies at the Abbey Arms, Plaistow, Essex. The same evening, at five o'clock, Mr. Lewis, coroner for the Essex division of the county of Essex, held an inquest at Plaistow, on the body of the deceased, but no new facts were elicited. Several witnesses having been examined, the coroner addressed the jury, remarking upon the evidence, and regretting the want of precaution that was evinced by the proprietors of the pier in allowing so dangerous a place to remain so much exposed without lights and without watchmen.—The jury unanimously left the matter in the hands of the coroner, and returned the following special verdict—namely, "That the death of Mr. Edmund Ferrand Busfield resulted from accident; but that the jury must express their regret that the owners of the Brunswick Pier should be so regardless of the safety of the public as to have allowed, and do now allow, the pier to be open to the public after nine o'clock at night in perfect darkness, so that any person may walk upon it, at the risk of his life; and they (the jury) hope that in future it will be lighted and watched, or that the gates will be constantly kept closed after dark.

On Wednesday last a large number of persons assembled at the Roman Catholic chapel attached to the convent called "of our Lady of Mercy," situate in Parker's-row, Bermondsey, to witness the ceremony of taking the veil by two young ladies, named Miss Cuddon and Miss Bagster. The former young lady belongs to a distinguished family residing at Bungay, Suffolk. The ceremonies were of the usual imposing character.

SHIPWRECKED FISHERMEN'S SOCIETY.—The anniversary dinner of this benevolent institution was held on Wednesday last, at the London Tavern, when Sir George Murray presided. The cloth having been removed, and the usual loyal toasts given, the statistical business of the evening commenced by Sir George Murray giving a most clear and lucid statement of the objects of the society, and the immense benefits which it had already conferred upon the hardy inhabitants of the maritime towns of this country. Amongst the list of subscriptions we heard the names of Prince Albert, £50; the gallant chairman, who contributed a donation of 21 guineas; Mr. Heatherly, Esq., M.P., £10; G. H. Foster, Esq., £30; Lord Dartmouth, £10; Lawrence Sullivan, Esq., £20; G. Curtis, Esq., £12; G. Hubbard, Esq., £10, &c. &c. On retiring from the chair Sir George Murray was again cheered, and appeared much gratified by his hearty reception.

SCOTTISH HOSPITAL.—On Wednesday an extraordinary general court of the governors of this corporation was held in the institution in Crane-court, Fleet-street, James Nisbet, Esq., in the chair, for the purpose of transacting the usual business of the society, and the election of seven poor persons, natives of Scotland, and 70 years of age and upwards, to receive pensions of £19 per annum. The business of the day having been concluded, thanks were voted to the chairman, and the meeting broke up.

ROYAL BERKS BENEVOLENT INSTITUTION.—The annual meeting of the members of the above institution was held on Saturday, at the office of the society, Fleet-street, for the purpose of receiving the report of the committee for the year, and the election of officers. The report stated that a considerable reduction had been effected in the management of the affairs of the institution, and that the annual income of the association, beyond the expenditure, was £270. From the further set forth, that as there were no claimants on the funds of the society, the directors had determined to postpone for another year the celebration by a public festival of the anniversary of the association; and it further added, that at no former period were the funds of the society in a more healthful condition. We understand the amount invested in Government securities, in favour of the association, is upwards of £1200.

THE CUSTOM-HOUSE FRAUDS.—Notwithstanding the anxiety of the law officers of the Crown to bring to justice the perpetrators of these nefarious public frauds, it appears that the smugglers are quite too clever for even the myrmidons of the Sheriffs'-office. It will be remembered that in an action at the suit of the Crown, tried before the Under-sheriff last week, a verdict for £5238 was found against Messrs. Videll and Crewell, glove-dealers, in the Old Jewry; but, on an execution being issued, it was found that all the goods had been removed, and nearly all the cash drawn from the banker's. The sum of £67 only was recovered.

SHIPPING INTELLIGENCE.

FOLKESTONE, April 28.—The Lord Hawkesbury, Spencer, from Falmouth to Shoreham where she put in for Southernhook on the 24th inst., has been raised and towed into the harbour

WEYMOUTH, April 24.—The bark Empress, of Yarmouth, N.S., with loss of foremast, and much dashed, was spoken off Portland, on the coast of the Start on the 20th inst., with the French bark Charles, from Granville to St. Martin; the latter is supposed to have gone down with all hands, except a boy, who got on board the Empress.

SUNDERLAND, April 27.—The following is an extract of a letter from Peterhead, dated April 25: "Early this morning (Sunday), the sloop Mary and Isabella, belonging to Leith, from Sunderland for the Moray Firth, with a cargo of coals, when off Buchanness Light, about eight miles, took fire, and was completely destroyed. The captain and crew escaped in the sloop's boat. The vessel was partially insured."

FREEMASONS' GRAND LODGE.—An especial grand lodge of the Free and Accepted Masons of England was held on Tuesday, precisely at four o'clock, the Earl of Zetland in the grand master's chair, and the grand lodge met in unusual numbers to record the death of the M. W. Grand Master, his Royal Highness the Duke of Sussex. The proceedings were confined to the recording of the deaths of the late illustrious brother, and a resolution to that effect, read by Lord Zetland, to be entered on the minutes, was passed. The grand lodge presented the appearance of a tomb—all was funereal. The magnificent dresses of the grand officers were covered with crape; all the brethren were in deep mourning, with black gloves; the almost regal pomp of the throne, &c., was exchanged for the gloom of the grave. Among those present were Earls Zetland and Mornington; Lords Ingestre and Worsley; Hon. H. Fitzroy; Colonels Baillie and Tynte; Drs. Moore, Granville, and Crucefix; Brothers Dobie, Shaw, Harmer, Acklam (W. M. Grand Stewards' Lodge), and about 300 members of grand lodge. The grand lodge then adjourned.

Mr. BRUNEL.—The Bristol Gazette contains the following paragraph in reference to Mr. Brunel, the engineer:—"It will deep regret we have to state that the valuable life of this talented engineer has been placed in jeopardy by an accident arising out of an amiable wish to amuse the children of a friend. The father and Mr. Brunel proceeded, by sleight of hand, to pass money from the mouth to the ear, and vice versâ, when Mr. Brunel, placing a half-sovereign in his mouth, it unfortunately slipped into the trachea, where it stuck, and every effort to remove it proving ineffectual, Mr. B. Brodie has been called in, and an operation, by making an incision in the thorax, determined upon, to be performed yesterday: the result has not, to the great regret of his numerous friends in this city, been received when we went to press."

EDINBURGH.—FLOGGING IN THE ARMY.—In accordance with the sentence of a court-martial held in Edinburgh some time ago, one of the soldiers belonging to the company of the 68th regiment, at present stationed in the barracks there, underwent the punishment of the "cat" last Monday morning. His crime is understood to have been insubordination to one or other of his superior officers, and theft. He was tied up to the halberts at five o'clock in the morning, and was pronounced unable by the surgeon, when he received 100 lashes, to bear any more—200 being the number awarded by the court-martial. He was then conveyed to the hospital, and after his wounds are healed to be drummed from the regiment.

POSTSCRIPT.

Saturday Evening.

HEALTH OF HER MAJESTY.—We are happy to be able to state that the Queen is as well as it is possible for any person to be in her Majesty's condition, and that she is rapidly convalescing. The following is a copy of the bulletin issued at the Palace to-day:—"The Queen has slept perfectly well. Her Majesty and the infant Princess are going on quite favourably."

THE LATE DUKE OF SUSSEX.—The Earl of Delaware, Lord Chamberlain of her Majesty's Household, and Sir William Martin, had a meeting, on Thursday, at the Cemetery at Kensal-green, with Mr. Walker, Comptroller of his late Royal Highness's household, and one of his executors. Several officers of the office of Woods and Forests were in attendance at the meeting. The preparations for the lying in state were, on Wednesday, actively proceeded with in the late apartments of the Duchess of Kent, at Kensington Palace. They are of a very substantial character, as it is anticipated that the pressure of persons desirous of having a view of the mournful ceremony will be very great. Barriers will be erected across the Palace avenue, near to the small gate leading into Kensington-gardens, beyond which carriages will not be permitted to pass. Other barriers will also be placed across the open space in front of the entrance to the Clock Court, and at all other points where they are considered necessary. A detachment of the Artillery Company will attend at the Kensal-green Cemetery, to fire minute guns, from six-pounders, on a signal given at the time the funeral cortège leaves from Kensington Palace. We believe it is not yet finally settled whether the funeral will take place on Wednesday or Thursday next. The Earl of Delaware, Lord Camberlain, had a long interview with Sir James Graham, at the Home-office, Friday morning, on the subject. The noble lord also had an interview with Sir Robert Peel, at the right hon. baronet's residence, in Whitehall-gardens.

MANCHESTER HOUSE.—In consequence of the demise of the Duke of Sussex, the annual banquet given by his Excellency Count Ste. Aulaire, to celebrate the birthday of the King of the French, will not take place on Monday next. And also an evening fête, of more than usual attractions, which had been some time in preparation, is postponed.

His Royal Highness the Duke of Sussex was a member of Trinity College, having had the honorary degree of LL.D. conferred upon him in 1818.

THE THRONE OF IRELAND.—It is very doubtful whether Sir Augustus d'Este is not the next lawful heir to the throne of Ireland after the descendants of the late Duke of Kent and the present King of Hanover, and the throne of Hanover after the present royal family. Mr. O'Connell, whose opinion as an Irish lawyer is entitled to great respect, has given it as his opinion that Sir Augustus d'Este is legitimate in Ireland, the Royal Marriage Act having never received the assent of the Irish Parliament, and there is every reason to believe that he is equally so in Hanover.

DISPATCHES were sent off this morning from the Colonial-office to Sir Eardley Wilmott, Governor of Van Diemen's Land.

On Thursday last the following gentlemen were elected Scholars of Trinity College, Cambridge:—Kingdon, Stuart, Holmes, Warren, Edwards, Stokes, Richards, Hughes, Grant, Blackburn, Knox, Holden, Rendal, Selwyn; and Simpson, Chalk, and Templer, Westminster scholars.—The Declamation Prizes have recently been adjudged as follows:—Latin: 1. Charles Birsted; 2. John Richards; 3. Henry William Baker. Latin: 1. William George Clark; 2. Francis Coutts Stuart.

On Thursday the probate of the will of the Earl of Abergavenny passed the seal of the Prerogative Court of Canterbury: the personal estate of the testator was sworn under £250,000 and paid probate stamp duty of £3000.

We regret to announce the death of Rear Admiral Sir Coghill Coghill, in the 74th year of his age.

The launch of the Royal Steam Yacht Victoria and Albert took place at Pembroke Dockyard on Wednesday last in the presence of upwards of 10,000 spectators. The ceremony of naming the vessel was performed by Lady Cawdor, at the express desire of her Majesty, and precisely at half-past three o'clock the last supporter was knocked away, and the Victoria and Albert glided gently and gracefully into the water, amidst the cheers of the assembled thousands. The dockyard band, which was in attendance, then struck up "God save the Queen," and immediately ten thousand voices joined in singing the national anthem. Captain Lord Adolphus Fitzclarence is the officer who is appointed to command her, and the officers and crew of the Royal George will be turned over to her. Previously to the launch another interesting and gratifying ceremony was performed, in the laying the foundation-stone of a subscription school, for the education of 400 poor girls and boys.

Yesterday the river presented a very bustling and animated appearance, in consequence of the arrival of a large fleet of vessels from foreign ports. Two arrived in the West India docks from China; and in the St. Katherine's docks there arrived two from Havannah, one from Tobago, one from Africa, one from Palermo, one from Bahia, one from Oporto, one from Zante, and one from Marseilles.

THE AERIAL MACHINE HUMBUG.—The Glasgow Constitutional says, that the account which the Atlas gave, and others of our metropolitan contemporaries adopted, without any scruple, as to its authenticity, of Professor Geoli's late flight in one of the aërial machines from a hill near Glasgow, is neither more nor less than an "April-fool" jeu d'esprit!

CORN ON COMMON CONSTABLES.—A meeting of the Common Council on Thursday, an address to her Majesty of congratulation on the birth of the princess, and condolence on the death of his Royal Highness the Duke of Sussex, were unanimously adopted.

FACTORIES (EDUCATION) BILL.—A meeting of the Roman Catholics of Marylebone was held on Wednesday evening, at the Literary and Scientific Institution, Edward-street, Portman-square, Dr. Doyle in the chair, for the object to petition Parliament against the Educational clauses of the Factories Bill.

MURDERS AT SUNDERLAND BY A MANIAC.—APRIL 25.—This morning strange reports were circulated in the town to the effect that two murders had been committed during the night by a person who had escaped from the lunatic asylum near Gateshead. The report proved too true. It appears that William Ferry, a maniac who had been confined in the asylum for years, contrived to make his escape on Saturday, and, to elude the vigilance of his keepers, he kept out of the way, by going round the country. On arriving at his home, he found his parents dead, but that the keepers had been there before him, and to escape them he concealed himself in a boat lying near the house, and adjoining the harbour. After the keepers had gone he went home, and finished there the horrible work of the perpetration of the deed, which took place during one of his frantic fits of madness, shortly after midnight. The alarm was first given by a boy, who lived in a part of the house, running into the street and shouting that Ferry was murdering his daughter; but before any person could reach his room the wretched maniac had sacrificed his unhappy wife and daughter. He killed the latter by beating her over the head in a horrible manner, with a wooden vessel called a skeel, used for carrying water, and he next killed his wife, by beating her with a poker, and bruising her in such a manner as no person but a maniac could have done. He was soon taken into custody, to await the result of the inquest, which was held before J. M. Favell, Esq. The principal witness against the father was a little boy, a son of the murderer, only about five years old, who was frightened, and witnessed the whole horrible deaths of his mother and sister. The jury, after hearing the whole of the evidence, returned a verdict of "Wilful murder against William Ferry."

THE QUEEN V. O'CONNER AND OTHERS.—We understand that the defendants in this case, found guilty at the last assizes held at Lancaster for the county of Lancaster, have received notice to appear in the Court of Queen's Bench on Thursday next, the 4th of May, to receive judgment.

FUNERAL.

The French funds fell considerably on Thursday, owing to heavy sales made, it was said, by the house of Rothschild, and to an expectation that Government would feel obliged, in order to meet the vast expenditure required for various public objects, to pause a great portion, if not the entire, of the 300,000,000f. of the last loan of 450,000,000f., which it had reserved.

IMPORTANT INTELLIGENCE FROM ST. DOMINGO.—By the Hamburg schooner Hector Strand, master, arrived at Falmouth on Wednesday, from Port-au-Prince, after a quick passage of 30 days, having sailed on the 27th ult., we learn that perfect tranquility existed in that city up to that period. The Factory, consisting of about 14,000 men, in two divisions, and under the command of Generals Rivière and Lazarre, had entered Port-au-Prince, Boyer, on his departure in the British brig of war Scylla, took no more specie with him than fifty dollars. A decree had been issued denouncing Boyer as a traitor to his country. The decree also denounces as traitors J. B. Inginac, A. B. Ardouin, C. C. Ardouin, J. J. V. Poit, J. M. Borgella, J. B. Riche, and L. M. S. Villavalein. Of these, Borgella and Riche had been captured; the remainder had gone to Jamaica in British ships. Twenty-five persons were elected to act as a provisional committee. The provisional chief has been offered to Herrard, and to several of the other leaders, as a preliminary; but they had individually refused to accept the office. H.M.S. the Fair Rosamond remained with L'Orestz French brig of war; the Volage or Waesp.te was going in when she came out.

ACCIDENTS AND OFFENCES.

STEAMBOAT ACCIDENT.—THREE LIVES LOST.—On Sunday night last, a few minutes past nine o'clock, a boat containing seven persons came in collision with a Greenwich steam-vessel, called the Royal Tar, belonging to the old Greenwich Steamboat Company, by which three persons perished. It appears that the steamer, which was commanded by a waterman, named Blacksteer, had just left London-bridge Wharf, but without any passengers on board, on her way to Greenwich, and was passing the Newcastle tier of vessels, off the Tower, when a boat, containing a waterman's apprentice, named Charles Ayres, five young men, and a female, shot out from between the tiers, and a person called out "Port your helm." Mr. Blacketer immediately did so, and said "Port it is;" and believed that the boat was being skilfully managed, and that the person who gave the direction was an experienced waterman; such, however, was not the case, for the boat was rowed in the direction of the Royal Tar, the master of which gave the orders to ease and stop her. This was immediately done, but the boat and the steamer both having considerable way, a collision was inevitable; and before the steamer could well go astern, the boat was capsized and the people immersed in the stream. Captain Blacketer immediately jumped off the paddle-box and threw out a rope, which was caught by a youth, and Blacketer got upon the fender-piece and hauled him on board. One of the crew on the opposite side of the steamer saved another person in a similar manner, and a third was picked up by the crew of a Welsh brig, called the Gratitude, now discharging slates, who also recovered some of the boat's gear. A fourth man was saved by the mate of the Ann, of Newcastle, and brought on board the Royal Tar with the other persons taken out of the water, and every attention was paid them by the master and steward. Three others perished, viz., Charles Ayres, a waterman's apprentice, who was in charge of the boat; a young man, aged 18 years, whose name is said to be Brandell, and whose parents live in Long-alley; and a youth about 18 years of age, who had on a new suit of sailor's clothes and black silk neckerchief.

DESTRUCTIVE FIRE IN BLACKFRIARS-ROAD.—On Monday last four o'clock on Monday morning a most destructive fire broke out on the premises of Mr. Lovell, pork-butcher, 82, Blackman-street, Borough, which for a time threatened the destruction of the adjoining houses. The fire was first discovered by a waggoner, who, on passing, observed a terrific light in the second floor, and a glance sufficed to inform him of the cause. He instantly informed police constable M 52, who, with the utmost exertion, aroused the inmates, three females, who had to effect their escape from the rear of the house in a state of nudity. The house was gutted.

A MAIL-BOAT AND TWO MAILS LOST.—KILKENNY, April 10.—The mail-boat at Burray was upset, it is supposed, during the snow storm on Wednesday week last. It delivered the mail at Holme, and was on its return, when, it is conjectured, the tide must have driven it on a small skerry on its way which caused it to capsize, and four men and one woman who were in it found a watery grave. Cries were heard at Lanta, and a boat put off, but, from the darkness of the night, nothing could be seen. The ill-fated boat was washed ashore next day (Thursday) at Holme, but no trace of its unfortunate passengers. One of the men had only been married a fortnight, and had his brother-in-law along with him. The lamentable catastrophe has occasioned a gloom in the neighbourhood.

DREADFUL DEATH FROM FOUL AIR.—On Monday morning a deplorable occurrence resulting in the loss of human life, took place on the premises of Mr. Butt, corn-factor, Goswell street, Clerkenwell. It appears that a young man, 21 years of age, named John Smith, in the employ of Mr. Butt, had occasion to descend a well on the premises in the course of the process of cleaning it out. He was let down in a bucket for this purpose, and had been there about five minutes when he was asked by those at the top "if all was right," on which he replied in the affirmative. He was then let to a second time, and gave the same answer. Shortly after, on calling to him again, they received no reply, and about a quarter of an hour had elapsed from the time Smith first went down, when he was let down in a bucket, and on reaching the bottom called out that he was, he thought, lying there dead. The boy was instantly raised, and on reaching the surface complained of feeling a sense of stupefaction come over him, and he approached the bottom of the well. The body of the unfortunate young man was recovered as speedily as possible, but life was quite extinct.

ACCIDENT AT THE ADELPHI THEATRE.—A fearful, and we fear, fatal accident occurred on Wednesday week at the Reading Theatre during the performance of the piece, in which Mr. Harrington, an American actor, late of the English Opera House, was performing the part of Long Tom Coffin. It appears, in the scene near the end of the second act, where he has to present a pistol to Captain Boroughcliff, that it accidentally went off while Mr. Harrington was in the act of drawing it from his belt, and the contents were lodged in the lower part of the abdomen of the unfortunate man, making a frightful wound, through which his intestines protruded. The curtain was instantly dropped, and the injured man was conveyed, without delay, to the hospital, where every possible attention was paid to the emergency of the case, but he remains with little hope of recovery. The theatre has been closed since, and will continue so for some time to come. Mr. Harrington has a wife and large family depending for support upon his exertions. A great deal of culpable negligence prevails in theatres respecting the firearms used in the performances. They are generally old worthless muskets and pistols, of which the locks are so weak and insecure that they are continually liable to go off at half-cock.

FIRE.—On Wednesday night last considerable alarm was created in the vicinity of Smithfield, owing to a fire breaking out on premises belonging to Mr. William Alexander Chapman, a pawnbroker, carrying on business at 74, Turnmill-street. Fortunately the building was detached, otherwise the most disastrous consequences must have inevitably followed. The engines being well manned the fire was confined to that part of the premises in which it broke out, and a little after eight o'clock it was entirely extinguished; but not before the place in which the fire originated was, with its valuable contents, nearly consumed. Mr. Chapman is insured in the Sun Fire-office, which will not be materially affected by the loss.

EXTENSIVE ROBBERY.—Information has been given that, on the 19th inst., the Angel pubho-house, at Henley-on-Thames, was robbed of a £10 bank note, eight guineas and a half-guinea, a female sovereign, three half-sovereigns, and £12 17s. in silver, a number of silver spoons, pair of sugar tongs, a fish slice and other plate, a silver watch chain marked "H. MASONIC PORTRAIT.

MEMOIR OF HIS LATE ROYAL HIGHNESS THE DUKE OF SUSSEX.

This very popular and universally lamented prince, Augustus Frederick, was the sixth son of George III. and Queen Charlotte, was born at Buckingham House, on Wednesday, January 27th, 1773; and, at the time of his death, had passed the age of "three-score years and ten." "His brothers, the Dukes of York, Kent, Cumberland, and Cambridge, were brought up to the profession of arms; the Duke of Clarence went into the navy; and of all the family, the Duke of Sussex alone received that degree of intellectual culture in his youth which enabled him in after life to meet men of science and literature upon terms alike flattering to them and honourable to himself." He received the rudiments of education from tutors appointed by his royal father. The accompanying portrait of the young prince at this period is from the well-known picture by West, of "the Dukes of Cumberland, Sussex, Cambridge, and three Princesses," in the Queen's drawing-room, at Hampton Court Palace.

In June 1786, his Royal Highness, having been created a Knight of the Garter, accompanied his brothers Ernest and Adolphus (now King of Hanover and Duke of Cambridge) to the University of Göttingen. This celebrated seat of learning was instituted by George II. in the year 1734. With moderate means it soon rose to the highest rank among the schools of Germany, and it has preserved to the present day a constantly increasing reputation for able teachers in every branch of knowledge. It has four faculties—theology, law, medicine, and philosophy; the library has been selected with a view to usefulness, and contains upwards of 300,000 volumes and 5000 manuscripts. The young princes were here taught the German language by Professor Mayer; Latin, by the celebrated Heyne; theology, by Less; and morality, by Feder; each of these masters being rewarded by an extraordinary grant of 1000 crowns per annum. Prince Augustus Frederick remained at Gottingen for a longer period than several of his elder brethren. He proportionably stored his mind with classical learning, and, thus better qualified for appreciating the advantages of travel, he made the tour of Germany. He next visited Italy, and during the years 1792 and 1793 was one of the English residents at Rome, and upon terms of intimacy with Pope Pius VI. At the same time the Earl and Countess of Dunmore, with some members of their family, were also sojourners at Rome; and their second daughter, Lady Augusta Murray, formed one of that circle of society then assembled at Rome of which Prince Augustus Frederick was a conspicuous and admired member. Her ladyship was three or four years senior to the prince. Her personal attractions and many virtues and amiable qualities won the affections of his Royal Highness, and while yet in his twenty-first year he became a husband, and before he completed his twenty-second, a father. The marriage between the young prince and Lady Augusta was solemnised at Rome, on April the 4th, 1793, and subsequently by banns at St. George's, Hanover-square, on the 5th of December, in the same year. This marriage was contrary to the provisions of the Royal Marriage Act, 12 Geo. III., c. 2, which enacted that no descendant of King George II. (other than the issue of princes married into foreign countries) was capable of contracting matrimony without the previous consent of the King, signified under the Great Seal; but, on condition that his union should not be disturbed, the Prince proposed to resign whatever claims he might possess as a member of the royal family. No sooner, however, was the alliance publicly known, than the matter was taken up by Government; proceedings were instituted in the Ecclesiastical courts, and the marriage pronounced null. Prince Augustus, however, asserted its legality, treated Lady Augusta as his wife, and her children as his legitimate offspring; and addressed letters to her as a princess, and his son as a prince. Lady Augusta now separated from his Royal Highness, and the remainder of her life was passed in dignified retirement; her ladyship, in 1806, assuming, by royal permission, the title of Countess of Amelland, which she bore to the period of her death, at Rome, in 1830. For several years previously she resided near Ramsgate, where the people always insisted on calling her "Duchess of Sussex."

The issue of this marriage are Colonel Sir A. D'Este, K.C.H., equerry to William IV., and his sister, attached to the household of Queen Adelaide. "Lord Dunmore, whose daughter Prince Augustus Frederick espoused, was John, fourth earl; his countess was daughter of the sixth Earl of Galloway: the mother of Sir Augustus and Miss D'Este was, therefore, not only connected with 'the Sovereign house of Atholl,' but related to the royal family of England, as being descended from Henry VII. this marriage, which have been collected and printed for private circulation by Sir Augustus, is a letter from the deceased prince, dated Aquilon, February 28, 1794, which distinctly acquits Lady Dunmore of any knowledge of the fact that this marriage was in contemplation until after it had been solemnized. It has been more than once stated that the ceremony which took place at Rome was performed according to the rites of the Romish church; but the duke, in his letters, contradicts this, and says it was performed by a clergyman of the church of England, whose name he had promised to keep secret. In the printed, but unpublished, volume to which reference has just been made Sir Augustus D'Este sets forth the opinions of several eminent lawyers, who appear to think that the Royal Marriage Act does not invalidate his claim to any property which might descend through his mother."

His Royal Highness next re-visited Italy, and went thence to Switzerland, where he made a considerable stay. He next proceeded to Berlin, where he resided about two years, during which time he received marked attention from the Prussian court. His Royal Highness now returned to England; whence, after a short stay, he embarked for Lisbon in 1800, and resided there until the following year, when he returned to England; and, on November 27, his Royal Highness, being then in the 29th year of his age, was created a peer of the realm, by the titles of Earl of Inverness, in North Britain; Baron of Arklow, in Ireland; and Duke of Sussex, with a parliamentary grant of £12,000 per annum, to which a yearly addition of £9000 was subsequently made. Upon taking his seat the duke espoused the side of the most liberal of the Whigs. His opposition to the views of the King and his ministers was open and undisguised; the duke declared in favour of reform in Parliament, a repeal of the penal laws against Roman Catholics, a diminution of public expenditure, and new principles in trade. The duke, too, occasionally proved himself a formidable opponent to the ministry; for he spoke with fluency, possessed a competent acquaintance with public affairs, had great facility in availing himself of any suggestions or recent information which might happen to reach him; and though he spoke but rarely, yet, adding the weight of the princely character to some share of ability and knowledge, and combining these with the influence derived from great popularity out of doors, he possessed an importance in Parliament which never previously belonged to any of the royal family. His speeches in two debates upon the regency question, in 1810 and 1811, excited considerable attention throughout the country, by their sound constitutional knowledge, force of reason, and comprehensive statesmanlike views. In 1812, his Royal Highness spoke with equal decision in seconding the motion of the Earl of Donoughmore, for referring the petitions of the Catholics to a committee. Seventeen years subsequently, in 1829, his Royal Highness spoke with renewed fervour upon Catholic emancipation, maintaining that Mr. Pitt was not an enemy to the Catholic claims, upon the authority of a letter from that minister to George III. Upon the third reading, his Royal Highness once more recorded his approbation of the bill, emphatically adding that the very language of Magna Charta, "Nulli vendimus, nulli negabimus, nulli differemus justitiam," demanded this measure, which was one of tardy justice to the Roman Catholics. Upon the question of repealing the Test and Corporation Acts in 1828, the duke displayed equal fervour for the full enjoyment of "liberty of conscience."

DUKE OF SUSSEX (EARL OF INVERNESS).

From a Portrait by Sir William Beechey.

His Royal Highness also advocated, with unflinching consistency, the sweeping measure of parliamentary reform, in 1831; when the duke concluded an emphatic speech by declaring: "I always was a reformer, I am a reformer, and I always shall be a reformer, until this bill, or some other measure of equal efficiency, be passed." We have adverted to these memorable epochs in the parliamentary life of the Duke of Sussex, to remind the reader, that although not filling any political office, his Royal Highness ever proved himself to possess a heart overflowing with generous sympathy for the rights of the people, and for the enjoyment of "liberty of conscience," a doctrine which has become much more popular than such views were upwards of thirty years since, when the Duke of Sussex made his spirited declaration in favour of religious liberty. Through good and evil report, the Duke acted frankly and consistently with his party to the last; and, it will be remembered, that, on a very recent occasion, he carried his support of the late administration to the length of moving the annual address in answer to the speech from the throne. Upon a question of great family importance, too, the bill of pains and penalties against Queen Caroline, the Duke of Sussex still voted with his party, and gave great, though not unpardonable offence to George IV.; for notwithstanding the alienation which, during some time, continued between the brothers, they were cordially reconciled before the death of the King. Upon the same unhappy subject a marked estrangement arose between the Duke of Sussex and the Duke of Clarence, afterwards William IV., which, as in the preceding case, was eventually terminated by perfect reconciliation.

Notwithstanding his great political popularity, it must be conceded that Parliament was not the scene of his Royal Highness's most conspicuous and successful efforts. While their record is left to the historian, the Duke's active benevolence and his unceasing exertions in the spirit of social improvement, which happily distinguishes the present from any preceding age, will be handed down through many generations. Never had "all mankind's concern"—charity—a more efficient advocate; and how gratifying was the scene of the prince pleading the cause of poverty and misfortune, with the advantages of exalted station and the natural gift of eloquence—the object and the means; "like the natural charity of the sun," each "illuminated the other without obscuring itself." For more than forty years the Duke of Sussex devoted his best exertions to the advancement of these objects. The promotion of public charities by means of public dinners is a custom peculiar to England; when our animal spirits search and carry up, as it were, to the surface the best feelings of our nature. At every suitable occasion his Royal Highness presided over these festivals. He had no objection to a good dinner, and enjoyed cheerful society without being very fastidious as to the rank of his companions; and possessing some humour and unfailing flow of language, his after-dinner speeches were unrivalled. His skill and dexterity as a chairman must be familiar to most diners out "at the London Tavern or Freemasons' Hall;" while the effective and touching manner in which the Duke was accustomed to plead the cause of widowhood, of orphanage, and of every variety of suffering or of poverty, has left an impression upon the public mind, not likely to be soon effaced, and has produced results upon the charitable institutions of the metropolis which will long continue to be felt. "A festival for charitable purposes, his sturdy and indomitable solicitation would take no denials. His comprehensive benevolence demanded large subscriptions; and amidst peals of jollity and laughter excited by his example and his good humour, he would again and again urge facts, statistics, anecdotes, personal appeals, and affecting incidents, until the great object was accomplished of improving the institution, and thereby alleviating the misery of the blind, the maimed, the aged, or the unprotected, to an extent not previously attempted, or even imagined to be possible."

In a memoir of the Duke, by a popular writer, it has been well observed, that "whether to provide for the orphans of poor publicans—for the solace of the sick and the afflicted, in the hospitals of

LETTER AND AUTOGRAPH.

The fac-simile of a portion of a letter from the Duke of Sussex to J. P. Pettigrew, Esq., dated Holkham, July 9, 1830. The letter proceeds to regret that Dr. Parr is not with his Royal Highness at Holkham, to examine the treasures in the library there; characteristically adding: "As a pipe does not frighten me, we should have done very well together." The signature is from a letter of more recent date: the Duke does not appear to have invariably signed his name thus.

Jew or Christian—for the relief of the unfortunate artist and literary labourer, their widows, and helpless children—for the encouragement of industry—for the distinction of talent and the reward of ingenuity—in short, for the alleviation of misery, wherever it existed, and the crowning of merit, wherever it appeared—the one in the darkest recesses of wretchedness, the other in the humblest walks of society—the unwearied exertions of the Duke of Sussex have justly attracted to his head the blessings of tens of thousands; to his heart the affectionate sympathies of all."

In the year 1816 the Duke of Sussex was elected President of the Society of Arts. Under his able direction the success of this institution has been of beneficial example: it has cultivated and brought to maturity many germs of invention and ingenuity; and there was not a more gratifying sight than the annual distribution of the society's premiums by his Royal Highness, as often as his health would permit. "On these occasions his address to the successful competitors was neat, varied, forcible, and appropriate. In the affairs of the society he took the warmest interest down to the period of his last illness. Even very recently he dictated to his secretary a long series of remarks on a report laid before him by the officers of that institution." The last occasion on which the Duke presided was at the anniversary award in 1841. In the establishment of the London Mechanics' Institution the Duke of Sussex warmly cooperated with the late Dr. Birkbeck and Lord Brougham; and in the foundation of the London University (now University College) his Royal Highness evinced a kindred interest. The Duke was also an official trustee of the Hunterian Museum, purchased by Government for £15,000, and transferred to the Royal College of Surgeons, for the use of the public. His Royal Highness was likewise a Doctor of Civil Law.

In 1830, on the retirement of Mr. D. G. Gilbert, the Duke of Sussex was elected President of the Royal Society; and, although the election was not unattended with some asperities, within a few weeks the Duke's warmest opponents acknowledged the ability and gentlemanly and conciliatory bearing of their new president. During each season of his presidency his Royal Highness (following the laudable practice of Sir Joseph Banks) opened his splendid suite of apartments at Kensington Palace for a series of evening parties, for the friendly interchange of opinions and communications on various interesting topics in science, art, and literature; to these soirées were invited the Fellows of the Royal Society, noble individuals, distinguished by their talents and taste; the presidents and eminent members of our principal national institutions, the Royal Academy, the Antiquaries, the Asiatic, the Royal Society of Literature, the Geographical, Geological, Astronomical, &c.; with authors and persons of high scientific attainments, eminent foreigners, &c. Upon such occasions the tables were covered with curious MSS., illuminated volumes, &c.; his Royal Highness always providing some new and striking invention and objects, to vary the tone of the entertainment, and to enable the company to enjoy that "unembarrassed intercourse, so rare in English society, and so delightful where it can be enjoyed; and nowhere more delightful than in this country, where intellect is as ready as it is solid, and whose talent is as sportive as it is sterling, when called into play without effort and without ambition." Under these circumstances it was with unfeigned regret that the fellows of the Royal Society received the resignation of the Duke of Sussex, in 1839, after a presidentship of nine years. The reason assigned by his Royal Highness for giving up the office occasioned some surprise; it was the insufficiency of his income to defray the expenses of the soirées, which were generally considered to be trifling. The Duke's anniversary addresses to the society were distinguished alike by felicitous allusion and fluent delivery. A fine portrait of his Royal Highness, painted by Phillips, graces the council-room at Somerset House; he was succeeded in his important office by the Marquis of Northampton.

Having noticed the subject of the duke's pecuniary position, it may be not out of place to state that it has more than once been brought under the notice of Parliament. On the 14th of June, 1825, Lord Brougham, then a member of the lower house, observed that the duke never received one shilling of the public money except the allowance made to him by Parliament as one of the royal family. It appeared that one of the results of the duke's marriage with Lady Augusta Murray was a reduction of his own income to £13,000 a-year, in order to make a provision for his wife, in which praiseworthy object he received no assistance from Parliament. Mr. Brougham then adverted to the effect of the Royal Marriage Act, described it as the most unfortunate of all acts, the very worst of all human laws, and said that it had been well characterised by Mr. Wilberforce as the most unconstitutional act that ever disgraced the statute-book. He observed further, that if the Duke of Sussex had ever applied (up to that time) for an increase of income, had never compounded with his creditors, and by the assistance of a learned gentleman, who superintended his affairs, his debts have been reduced from £100,900 to a very inconsiderable residue."

The duke's marriage with Lady Augusta Murray is understood not to have been the only occasion on which he set at nought the provisions of the Royal Marriage Act. It appears that Lady Cecilia Gore, ninth daughter of the second Earl of Arran, married, on May 14, 1815, Sir George Buggin, Knt.; a gentleman long resident and well known in Dublin. This gentleman died on April 12, 1825; and, on May 2, 1831, her ladyship (previously Lady Cecilia Buggin) assumed the name of Underwood, by virtue of the King's sign manual. Her claim to this indulgence rested upon the fact that the maiden name of her mother was Underwood. Some years ago the Duke of Sussex and Lady Cecilia Underwood became more intimately acquainted than they previously had been, and it was generally understood in society that they were privately married. The lady's character was, doubtless, not only free from reproach but above all suspicion. She was received in the best society, and accompanied the Duke of Sussex wherever he went. In the year 1840 it pleased her Majesty to bestow on Lady Cecilia a signal mark of her royal favour by raising her to the rank of a peeress in her own right, and one also of the highest order, by the title of Duchess of Inverness. Upon this occasion the Duchess of Inverness received many visits of congratulation, and it was observed that the practice of royalty was adhered to, the visitors not leaving their cards, but inscribing their names in a book.

The Duke of Sussex had resided for several years in the south wing of the more ancient part of Kensington Palace, and here he breathed his last. During twenty-three years his Royal Highness had assembled a vast and valuable library, several years since amounting to upwards of 50,000 volumes of MSS. and printed books; and in 1820 it was stated that it was the duke's intention to open this library for the benefit of the public, as soon as the whole should be properly arranged. The books were then deposited in six apartments. I. contains Roman, Civil, English, and Ecclesiastical Law; II. Divinity, Polemics, Bibles, of the latter, we believe, the finest collection in England; III. Dictionaries, Grammars, and Periodical Works; IV. History; V. Greek and Latin Classics; VI. Biography. In the collection are the following MS. editions of the sacred writings:—51 Hebrew, including three specimens of Zephilin, called Phylacteries; 12 Greek; 148 Latin; 34 French; 11 Italian and Spanish; 1 German and Dutch; 15 English and Irish; 16 Arabic, Persian, Armenian, Pali, Singhalese, and Burman. Also, 28 Polyglotts; 101 Hebrew Bibles, or portions of the Old Testament; 39 Greek ditto; 224 Latin ditto. Among the other treasures is, "probably, the most perfect MS. of the Pentateuch in this country; another, unquestionably, one of the most splendid Hebrew MSS. ever executed." Also, a copy of the Koran, which belonged to Tippoo Saib, in whose library it was found by the conquerors at Seringapatam, and whose spectacles were discovered between its leaves, as if the perusal of it had been one of the latest acts of his life. These few details are quoted from the first portion of the catalogue of the "Bibliotheca Sussexaniana," printed several years since. It is earnestly hoped that, at least, this extraordinary collection of Bibles will not be dispersed.

As the Duke of Sussex resided under the same royal roof beneath which our present Sovereign was born, and passed her minority, it is not surprising that her Majesty should have regarded the Duke of Sussex more in the light of a parent than she did any other male member of the royal family. This has also been imputed to the Duke of Kent having, shortly before his death, recommended that the Duke of Sussex should be as frequently as possible consulted by the Duchess of Kent and the Princess Victoria, on every affair of any political importance. Thus we find the duke introducing her Majesty to her first council, at her accession, and performing the paternal office at her Majesty's marriage. To whatever influence the circumstance may be attributed, there can be no doubt of the fact that the duke possessed much power at court previous to the formation of the present ministry.

Akin to the princely benevolence of the duke already mentioned, must not be omitted his sedulous attention paid by his Royal Highness to the interests of freemasonry. While at Berlin, in early life, the duke formed a valuable connexion between the York Lodge in that city and the Grand Lodge of England. His Royal Highness, on the demise of Sir Peter Parker, was appointed Deputy Grand Master of England; and upon the resignation of George IV., the Duke of Sussex was installed in the grand mastership. The intelligence of the demise of his Royal Highness occasioned considerable excitement, and deep sympathy and regret among all the members of the masonic craft; and numerous were the inquiries made by masons from the Grand Lodge at the Freemasons' Tavern to the more humble ones held at obscure public-houses and coffee-shops.

His Royal Highness permitted himself to be elected Colonel of the Hon. Artillery Company in the year 1817, when King George IV. (then Prince Regent) was the Captain-General; and his Royal Highness was annually re-elected Colonel (under the privilege then exercised by the corps) during the remainder of that reign. On the accession of King William IV. his Majesty was graciously pleased to nominate himself Captain-General, and by warrant to appoint his Royal Highness Colonel of the corps, which rank his Royal Highness continued to hold under the authority of the royal warrant. In the year 1837 her present Majesty, by her royal warrant, graciously conferred upon his Royal Highness the rank of Captain-General of the Hon. Artillery Company, in addition to his command as Colonel, and his Royal Highness retained the conjoined rank until his lamented decease. It has been appositely observed (in the Times) that "no death in the royal family, short of the actual demise of a monarch, could have occasioned a stronger feeling of deprivation than in the case of the Duke of Sussex." Although he had attained an advanced period of life, and the general state of his health had not been for some time so favourable as to enable his constitution to resist the attacks of disease, his death must occasion sincere regret in many quarters. He was, in the best sense of the term, a popular character, from his English habits, things, and sentiments. He was, next to his eldest brother, the most accomplished of his family. "He was a man who employed the faculties which his God had given him in promoting the physical comforts, the mental improvement, and the social harmony of his fellow-creatures. He did his best to promote the advancement of learning, the interests of science, and the welfare of all who toiled their wearisome way in the museum, the studio, or the laboratory. And there are many now alive and prospering who, when they look back on their early struggles and their meridian labours, will bless the memory of the Duke of Sussex."

By the death of the duke several offices become vacant. His Royal Highness was President of the Society of Arts, Acting Great Master of the Order of the Bath, Ranger of St. James's and Hyde Parks, High Steward of Plymouth, Colonel of the Hon. Artillery Company, Grand Master of the Freemasons, Governor and Constable of Windsor Castle, and a Knight of the Garter; but, being a member of the royal family, his death occasions no vacancy amongst the 25 Knights Companions of that illustrious order.

We shall scarcely be expected to enumerate the many charitable institutions with which his Royal Highness was officially connected. In the spirit of that "liberty of conscience" which he uniformly advocated, his Royal Highness was a patron of several Jewish benevolent institutions, and was President of the Jews' Hospital, Mile-end, for a number of years.

The Duke of Sussex usually resided at Kensington Palace; but, during the autumn, his Royal Highness made a tour of visits to his distinguished friends, Newstead Abbey and Kimmel Park being his favourite places of sojourn. His wife to the Queen of England (we believe in 1822) will long be remembered: he was invited to Lambton Castle by the late Earl of Durham, then Mr. Lambton, and on the occasion of his Royal Highness's entry into Newcastle, accompanied by that gentleman, it was computed that no less than 100,000 persons were assembled to see the magnificent Masonic processions and festivals that ensued render the event one of the most memorable of its kind that ever took place in that part of the country.

The personal appearance of his Royal Highness was very striking; though not of courtly manners, he had a natural dignity; and he was one of the tallest and stoutest men in the country: when appointed to the colonelcy of the Royal Artillery Company he was, on being measured, found to stand 6 ft. 3½ inches high, in his shoes. His face, like his person, was large and full, and at the age of 69 it scarcely bore a wrinkle; and his features were lit up with bonhomie.

HIS ROYAL HIGHNESS THE LATE DUKE OF SUSSEX.

We were enabled to give in the greater portion of our last week's impression the particulars of the demise of his Royal Highness the late Duke of Sussex; and, as every incident connected with that mournful event is fraught with deep interest to the people of this country, the following narrative may not be considered out of place:—On Saturday the will of the deceased prince was opened and read at Kensington Palace, in the presence of his Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge and of the executors appointed by his late Royal Highness—viz., Lord Dinorben, Colonel Tynte, and Mr. Walker, the Comptroller of his Royal Highness's Household. The Duke of Cambridge afterwards left the royal residence. The executors remained at Kensington Palace some hours. Lord Dinorben, on taking his departure, went to the residence of Sir Robert Peel, in Whitehall-gardens, and had an interview with the right hon. baronet. Sir Robert afterwards went to Buckingham Palace.

On Sunday morning a post mortem examination of the remains of the royal duke was made at Kensington Palace, by Mr. Holland, Sir Benjamin Brodie, Mr. Keate, Mr. Nussey, and Mr Du Pasquier, assembled at the palace soon after eight o'clock. Sir Benjamin Brodie, the Queen's surgeon-accoucheur, performed the operation. Dr. Chambers, Dr. Holland, Sir Benjamin Brodie, and Mr. Keate, then left the palace. A cast of his Royal Highness's head was taken by Mr. Behnes, the sculptor. Mr. Nussey and Mr. Du Pasquier remained in the palace to watch over the remains. The Earl Delawarr, lord chamberlain of her Majesty's household, arrived at Kensington Palace at twelve o'clock, and when the last-named operation had been completed by the medical gentlemen, the body, under his lordship's superintendence, was deposited in a mahogany shell in the same room in which his Royal Highness expired. His lordship afterwards left the palace. Sir John Doratt was appointed to take the post mortem examination.

It was understood that his Royal Highness, in his will, had expressed it as his particular request that his body on his decease should be interred in the public cemetery at Kensington, instead of the mausoleum in Cardinal Wolsey's chapel at Windsor, appropriated for the members of the family of George III. There was a general wish that the mortal remains of his Royal Highness should be deposited in the royal tomb at Windsor; but, on the other hand, a decided feeling pervaded the masonic fraternity that they ought to have an opportunity of displaying their regret at the funeral by a manifestation of their respect to the memory of their departed grand master of that celebrated order of brotherhood.

In 1839, when the Anatomy Bill was under discussion in the House of Peers, the Duke of Sussex avowed his determination to give his body to one of the public hospitals for dissection. Although this intention has not been literally carried out, it is an interesting fact, perhaps not generally known, that a clause in the will of his Royal Highness requires his executors to publish, for the benefit of medical science, the result of the post mortem examination of his remains, should the same possess any feature of beneficial interest. The report of the post mortem examination will be laid before her Majesty when completed.

At a later hour in the day the body was placed in a leaden coffin or shell, which arrived at Kensington in a hearse and four on Saturday evening, between eight and nine o'clock.

During Monday the inquiries at Kensington Palace for her Grace the Duchess of Inverness were almost hourly; the members of the royal family sent messengers early to make inquiries. The answer was that the duchess was as well as could be expected.

APPEARANCES OBSERVED ON INSPECTING THE MORTAL REMAINS OF HIS ROYAL HIGHNESS THE DUKE OF SUSSEX, APRIL 23, 1843.—In the head there were no signs of disease, except that a serous fluid was effused between the membranes by which the brain is immediately invested. The mucous membrane lining the throat and windpipe was of a dark colour, in consequence of its vessels being unusually turgid with blood. In other respects these parts were in a perfectly healthy state. In the chest the lungs presented no appearance of disease. The heart was of rather a small size, and the muscular structure was thin and flaccid. On the right side of the heart there was no other morbid appearance; but the valves on the left side, both those between the auricle and the ventricle and those at the origin of the aorta, were ossified to a considerable extent. The coronary arteries were considerably ossified also. In the abdomen the liver was in a state of disease, presenting a granular appearance throughout the whole substance. In the lower bowel there were some internal hæmorrhoids, but there were no other marks of disease either in this or any other of the viscera. FUNERAL OF HIS LATE ROYAL HIGHNESS THE DUKE OF SUSSEX.

The necessary arrangements for the funeral of his Royal Highness were finally completed on Tuesday afternoon by the Lord Chamberlain. The expressed desire, on the part of his Royal Highness, that his remains should be deposited in the cemetery at Kensal-green appears to have created some difficulty, but through the gracious permission of her Majesty the ceremony is appointed to take place on Thursday, the 4th of May, in the grounds of the London cemetery at Kensal-green. Mr. Croft, the secretary and acting director of the company, had an interview on Tuesday with the Lord Chamberlain on the subject, and after considerable discussion it was arranged that the coffin containing his Royal Highness's remains should be deposited in the principal catacombs under the western chapel, until a mausoleum could be erected for its reception. His Royal Majesty has further expressed her particular desire that no curtailment of the ceremony usually attendant upon royal funerals should take place in the interment of his Royal Highness, and the whole of the arrangements will, in consequence, be conducted on a scale of unusual magnificence. The honourable fraternity of Freemasons, over whom his Royal Highness has so long presided as Grand Master, will attend the funeral, and arrangements are to be made for the accommodation of 26,000 of their number within the cemetery.

An interesting fact in connection with his Royal Highness, perhaps no. generally known, may serve to account for his predilection for this cemetery. It appears that his Royal Highness has been in the frequent habit of visiting the grounds since their formation in 1833, and more particularly during the last three or four years. He rarely came attended by few of his suite, and spent a considerable time in examining the various improvements and works in progress, in which he appeared to take great interest, and on more than one occasion he has remarked to his friends that when it pleased Providence to call him he would certainly be buried there. Some time since it may be recollected that a German friend of the duke's, named Count Von Schönleburg, died suddenly at Kensington Palace on his visit to this country on a visit to his Royal Highness; the duke was much affected by his death, and himself selected his grave in the Kensal-green Cemetery, where a neat monument, enclosed in an iron railing, records his untimely decease.

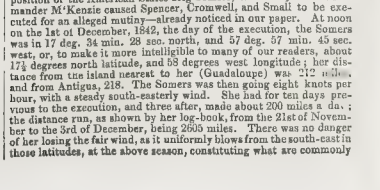
Unlike royal funerals of late years, the present ceremony is appointed to take place at an early hour in the day. The arrangement will give the public an opportunity seldom met with of witnessing the procession throughout the whole line of road from Kensington to Kensal-green. The route taken will be from Kensington through Hyde-park, out at Cumberland-gate, Oxford-road, to the Edgware-road, and from thence along the Harrow-road, direct to the cemetery. There is another more direct road, avoiding altogether the metropolis; but, as the procession will doubtless include a large number of carriages, the best road has been selected. The procession, after entering, will not leave the chapel, the entrance to the catacombs being immediately beneath the altar. The number of private graves in the cemetery already exceeds six thousand, and each grave is calculated to hold ten coffins. Among the principal members of the nobility interred in private mausoleums and the catacombs may be mentioned the Duchess of Kent, the Duchess of Atholl, the Dowager Duchess of Leeds, the Marchioness of Headfort, Baroness de Feucheres, Lord and Lady Spencer Churchill, Lord Howden, Earl of Galloway, Bishop of Quebec, Sir James Cockburn, &c.

The ceremony of lying in state is at present fixed for Tuesday and Wednesday next, at Kensington Palace. The state apartments are now being fitted up with the usual appurtenances, and it is expected that they will be completed on Saturday next.

The public will enter through the court-yard of the present portion of the building usually occupied by the Duchess of Kent, and, proceeding through the hall, to mount the grand staircase which opens directly upon the state apartments. That room will be hung with black velvet and lighted with wax tapers. The room next adjoining, which will contain the coffin, will be similarly decorated, and furnished with a magnificent [illegible] presented by the choosen of his Royal Highness. [illegible] which visitors will pass through, and [illegible] the [illegible] room. By this arrangement every [illegible] will be enabled to witness [illegible] the coffin. It will be [illegible] to [illegible] the public until the same period. The private terrace, which is always thrown open to public admission on the afternoons of Saturday and Sunday, will likewise be closed until after the funeral of the deceased prince.

The following distinguished personages, great officers of state, &c., will attend the funeral:—His Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge, who will be chief mourner; his Royal Highness Prince George of Cambridge; Earl Delawarr, Lord Chamberlain; Earl of Liverpool, Lord Steward; Earl of Jersey, Master of the Horse; two Lords in Waiting to her Majesty; two Grooms of the Bedchamber to her Majesty's Chief Equerry and Clerk Marshal, Lord Charles Wellesley, and two Equerries in Waiting; the Clerk Marshal, and two Equerries in Waiting on his Royal Highness Prince Albert; Colonel George Conroy, Bart., Comptroller of the Household; Colonel and Principal Equerry to her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent, and two of her Royal Highness's Equerries in Ordinary; Colonel Sir Samuel G. Higgins, K.C.H., Equerry to her Royal Highness the Duchess of Gloucester; two of the Equerries of his Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge; the Groom of the Bedchamber, Equerries, Domestic Chaplain, Comptroller, Physician, medical attendants, &c., in the household of his late Royal Highness; Clarenceux and Norroy, King of Arms; the Windsor, Richmond, and York heralds, and numerous other distinguished and official personages, independently of the nobility of the standing and pall, who will be peers of the realm. It has been reported that it is the intention of the King of Hanover to follow the remains of the late duke to the grave, but we believe that his Majesty will not pay a visit to this country until quite the latter end of the ensuing month.

We have authority to contradict the report which has appeared in the newspapers that the funeral of the Duke of Sussex is to be conducted on a scale of unusual magnificence, and that it is to be attended by a large number of the fraternity of Freemasons. So far from this being the case, the funeral will be as private as may be consistent with the rank of the deceased. All offers of attendance on the part of public and other bodies have been declined.



POSITION OF THE SOMERS AT THE TIME OF THE MUTINY.

THE MUTINY OF THE SOMERS.

The annexed chart, taken from the New York Herald, shows the position of the American States brig Somers, on the day that Commander M'Kenzie caused Spencer, Cromwell, and Small to be executed for an alleged mutiny—already noticed in our paper. At noon on the 1st of December, 1842, the day of the execution, the Somers was in 17 deg. 34 min. 28 sec. north, and 57 deg. 57 min. 45 sec. west, or, to make it more intelligible to many of our readers, about 17½ degrees north latitude, and 58 degrees west longitude; her distance from the island nearest to her (Guadaloupe) was 212 miles, and from Antigua, 218. The Somers was then going eight knots per hour, with a steady south-easterly wind. She had for ten days previous to the execution, and three after, made about 200 miles a day; the distance run, as shown by her log-book, from the 21st of November to the 3rd of December, being 2635 miles. There was no danger of her losing the fair wind, as it uniformly blows from the south-east in those latitudes, at the above season, constituting what are commonly termed "trade winds." Now, to show the necessity for the most extraordinary stretch of power, in hanging these men, Commander M'Kenzie discovered on the 27th of November that a mutiny existed on board the Somers, and that Spencer, Cromwell, and Small were the ringleaders; and, consequently, on the same day, Spencer was securely confined in irons. On the following day Cromwell and Small were also put in irons; and, to prevent any communication between the prisoners and the crew, the sentinels placed over them had positive orders to put to death either that attempted to speak or make signs to any of the ship's company. They ran on in this way from the 27th of November to the 1st of December. If the crew had been in such a mutinous state as described by Commander M'Kenzie, they would during this period have shown their teeth, had they felt inclined to bite; or, even after Spencer was confined, Cromwell and Small, if such determined villains, could have rallied their party, had such a party existed, and been strong enough, and have both rescued Spencer and put their threats into execution. But instead of the crew being in the state of insubordination as described, they not only quietly allowed these three men to be confined (in fact, to sit strongly ironed before their faces), but sent a hand to run them up to the yard-arms, with only ten minutes allowed them to make their peace with their God; and then, taking the signal from their magnanimous commander, they gave three cheers for the flag of their country, and three cheers for God Almighty! The execution took place at two o'clock in the afternoon, so that the brig had neared Guadaloupe 16 or 18 miles, was then only about 196 miles from it, and could have reached that island or Antigua at about noon on the following day. In Captain M'Kenzie's account of the situation of the brig on the day of the execution he says he was 525½ from the island of St. Thomas. Had America been at war with England and France we could have understood this, but why did he not state his distance from Guadaloupe and Antigua, two friendly islands under his lee, and where he knew every assistance would have readily been afforded him? The affair was investigated by a court of inquiry composed of naval captains, who justified Captain Mackenzie's conduct; but the case was afterwards sent to a court-martial, and occupied forty-three days in the investigation, which concluded on the 23rd ult. The result, however, was not known when the latest accounts left. An attempt was made to induce the civil courts to take cognisance of the matter, but Judge Betts decided that the court had no jurisdiction over offences committed in United States ships, and triable by courts-martial. It was confidently expected that the decision of the court-martial would be one of acquittal.

JAMES STUART.

This remarkable man is a resident of Berwick-upon-Tweed, and should he live till Christmas next he will have read the extraordinary age of 115 years. His life, as related by himself, is a "strange eventful history," accredited in its leading incidents. Stuart, it appears, is the youngest of sixteen children, whom he has long outlived: he was born in Charlestown, South Carolina, where his father, General John Stuart, was then serving; he was reared with his sisters at the house of Airlie, in Dunkeld, the property of Stuart's grandm ther, who was pulled out of her house and killed by the Campbells, who then burnt the dwelling. Stuart was at the battle of Culoden; he saw Colonel Gardiner knocked off his horse by a ball, and killed at Prestonpans; he saw Prince Charlie march in triumph into Edinburgh, and take possession of Holyrood; and he claims a near relationship to the Prince. Stuart was also at the battle of Bunker's-hill; he was an ensign in Wolfe's army, and was with him at Quebec. At the close of the American war he disposed of his commission, and afterwards sold his property at different times in Scotland. When George IV. visited Edinburgh, the royal command was despatched to "old Stuart" to attend the sovereign, and he accordingly spent fourteen days in the festivities of the Scottish capital. Lord Frederick Fitzclarence, of Etal, was very kind to the old man, and even for him several times to his seat. Stuart has had five wives, the last of whom is living, is about fifty years of age, and proves a kind partner to the old man. By his several marriages he has had twenty-seven children, ten of whom have been killed in battle: viz., five in the East India Company's service, two at Trafalgar, one in the Scotch Greys at Waterloo, and two at Algiers with Admiral Milne.

Stuart's present height is five feet, but he was much taller in his youth: he was some years at sea, where he once fell from the foreyard of a large vessel, which injured his back, and ever after caused him to stoop. His memory is still very good, and he can see pretty well; and his feats of strength are well attested in his neighbourhood. He earns his livelihood as a fiddler, and in his peregrinations he carries a wife at his back.

Mr. James Wilson, of Berwick, has executed a most characteristic statue of Stuart, of the life size, whence the accompanying sketch has been taken: it is cut out of a solid block of very fine stone, which was presented to Mr. Wilson, by Sir David Milne, of Milne Graden; and this statue is allowed by all who have seen it and the original to be an exact representation of this very remarkable man.

A print of this eccentric "descendant of Scotland's ancient kings" has recently been published, and a copy of the same accepted by her Majesty, who, since her visit to Scotland last year, has taken great interest in James's fate, and liberally contributed to the fund raised for his support.

THE FASHIONS.

Paris, Rue Chaussée d'Antin, April 24, 1843.

Mon cher Monsieur,—Seduced by the delicious weather which characterised the last few days of March, I confess to you that I had made up my mind to expect a splendid promenade at Longchamps, and was already busying myself, in anticipation, with the various costumes and the various fashions which I had expected to see sported for the first time on that most important occasion; but, alas, I have been doomed to witness the disappointment of all my hopes. Cold, chilly, and snowy days have dissipated those smiling illusions, and have shown us that we have as yet not done with winter; and I am therefore compelled to look for serious and authentic news of the fashions to those sources from which the best part of our fashions emanate, I mean to the ateliers and magas nes of our most fashionable modistes. Let us then commence in the natural order of things, by a rapid inspection of the materials destined to carry away the honours of the season. I should say, then, that for full dress nothing will be more worn than brocades, both Pompadour and Charles VI.; figured taffeties, as well those of Touraine as Persian; the royal footanges and the royal mandarin; Pekins, of all shades and of all descriptions, figured Pekins, agate Pekins, camelion Pekins, &c., &c. For visits and the promenade, of course, the variety will be too great for me to give you the nomenclature of even a portion of them; but I think I may cite the royal rex velvet and the zebra mohaur, Arab, Pekin taffetas, and those of India and Scotch shaded and glazed taffetas, and printed gros de Naples of a large pattern, &c. As yet I hardly dare speak of fancy articles, as the time is not yet arrived for their appearance; I may, however, provisionally mention printed foulards, chenils, collbs, mousselines de laine, printed Cashmeres, and barèges, with narrow threads of satin printed in colours. Of the costumes themselves, I have particularly remarked two delicious examples, of which the first was a grey Italian taffety, made very long behind, trimmed with a double niche of taffety, falling in front in rounded ends, coming no lower than the knees, and retained at the top of the arm by several points in use for the purpose of making the plaits lie regularly. The second was in black tulle, rounded at the ends, and trimmed completely round it with broad black lace, surmounted with a double puffing of black satin. I have already said that the uncertainty of the weather as yet has prevented any decided change, or at least has given rise to very timid innovations upon the fashions I have described in my last letter. To give you, however, some idea of what may be expected to predominate, I will shortly describe two or three specimens which have proceeded from the atelier of one of our most fashionable modistes. These were three robes in peau de soie: the first a bright grey, with a single skirt, the corsage plain and high, the sleeves plain, with jockeys formed by three bias, supported in front by silk buttons. The second was sea green, trimmed on the front of the skirt by a large puffing, which gradually diminished in size as it approached the corsage; this was divided in the middle by a bar of passementerie; which same bar was placed on either side the puffing, the corsage high and pointed, trimmed with a very narrow puffing at the point, and gradually enlarging in fan fashion as it approached the shoulder; the sleeves were plain The third was in French blue, trimmed all round the skirt at the bottom by a rich garland embroidered in soutache, rounded at each side of the seam in front, and mounting en tablier towards the waist; the corsage high, plain at top, but slightly gathered at bottom; the back gathered. The whole of these costumes were singularly elegant in appearance, and did great credit to the taste of the artiste who invented them. I am rather circumscribed for space, or otherwise I would mention to you some of the novelties of one of our most distinguished fashionables, one of which, however, I cannot resist citing; it is called the Penelope hat, and is really a most coquettish and pretty affair, and after all is nothing more than a simple crêpe hat entirely covered with a veil of English lace, but made in citron gauze, and trimmed with zebra gauze ribbons, and with a simple demi-garland of pansies of a violet colour, a shade which I should remark is greatly in use among our élégantes. I fear I have already trespassed on your space, or I would describe others of this very elegant pattern, I must, however, defer it till another opportunity, until which adieu.

HERMIETTE DE B.

In the Court of Queen's Bench, on Tuesday, Mr. Sergeant Wrangham appeared in court, and, as cause called to prosecute, at his seat within the bar, her Majesty having been graciously pleased to grant him a patent of precedence. Sir Gregory Allnott Lewin, Knight, the Hon. John Chetwynd Talbot, and Samuel Martin, John Arthur Roebuck, and William Henry Watson, Esqrs., were severally called within the bar as Queen's counsel.

SUSPECTED MURDER.—The magistrates of Union-hall having received information that a poor old pensioner, of the name of Charles Broughton, near seventy years of age, had come by his death under circumstances which excited suspicion that he had been maltreated, he having lodged at a low house in Kent-street, the resort of tramps, thieves, and the worst of characters, directed the police to give information of the circumstances to Mr. Carter, the coroner, in consequence of which that gentleman, on Tuesday last, held an inquest at the King and Queen public-house, opposite Newington Church, but was afterwards obliged to adjourn the inquiry until after the post mortem examination. A person named Wren, to whom the deceased attributed the cause of his death, was held to bail to appear and answer any charge that might be made against him.

THE MARKETS.

CORN-EXCHANGE.—We have to report the arrival of a moderate supply of English wheat up to our market during the present week, yet, owing to the extremely small attendance of buyers on each day, the demand has ruled extremely dull, and our prices have given way from 1s to 2s per quarter, without effecting a clearance. In foreign wheat next to nothing has been doing, and the rates have declined quite 1s per quarter. Good barley and malt have still supported their previous quotations; but in other kinds a small amount of business has been done. Oats, beans, peas, and flour have maintained their value.

ARRIVALS.—English: wheat, 31 qrs; barley, 1690; oats, 2210; and malt, 6160 quarters; flour, 4080 sacks. Irish: barley, 180; and oats, 1,853 qrs. Foreign: barley, 3540 qrs.

English.—Wheat, Essex and Kent, red 40s to 44s; ditto white [illegible], Norfolk and Suffolk, red, 39s to 40s; ditto, white, [illegible]. Rye, 30s to 32s. Barley, 22s to 23s, malting ditto, 30s to 35s; Chevalier [illegible], Lincoln and Northumberland [illegible], brewing [illegible]. Malt, [illegible]. Beans, new, 24s to 26s. Harvest ditto, [illegible]. Peas, maple, 23s to 24s; white, 26s to 27s; boilers, 27s to 27s per quarter. Town-made flour, 44s to 45s; Suffolk, 38s to 40s; Stockton and Yorkshire, 36s to 38s per 280 lbs. Foreign. Free wheat, 56s to 58s. In Bond. Barley, 20s, oats, new, 15s to 17s; ditto feed, 14s to 16s. beans, 29s to 30s, peas, 32s to 37s per quarter. Flour, America, 29s to 34s; Baltic, 27s per barrel

The Seed Market.—So little has been doing in this market since our last, that our prices may be considered almost nominal.

The following are the present rates:—Linseed, English, sowing, 48s to 57; Baltic, crushing, 42s to 46s, Mediterranean and Odessa, 44s to 46s; hempseed, 36s to 46s per quarter. coriander, 10s to 11s per cwt; brown mustard seed, 10s to 11s; white ditto, 12s to 15s 6d; tares, 5s to 5s 9d per bushel; English rapeseed, new, £20 to £23 per last of ten quarters. Linseed cakes, English, £10 to £10 10s, ditto foreign, £7 to £7 10s per 1000; rapeseed cakes, £8 5 to £9 per ton.

Bread.—The prices of wheaten bread are from 7d to 7½d; of household ditto, 5d to 6½d for the 4lb. loaf.

Imperial Weekly Average.—Wheat, 46s 7d; barley, 22s 9d; oats, 17s 6d; rye, 29s 7d; beans, 32s 11d; peas, 37s 5d.

Imperial Averages of Six Weeks which govern Duty.—Wheat, 45s 5d; barley, 23s 5d; oats 17s 4d; rye, 28s 9d, beans, 36s 2d, peas, 36s 9d per quarter.

Duties on Foreign Corn.—Wheat, 20s; Barley, 8s; Oats, 6s; Rye, 11s 6d; Beans, 11s 6d; Peas, 11s 6d.

Tea.—At the public sales of tea held this week—embracing 58,000 packages—the attendance of buyers has been good, but they have evinced an unwillingness to purchase, except on easier terms. Only about 9200 packages have been sold, at a reduction of about 1d per lb. upon congous and bynens

Sugar.—The arrivals of sugar from all quarters have continued good. At auction, as well as by private contract, a very moderate amount of business has been doing, and the rates have ruled 6d per cwt. under those of last week.

Coffee.—The market remains very flat, and prices have given way quite 2s per cwt.

Indigo.—The public sales have gone off heavily this week, and lower terms have been again accepted, making the decline on the January sales' prices of 8d to 1s on good and fine shipping qualities, and 6d to 9d on low and middling qualities of Bengal.

Provisions.—We have no particular change to notice in this market. Bacon maintains the late advance, with an improved demand. Irish butter very dull, and prices declining. Foreign, of fine quality, brings 98s to 100s, but the lower kinds are neglected.

Tallow.—The demand is inactive, but prices are steady; 42s to 42s 3d is the value of fine quality on the spot.

Coals Newcastle, 12s 6d; Holywell Main, 12s 3d; Cyd's Redheugh, 12s; Tanfield Moor, 17s 6d; Hetton, 18s; Hilda, 16s 6d; Braddyll's Hilton, 20s 9d; Stewart's, 20s 6d; Caradoc 20s 3d, per ton. Ships arrived, 78.

Potatoes.—There has been a slow inquiry for potatoes, and prices have ruled from 30s to 70s per ton, with fair average supplies on sale.

Hops.—Good yearlings are quite as dear as last noted; but other descriptions are almost nominal.

Wool.—About 2200 packages of wool have been imported this week. As the public sales are attended with the utmost of the activity of the trade, next to nothing is doing privately.

Smithfield.—The market has been very heavily supplied with stock, and the trade, in consequence, has been heavy at drooping prices. Heref, from 3s to 3s 10d; Shorton, 3s 10d to 4s; Lamb, 5s to 6s; Veal, 3s 6d to 4s 6d, and pork 3s to 4s per 8 lbs to sink the offals.

Newgate and Leadenhall.—About 1000 carcases of country killed meat have arrived here this week, and the supplies of that killed in the metropolis have proved excessive; hence, the demand has proved dull at lower rates of money. Beef, from 2s 4d to 3s 6d.; Mutton, 2s 6d to 4s 6d; Lamb, 4s to 5s 10d; Veal, 3s 6d to 4s 6d; and Pork, 3s to 4s per 8 lbs by the carcase.

COMMERCE AND MONEY.

If any correct opinion can be formed from the increased activity which has prevailed during this week in all the manufacturing districts, we are entitled to infer that the return of the Government of the Brazils and of Portugal to enter into commercial arrangements with that of the United Kingdom is not considered by our merchants engaged in those departments of our commerce of any material importance. In Manchester, Glasgow, Birmingham, and in all those places wherein the people find employment in manufacturing pursuits, improvement is steadily advancing, and no forced means are used to support it. Neither speculation crude in goods themselves, the orders being extent for immediate foreign exportation or for home consumption, and in no quarter are the means raised for the prosecution of trade by unsecurity manufactured bills of exchange in the money market. Credit and confidence are therefore born in a healthy position at the present moment. For the United States of North America large shipments of various goods have already been made, and more are now in progress, to be shortly introduced into that republic by smugglers across the Canadian lakes, and in the large American rivers communicating with them. But the principal demand is for the inhabitants of our own colonies, foreign possessions, and late conquests, in which we may safely say we may find almost boundless channels for the consumption of all the goods which can at present be produced by our industrial classes, and for which we shall receive in return the rich products of climates far more kindly than our own. We have capital in abundance for the extension of our trade abroad, indeed so far greater abundance than the moneyed interest at present can find profitable employment for, and the consequence of the great difficulty now experienced in embarking it on safe channels even at low rates of interest. In the discount market very few commercial or bankers' acceptances are to be found, and they are readily disposed of at annual interest of from 1½ to 2½ per cent. In the shares of the great leading lines of the railway companies, business to any extent cannot be effected without an advance in prices, although during this week little has been done in any of them, and to newly holders, therefore, a small decline in the late high prices is necessary, when sales must be made. This, however, is only temporary, for those lines in which activity generally has been displayed are on a gradual state of improvement, partly originating in decreased annual expenditure, and partly in increasing traffic along them. In the British public securities of all descriptions are at present so high, that they offer little or rather no temptation to the capitalist for the employment of his property. Bank of England Stock is worth about 182; and East India Stock is seldom, at present, to be found in the money market, nor can it be purchased under 262. Exchequer bills still command a premium of from 65s. to 70s. In the Consols, however, considerable dulness has been visible during the last ten or twelve days, nor is it easy to discover any reasonable cause for this effect. It certainly originates not in any foreign political cause, nor can the improvement in trade, in any way so yet, have produced this effect; the capital already embarked in commerce being amply sufficient for its wants. The shade of too budget, to be brought forward in the beginning of the week, may perhaps be creating evil, which its actual presence, no doubt, will speedily remove; and we strongly suspect that this is the reason why we are unable to quote money Consols higher than 89¾ ¾—89¾ being the nearest value for the next settlement.

On the Foreign Stock Exchange a good deal of speculative business has been done during the week. The prices of the Three per Cents, yesterday varied from 3 ... The dealers generally being busy in making out their accounts for receiving or paying the differences at the settlement. Account Bonds are almost unchanged, lower, in consequence of that Government having again failed in providing for a dividend due in the beginning of this month. No alteration can be noted in other descriptions of foreign securities.

THE AURORA OF GUIDO.
(Now the subject of a ballet at her Majesty's Theatre.)

That beautiful ballet, "L'Aurore," of which Dumi'âtre has so exquisitely personated the aërial spirit at our Italian Opera, and of which the story has been already given in the columns of this journal, has founded its most dazzling and poetical tableau on that splendid creation of the gifted Guido which woke the inspiration of the "bard of memory" into rapturous notes of praise :—

> Oh! mark again the coursers of the sun
> At Guido's call their round of glory run;
> Again the rosy Hours resume their flight,
> Obscured and lost in floods of golden light.

We here present to our readers an engraving of the picture itself, in which the allegorical revival of the stage has created a new interest, as it adorns one of the ceilings of the Palazzo Rospigliosi at Rome. The picture is painted in what may be called a middle manner, between the extremes of the two styles which this great artist practised at different periods of his life. Guido is chiefly known in this country by a style of silvery brightness, which he was led to adopt, less by any natural predisposition towards it than by a desire to obtain novelty, by a mode of practice directly contrasted to the dark and forcible manner of Caravaggio, which had acquired great popularity, and which he had begun by imitating. In all that relates to composition, character, and expression, the "Aurora" must rank among Guido's finest performances. The general conception is in the highest degree poetical; the figure of Apollo unites grace with dignity; and that of Aurora, flying before him and strewing flowers upon the earth, seems buoyant as the morning breeze itself. It may be objected to many of Guido's figures, however admirable in other respects, that their action is artificial, and even theatrical. The present composition is, however, entirely free from that defect: the action of the Hours is playful and simple, and the expression of their faces is admirably sweet and natural. The general vivacity of the effect is finely attempered by the still, broad, and brilliant light which surrounds the Apollo, and by the serene and silent aspect of the lower part of the picture, in which the earth and ocean seem just awakening beneath the dawn of day.

The great merits of this work—those of poetic conception and beautiful character—are attempted to be given, however inadequately, in our engraving.

LAUNCH OF THE GLORIANA.

This splendid vessel, of 1100 tons, built by Messrs. T. and W. Smith, of Newcastle-upon-Tyne, and intended for the East India trade, was launched on Saturday, the 15th inst., from their extensive building-yard at St. Peter's. The sight was witnessed by many hundreds of spectators on both sides of the Tyne, as well as from the steam-boats, ships, and small craft in the river. A platform was erected at a short distance from the stem of the vessel, and on it were assembled a considerable number of ladies and gentlemen; one of the former pronounced the name of Gloriana (by which the vessel will be subsequently known), and dashed the "brandy bottle" at the bull as she gently glided into the Tyne, amidst the firing of guns and the plaudits of the spectators. The Gloriana is the largest and finest vessel that was ever built on the Tyne, and is coppered up to the bends. A few minutes previous to the Gloriana going off the stocks, a beautifully-modelled ship was launched from the building-yard of Mr. Robert Grey, at the Friar's Goose.

DRURY-LANE THEATRE.

A new play by Mr. Sheridan Knowles was produced on Monday night. It contains elements which, though often tried, constantly ensure success; it occasionally warms up into those bursts of emotion (or its resemblance) which must tell with a first-night audience, however little permanence it may gain; and it met with that applause at the fall of the curtain which would lead us to predict a "run," had we not long been familiar with the fallacious good humour of that portion of the public which witnesses the launch of a five-act play. "The Secretary" has some strong points, but it gives small evidence of originality; the order may be new, but there is little novelty in the characters, and still less in the principal collision. A young lady of noble birth falls in love with a young man of seemingly humble extraction, and, like many other heroines, actually makes love to him. This is the pivot on which the play turns.

Wilton (Anderson), a youth of unknown parentage, is secretary to Lord Byerdale (Phelps), and has a mysterious acquaintance with one Colonel Green (Macready), who professes to know the secret of his birth. He has rescued from a band of ruffians the Duke of Gaveston (G. Bennett) and his daughter Laura (Miss H. Faucit), and he and the lady are enamoured of each other, though they have not met since this achievement. She is designed for Lord Sherbrooke (Hudson), son of Byerdale, and a very true friend of the secretary; but the young nobleman is not a marrying man, and, therefore, when sent to woo, he takes Wilton with him, resolving to give him the prize. All this is done or described in the first act, which is one of introduction—nothing farther.

The plot, however, is then carried through a maze of intricacies out of which the crowning of the love of Wilton and Laura is of course to be developed, but not until after many storms and tosses upon that sea which "never did run smooth," and which as they delay the happy consummation, and are moreover of very complex detail, we shall not intrude upon our readers, but escort them at once to the fifth act, which lets in all the light upon the drama, and includes the subject of our artist's illustration. This fifth act contains one of those scenes which invariably work up a public to tumultuous applause. Colonel Green has a private interview with Wilton, and tells him how his father was killed in the wars in France, and how his life was saved by an uncle, younger than his father, but older than Byerdale. When the same colonel discovered that he was this good uncle, and uncle and nephew hugged each other, the delight of the audience knew no bounds. John Bull dearly loves a bit of dramatic justice. The Colonel gives his nephew a free pardon for the Duke of Gaveston (who had been involved in a jacobite plot), which he has obtained from King William, and the young man, consistently with his honourable character, rescues the Duke at once, discloses his own illegitimacy, and leaves him a perfectly free choice whether he will give his daughter or not. The declaration by that Deus ex Machinâ, Colonel Green, who states that Wilton is not illegitimate after all, and so puts him in possession of the Byerdale estates, to the exclusion of the present owner, the wicked younger uncle, makes him an advantageous match for his lady love, and terminates the piece.

Such is the play, which the author has made from materials similar to those he has frequently used before, and the chief merit of which is occasional tact and an occasional appearance of earnestness.

The character of Wilton, the hero of the piece, is rather a heavy one, though certainly the most complete that is drawn. Though deeply in love, he is ever oppressed by a melancholy, which circumstances have engendered, and which is a check to the free language of passion. The honourable nature of the man seems an embarrassment to the lover. Anderson made him as gloomy and sombre as possible—he had probably hit the author's meaning—but certainly the appearance was anything but that of one who could so far captivate a young lady's heart as to make her cast aside the considerations of rank, and fling herself into his arms. Miss Faucit was all energy and passion, and very prettily did she introduce the character by her playful musings, and the bashfulness with which she received Wilton. Lord Byerdale is one of those unthankful personages, an abstract villain; and Phelps, who merely had to glide about the stage and look wicked and knowing, produced about the same effect as in Stukely. Colonel Green, by no means the central character of the play, was admirably acted by Macready. There was a benevolent bluffness in the old soldier; the features were hardened, but a smile played lightly on the corners of the mouth; you could feel there was a warmth and heartiness in the man, but you could understand the fierceness with which his spirit would rise when offended. The defiance of the conspirators—a point requiring all the vigour of the actor—was played quite up to the mark. Nor should we forget the Duke of Gaveston, acted by G. Bennett. That gentleman had very thoroughly conceived a character, in which but little had been given him by the author. The cold, melancholy, imperturbable dignity of the countenance was excellent, and one of those quiet excellences which unfortunately are never appreciated. To the gay, good-humoured Sherbrooke much life was given by Hudson.

"All the honours" followed the descent of the curtain. The author was called for, and was excused by Mr. Serle, and the different actors were called before the curtain. Anderson announced the "Secretary" for repetition amid loud applause.

ANNUAL PROCESSION OF THE CORK TOTAL ABSTINENCE SOCIETY.

On the morning of Easter Monday the city of Cork was all animation and bustle, in consequence of the throngs that poured in from the surrounding counties to join in the annual procession of the Cork Teetotal Abstinence Society. From the windows of several houses portraits of Father Mathew were suspended. At ten o'clock the Camp Field was thronged. Shortly after Father Mathew appeared, dressed in a blue silk scarf, with medal and white rosette: he was hailed with enthusiasm. All arrangements having been perfected, the procession left the field amid the shouts of tens of thousands, and the music of upwards of sixty bands; its appearance was truly majestic. As the first part of the procession appeared on Patrick's-hill, and marched in order across the bridge, up Patrick-street, the immense array of the procession, and the living masses who thronged each side of the street, formed a spectacle so sublime as only a multitude of living human beings could offer to the eye. The windows of the houses throughout the line of procession were occupied by elegantly-dressed ladies, who smiled cordial approval on the scene, and, by waving of scarfs and handkerchiefs, appeared to take the liveliest interest in the soul-stirring pageant.

The order of procession was as follows:—First, a number of horsemen headed by Mr. Kenna, Father Mathew's secretary, each bearing a handsome banner; then Mr. Joseph Mullarch, also on horseback, bearing a magnificent banner of white satin richly ornamented with gold. Next came a body of men preceded by a large banner, on which was the portrait of Father Mathew, with this inscription:—

"5,000,000 regenerated sons of Erin,"—

"All nations bless thee from afar,
And hail thee Erin's radiant star."

After these avant courriers of the procession came the beautiful juvenile band, well known as "Father Mathew's Own." Their dress was tasteful and rich, being light-blue embroidered jackets, black trousers with broad gold lace. After this band walked the Apostle of the Cause, with Alderman Thomas Lyons, and accompanied by the Rev. Messrs. Duggan, Denis M'Leod, and James O'Regan, and a number of other gentlemen. Next came the boys of the North Monastery Schools, to the number of 700, bearing white wands with small streamers. The other societies followed in regular succession.

At two o'clock the procession returned by Leitrim, over Patrick's-bridge, down by Merchant's-quay, on to Warren's-place, and thus to the Corn-market, where a spacious platform was erected. Here the mighty mass halted, and formed into beautiful order. Previous to this Father Mathew had separated from the procession, and gone to his house in Cove-street, where multitudes waited from morning to receive the pledge at his hands.

Alderman Lyons was called to the chair. The purpose of the meeting was, to assist in the furtherance of the "Mathew Testimonial."

THE LANCASHIRE INDEPENDENT COLLEGE.

The origin of the building may be said to be dated from the close of 1838, about which time the insufficiency of the existing academy at Blackburn, for supplying the wants of a rapidly increasing body like the Independents had become strikingly manifest. It was then thought desirable that a collegiate building, affording more extensive accommodation, should be erected, and it was first suggested in the vicinity of Liverpool. In the December of that year, at a meeting of the parties interested in the Blackburn academy, a resolution was passed "That the academy should be removed to Manchester," and subscriptions were entered into to supply the means for the new erection. It was thought that a suitable building might be erected for £5000; but, in the course of 1840, the subscriptions reached nearly £15,000, and it was then determined to raise and expend the sum of £25,000 in the undertaking; and, as encouragement towards raising that sum, our townsman, George Hadfield, Esq., who has altogether contributed upwards of £2000, offered 10 per cent. upon the sum still wanting, and the example had the effect of increasing the sum to £19,000. The foundation-stone of the college was laid on the 23rd September, 1840, upon a pleasant site in the township of Withington, which was purchased from Samuel Brooks, Esq., who has also been a liberal contributor. The building, which may be seen from the Chester road, forms a beautiful object. The ground-plan of the building, which has been erected by Messrs. Hogg, Bedford, and Farquharson, under the superintendence of Messrs. Irwin and Chester, of Manchester (who obtained a premium of one hundred guineas for the best plan), is something approaching the letter E in form, the back of the letter representing the principal front to the north; the forks, the two wings, east and west; and the point before it represents the site of a beautiful entrance tower, surmounted by a pierced battlement with pinnacles at the angles, the entire height of which is 92 feet. The main body is composed of fine hard stone; but the wings are of brick, with stone dressings. The projection from the centre of the building behind is a lecture-room. The principal front is 201 feet in length, including the professors' houses at each extremity; between which runs a cloister, where the students may exercise in wet weather. The windows on the second or principal story are large, three-light, square-headed, with label mouldings; those in the third, in which are the dormitories, are two-light. A beautiful moulding runs between these and the battlement, embellished with sculptured heads in the style of the architecture of the period. The services connected with the opening of this establishment commenced on Tuesday evening, when a sermon was delivered in Grosvenor-street Chapel, by the Rev. Dr. Harris; after which a collection was made, which amounted to £50.

On Wednesday morning a prayer-meeting was held in Zion Chapel, Thetford New-road; and at eleven o'clock the opening service was commenced by Dr. Raffles, of Liverpool, offering the dedicatory prayer, and the Rev. Dr. Vaughan, the president of the institution, reading the inaugural address. A cold collation was laid in the suite-rooms, after which a collection was again made, amounting to upwards of £1000. In the evening a tea-party was held in the Corn-exchange, S. Fletcher, Esq., in the chair; and was addressed by Dr. Raffles, Dr. Harris, the Rev. E. Binney, &c., and another collection, amounting to £1000, made. The institution may now be considered out of debt, the sum of £25,000 having been raised.

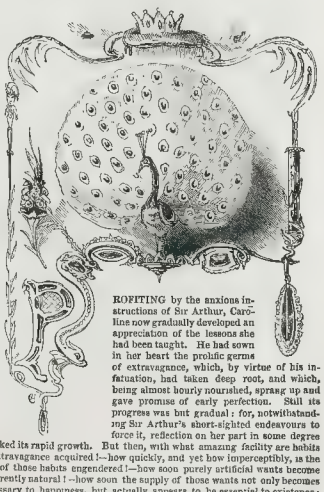
A ROMANCE OF REAL LIFE.

By HENRY COCKTON,

AUTHOR OF "VALENTINE VOX," "STANLEY THORN," ETC.

CHAPTER VIII.

ON TASTE.



ROFITING by the anxious instructions of Sir Arthur, Caroline now gradually developed an appreciation of the lessons she had been taught. He had sown in her heart the prolific germs of extravagance, which, by virtue of his infatuation, had taken deep root, and which, being almost hourly nourished, sprang up and gave promise of early perfection. Still its progress was but gradual: for, notwithstanding Sir Arthur's short-sighted endeavours to force it, reflection on her part in some degree checked its rapid growth. But then, with what amazing facility are habits of extravagance acquired!—how quickly, and yet how imperceptibly, is the love of those habits engendered!—how soon purely artificial wants become apparently natural!—how soon the supply of those wants not only becomes necessary to happiness, but actually appears to be essential to existence; and while we feel that we cannot relinquish the luxuries to which we have been accustomed, and will not, while we have the power to procure them, how every fresh extravagance teems with others, greater than that from which they sprang!

"My love," said Caroline, when the upholsterer had finished the crimson drawing-room, "how rich, how excessively beautiful it looks: does it not, dear?"

"Very," replied Sir Arthur; "warm, cosy, and comfortable—very."

"Oh, as you enter, it looks perfectly magnificent! I never saw anything comparable with it! I really had no idea that the room would look so splendid, although I might have inferred it from the fact, that in the arrangements your taste would be displayed."

"Lady Cleveland," returned Sir Arthur, bowing profoundly, "I appreciate the compliment. You still love to flatter me, you little rogue, you do."

"Nay, indeed, dear; flattery is out of the question. You know that you have a pure taste; you know, that in point of purity, it cannot be surpassed: and nothing can be deemed flattery which meets with the approbation of one's own heart."

"But it is, notwithstanding all you say, flattery—unequivocal flattery. I see that we shall have a desperate quarrel about this; but you are conscious that you possess a much purer taste than I. You well know it to be infinitely superior."

"I should dearly love to bring it to the test," rejoined Caroline, smiling archly, while as she spoke fascination gaily danced in her eye. "Even in this very matter I should like to convince you. My room would not, of course, be equal to this; but I should like, by showing what I can accomplish, to place the point beyond all dispute."

"Do so; by all means do so. You have a carte blanche. I know you'll beat me—I know it. But, of course, you will promise to do your best?"

The promise was given; and when the upholsterer, whose presence was forthwith commanded, arrived, she gave him instructions to hang the front drawing-room which then looked superb with bright emerald paper embossed, conceiving that that, with gold mouldings, of course, and appropriate furniture, would have an effect which would eclipse Sir Arthur's crimson chef d'œuvre, although she did not intend to admit it. The chairs were ordered to be carved and gilded, with seats and backs of rich emerald damask, with which material the couches and ottomans were also to be covered; and while the tables were to be carved and gilded like the chairs, and inlaid with emerald stone, the gilt cornices were to be of the most massive description, with curtains, of course, en suite. At first the desire to have a carpet to match presented a very serious difficulty, inasmuch as it was apprehended that nothing of the kind could be procured. This was, however, eventually overcome; and when the pier glass and pictures, in splendid gilt frames, had been adjusted with a view to the most striking effect, the emerald-room looked magnificent indeed.

It had been distinctly understood by the contending parties that Sir Arthur was neither to enter nor to peep into the room until the whole of the arrangements had been completed. This event, which was at the time sealed with a kiss, was religiously adhered to; and when the evening arrived on which the room was quite ready for inspection she had it lighted up brilliantly, and having sent for Sir Arthur, received him in an extremely rich emerald satin dress, morrocco of all points with jewels of the most superb caste.

As he entered the effect was electric. He looked round and round with an expression of the most intense amazement. It was to him a scene of enchantment the most absolute; and there stood his Fairy Queen, looking more lovely than Fairy Queen ever looked before! His every sense was dazzled, and Caroline perceiving this smiled, but was silent, lest the sound of a voice so well known should break the charm, while a musical-box, which was then distinctly heard, played his favourite air, and the spell was complete.

"Come to me," said he, at length, having contemplated the bright scene before him with feelings of rapture; "come and prove to me that this is not magic."

Caroline approached, and he embraced her, and having gazed at her fondly embraced her again.

"You are now, I apprehend, about to flatter me," she observed.

"Flatter you! exclaimed Sir Arthur. "There, enjoy your triumph like a respectable Christian, and don't exult thus over him whom you have conquered."

"I am not yet sure of having achieved any triumph to enjoy."

"What! Lady Cleveland; I should quarrel with you desperately on this subject did you not look so charming. You have triumphed, and you know it; but I patiently submit to my defeat in the perfect conviction of your having conquered but to delight me."

"And does it then really delight him?"

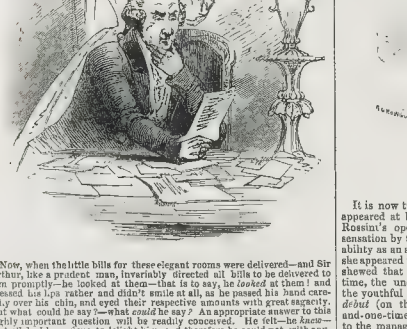
"There, say no more about it. Talk of my taste! I'll not consent to hear another syllable on the subject."

In that room they passed the remainder of the evening, and that it was pleasantly passed may be inferred from the fact, that while Caroline sweetly lavished upon him a series of fascinating smiles, he continued, being in the highest possible spirits, to laud to the very skies her taste and beauty.

But, probably, of all the attractive qualities possessed by woman, taste is by far the most costly. It is lamentable, certainly, that anything so agreeable as a refined taste should be so expensive; but it is extremely questionable whether the sum annually required for the support of a crack pack of hounds, and a highly respectable racing stud to boot, would exceed the expenditure of a woman of taste with unlimited means at her command.

It is not, however, essential to the gradual development of this history for a question of this character to be decided here: it will, perhaps, realise all immediate anticipations if it be stated, that Caroline received so much applause from Sir Arthur, who was really in absolute ecstacies, that stimulated as we all are by praise bestowed upon any performance which we feel that we can surpass, she resolved to eclipse even that which she had accomplished, with the view of proving that her taste had not been fully developed yet.

She accordingly gave orders for an amber-room, and when this had been completed, and praised by Sir Arthur, she ordered another to be gilded throughout. She then had a blue-room, and then a bright pink; but as she felt that her chef d'œuvre had still to be achieved, she ordered the principal dining-room to be completely lined with plate-glass, conceiving—and the result fully realised the conception—that the effect, while dining beneath a superb chandelier, would be brilliant in the extreme.



Now, when the little bills for these elegant rooms were delivered—and Sir Arthur, like a prudent man, invariably directed all bills to be delivered to him promptly—he looked at them—that is to say, he looked at them! and pressed his lips rather and didn't smile at all, as he passed his hand carefully over his chin, and eyed their respective amounts with great sagacity. But what could he say?—what could he say? An appropriate answer to this highly important question will be readily conceived. He felt—he knew—that all had been done to delight him, and therefore he could not, with anything bearing even the semblance of gratitude, complain. Still he did think the charges rather heavy: he admitted that the rooms looked magnificent; he admitted that Caroline's taste was most pure; but he could not effectually banish from his mind, that from the display of that pure taste had sprung the whole of the bills which he then saw before him! This fact may to some seem incredible, it is true; it is, however, a fact nevertheless. But to proceed, of course, these exceedingly elegant apartments could not by the fashionable world be stinted, if the fashionable world were afforded no opportunity of having their admiration of those apartments excited; and as the indisputable nature of this truth struck Caroline with infinite force—and it really did appear to a pity that so much taste and splendour should be concealed she conceived the idea of having a series of brilliant parties, with a view to astonish that world.

"I have been thinking, dear," she observed, when this natural idea had been engendered—"I have been thinking that as my aunt was, before our happy marriage, dear, excessively kind to me, probably you would not object to my inviting her here, for a week—a reconciliation may be effected."

"Certainly not," replied Sir Arthur; "oh! certainly not. I can object, my love, to nothing which can tend in any way to increase your happiness; and sorry indeed should I be to oppose the visits of any member of your family."

"You are a good soul," said Caroline. "Suppose, then, we ask her to dine with us?"

"Do so by all means."

"Then, let me see: who shall we have to meet her?"

"My dear have we not yes pieces."

"There will be Charles and Lucrece, papa and Fred, of course. Shall we have any one else, dear?"

"The thing would perhaps be more agreeable under the circumstances, if a few friends were present unconnected with the family. It would check the indulgence in any unpleasant reminiscences. Of course you understand me? But I'll leave it entirely to you—consult Lucrece on the subject. I shall not interfere with your province at all."

This was precisely the suggestion which Caroline expected him to make, and when Lucrece had been duly consulted, they decided on sending cards to forty, including Lady Grange, Dr. Hawtree, and Alice.

On the receipt of this totally unexpected invitation, Lady Grange felt her dignity rising. Her first impulse was to treat the card with contempt. But having read the notes of Caroline and Lucrece, by which that card was accompanied, curiosity began to struggle with dignity, and with so much success that she eventually resolved to go in order that she might see in what sort of style the creatures were living.

Accordingly, having dressed with the view of producing the most imposing effect possible, her ladyship, on the evening previously required to Sir Arthur's mansion; and on being received by Caroline, who sparkled with brilliants, in the emerald-room, she was actually startled by the splendour displayed, but resolving to conceal her astonishment, she became extremely gracious and affectionate, and greeted those friends who had already arrived with appropriate elegance and ease.

It is not, however, to be imagined that her ladyship's eyes were inactive: on the contrary, they rolled about with unexampled energy, and zealously continued to roll until dinner was announced, when she met with another surprise in passing through the amber-room, which, being also lighted up brilliantly, had an extremely chaste and pleasing effect.

But superb as she could not help feeling these apartments to be, her amazement had not reached its climax; for although she imagined that nothing could surpass the glittering magnificence of the one or the chaste, yet striking beauty of the other, when she entered the dining-room which seemed to be absolutely limitless, she could not repress an exclamation of wonder—she could not on the impulse of the moment avoid declaring to Dr. Hawtree, who led her in, that she had never in her life beheld anything so gorgeous!

It must, however, in justice to all, be recorded that her ladyship's admiration was productive of no pleasure—nay, that it was, on the contrary, a prolific source of pain, and that that pain increased in exactly the same proportion as her admiration of the splendour became excited. Had there been any meanness displayed, had there been anything, however remotely, indicative of her prediction—that unhappiness would reprove from the match—being verified, she would have been content; but seeing the magnificence by which she was surrounded, seeing Caroline shining with so much refulgence, and evidently with a heart full of joy, she was wretched; not only because of the absence of that peculiar comfort which springs from the realisation of that which we predict, and those pleasurable feelings with which she would have exclaimed, "I told you exactly how it would be—I said so—I knew it, but of course my advice was disregarded;" but because in beholding this grandeur she beheld that which in her gentle judgment she had lost!

But then the idea of shewing this of permitting it to be for one moment imagined that she felt at all mortified, or even annoyed, was ridiculous; she smiled sweetly, constantly, perpetually; and chatted with all the gaiety at her command, while she appeared to be really overjoyed to see Caroline so happy.

She had, however, yet to endure another pang, for Caroline, on retiring with the ladies, led them through the room which had been gilded throughout, and which actually appeared to be in a blaze, into the crimson-room—Sir Arthur's own—for the rich effect of which it was perfectly evident that her ladyship was totally unprepared. Here the gentlemen in due time rejoined them, and here the remainder of the evening was passed; and when midnight arrived the guests departed filled with wonder and admiration, and inspired with most exalted ideas on the subject of Sir Arthur Cleveland's wealth.

This, of course, was a very fair beginning, and when Caroline in the morning received her friends in the blue-room—which inflicted another blow upon the self-esteem of Lady Grange, who, while reflecting upon the chance she had missed, could not conceive what on earth she had been about—invitations poured in from all quarters, and a series of dinner parties followed. This led, as a social matter of course, to brilliant soirées and balls, and the friends of Sir Arthur and Lady Cleveland soon became extremely numerous; for the display of wealth has, upon the surface of society, precisely the same effect as a pebble upon the surface of the water: it produces a circle of which the radius increases until its limits cannot be defined.

THE THEATRES.

COVENT GARDEN THEATRE.

It is now twenty-two years since the beautiful Ronzi di Begnis appeared at her Majesty's theatre in the buffa part of Fatima in Rossini's opera of "Il Turco in Italia" and created an immense sensation by the extraordinary union of beauty, vocal power, and ability as an actress. On Wednesday, after that longum intervallum, she appeared under a new phrase of her still beautiful charms, and showed that slightly as she may have been externally touched by time, the undying glory of genius still burns within her with all the youthful fervour of former years. The part selected for her début (on the English boards and in English) was the thousand-and-one-times represented Norma, which, with all deference to the management or the lady herself, we cannot but think was unwise. A short time since this delicious opera was represented on the same stage in a manner that is not likely to be soon forgotten, and again, it was but a few nights ago that we heard it in its native purity at her Majesty's theatre, with the powerful Grist as the heroine. Moreover the style of the music is not quite consonant to the powers of Madame Ronzi di Begnis, whose penchant is certainly for light and graceful comedy, and we hope ere long to see and hear her in something more suited to her captivating peculiarities. Still her Norma, presented features of great beauty and originality, and its passages of intense feeling perhaps the anguish of the betrayed, and subsequently scorned priestess was never so keenly expressed. In the duet "Deh con te," there was a broken-heartedness that was truly touching; her voice, like an injured lute, expressing more in its lowered melody than when it had the highest power of utterance. It used to be a high soprano deficient in the graver notes: now it possesses some of the latter in great purity of intonation, though deficient in power; and when singing sotto voce, her neatness of execution reminds us of the quiet but extraordinary staccato of Ole Bull on the violin. Altogether she was most deservedly received, being loudly called for at the fall of the curtain to receive certain bouquets of flowers, and other demonstrations of unequivocal delight on the part of the audience. The part of Oroveso is nothing at all; therefore we can hardly believe we have heard the great Standigl as yet upon the English stage. The only remark we have to make is that he seems perfectly at home in the language, and sang the little he had to do perhaps as no other artiste could. Miss Rainforth appeared in the charming part of Adalgisa (lately so vindicated by Moltini), and so pleased the audience that a particular call for her was made after the general one, which she gracefully obeyed. The house, we are sorry to say, was not very well attended.

NAVAL AND MILITARY INTELLIGENCE.

The following orders appeared in the Gazette, which was published on Tuesday:—

HER MAJESTY'S GUARD, April 25.—Her Majesty does not require that the Officers of the Army shall wear any other mourning, on the present melancholy occasion of the death of his Royal Highness the Duke of SUSSEX, than a black crape round the left arm, with their uniforms. ADMIRALTY, April 25.—Her MAJESTY does not require that the Officers of the Fleet or Marines should wear any other mourning, on the present melancholy occasion of the death of his Royal Highness the Duke of SUSSEX, than a black crape round the left arm, with their uniforms.—SIDNEY HERBERT.

ACCIDENT ON CHATHAM LINES.—On Monday the troops at the Chatham Garrison, consisting of the 38th Regiment, the Chatham Division of the Royal Marines, and the depot company of the 77th, together with the provisional battalion, assembled on Chatham lines, where they were reviewed by the Commander-in-Chief, Sir Thomas Williams, Bart., K.C.B., attended by a numerous staff. The number of men on the ground was about 3000. On the troops forming a line, the horse on which Brigade Major John Doyle O'Brien rode "bolted," taking the left of the line. The major endeavoured to pull the horse in without effect, and finding he could have no control over the animal, and perceiving in front of him the deep trenches of the same, he released his feet from the stirrups, and fell to the ground most violently. When raised from the ground he was totally insensible. Mrs. O'Brien was in a carriage on the ground, and immediately drove to the spot, when the major was placed in it, accompanied by a military surgeon, and was taken to his residence at Brompton. Owing to the accident Sir Thomas Williams there ordered the troops to leave the ground for their barracks forthwith.

BIRTH OF A ROYAL PRINCESS AT BUCKINGHAM PALACE.

ODE

Written on the occasion of the Birth of the Infant Princess, April 25, 1843.

Sing! gladly sing,
Let voice and string
The royal birth proclaim;
It comes in peace,
Let discord cease,
And blow the trump of Fame!

Another rose of England's royal wreath
Has just put forth its bloom;
Oh! may it through a life of summer breathe;
Nor be its doom
To shed its leaflets o'er an early tomb!
No! far off be winter sky,
'Neath which it too must die!

May it with sister and with brother flow'rs
Long twine in love around the parent stems,
And prove that lordly well as lowly bow'rs
Can boast affection's purest, brightest gems!

And though like some fair, sunny, cloudless star, (Whose own familiar light
Is shed upon attendant worlds more nigh)
From us afar
Remov'd be its immediate presence bright;
Yet we will love it in its distant sky,
And look up to its influencing glow,
As something meant to bless us here below!

And if in future time
It come to be,
Sweet Infancy!
That one will woo thee from thy native land,
Perchance to lead thee to more sunny clime,
Let memory
Go with thy new love hand in hand;
Think of the white-cliff'd cradle of thy birth,
With childish fondness still 'mid woman's mirth,
And feel, how far thy fate may bid thee roam,
That Albion's daughter yet has England's home!

And SHE—the royal mother—wife
To ONE, but mistress of all hearts,
May she be blessed in the life
Whose dawn breaks not o'er nations' strife,
But e'en imparts
Another sign, like the prismatic zone
Which binds the water-cloud,
That nothing gloomy ever may enshroud
HERSELF—her LOVE-MATES—PEOPLE, or HER THRONE!

BIRTH OF A ROYAL PRINCESS.

In the course of the forenoon, on Monday, her Majesty gave audience to Sir Robert Peel, on official affairs, and in the afternoon visits of condolence, on the death of the Duke of Sussex, were paid by the Duchess of Kent, and other members of the royal family. About nine o'clock her Majesty rose from table, and, on leaving the saloon, the attendance of Sir James Clark, physician, was recommended in the Queen's boudoir. Sir James, perceiving these incipient symptoms peculiar to her Majesty's situation, decided that Dr. Locock should be sent for, and that gentleman arrived at the palace soon after ten o'clock, and her Majesty retired to bed, enjoying some refreshing sleep until within a few minutes of three o'clock, when the symptoms of uneasiness having returned, Mrs. Lilly, the monthly nurse, summoned Dr. Locock to the royal chamber, and, after the lapse of an hour, her Majesty was safely delivered of a daughter. His Royal Highness Prince Albert, Doctor Locock, and Mrs. Lilly were the only persons admitted, all the principal personages of the household being in the ante-chamber. The royal infant was presented to Prince Albert by Mrs. Lilly. The young princess is reported to be a fine healthy child, the features somewhat larger, and the frame more fully developed, than were those of the Princess Royal, her Majesty's first child.

The NEWS of her Majesty's safe delivery was communicated to the Lord Chamberlain, and special messengers were despatched to the residences of the various members of the Royal Family, the Cabinet Ministers, the Lord Chancellor, the Archbishop of Canterbury, &c., charged with the bulletin announcing the event. Between seven and eight o'clock Sir Robert Peel arrived at the palace, and was quickly followed by the Earl of Aberdeen, the Earl of Ripon, Lord Stanley, Sir James Graham, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, the Duke of Buccleuch, and the Lord Chancellor, to offer congratulation on the joyful occasion. The intelligence had spread all over the metropolis before nine o'clock, at which time the Park and Tower guns fired royal salutes of twenty-one guns. The bells of the several churches rang a merry deal, and the shipping of all nations lying in the river displayed their respective ensigns in companionship with the royal jack of Britain. The immediate vicinity of the palace was thronged throughout the day by persons of both sexes, all anxious to learn the sex of the royal infant, and the state of her Majesty's health. From twelve till five o'clock the nobility and gentry were continually arriving to make inquiries and leave cards of congratulation at the lodge. Queen's messengers were despatched from the Foreign-office with despatches, announcing the event to his Majesty the King of Hanover, and his Majesty the King of the Belgians. It is understood that the customary rejoicings incident to the accouchement of a Queen will in this instance be postponed until after the funeral of his late Royal Highness the Duke of Sussex.

After the issuing of the bulletin of her Majesty's health, at six o'clock on Tuesday morning, and the subsequent departure of her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent, and the ministers and officers of state assembled at the palace, the diplomatic corps and the nobility and gentry began to arrive, to make inquiry after her Majesty and the infant Princess. His Royal Highness the Prince Royal of Wurtemberg, accompanied by Baron de Hugel, the Wurtemberg Minister, called in the forenoon. Their Serene Highnesses the Hereditary Grand Duke of Mecklenburg Strelitz, and Prince Edward of Saxe Weimar, also arrived at the palace. At half-past two o'clock his Royal Highness Prince Albert, attended by the Marquis of Exeter, Groom of the Stole, and Colonel Bouverie, Equerry in Waiting, left Buckingham Palace for the Council-office, to attend a privy council. The privy councillors present were—the Archbishop of Canterbury, the Lord President, the Lord Chancellor, the Duke of Buccleuch, Sir Robert Peel, the Earl of Aberdeen, Sir James Graham, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, Sir Henry Hardinge, Sir Edward Knatchbull, the Lord Steward, the Lord Chamberlain, the Master of the Horse, and the Groom of the Stole. At the council a form of prayer and thanksgiving for the safe delivery of the Queen, to be prepared by the Archbishop of Canterbury, was ordered in all churches and chapels throughout England and Wales, on Sunday next, the 30th inst.

FORM OF PRAYER.—The following is the form of prayer and thanksgiving to Almighty God for the safe delivery of the Queen, and the happy birth of a Princess, to be used at morning and evening service, after the general thanksgiving, in all churches and chapels in England and Wales, and in the town of Berwick-upon-Tweed, upon Sunday, the 30th day of April instant, or the Sunday after the respective ministers of such churches and chapels shall receive the same:—

"O merciful Lord and Heavenly Father, by whose gracious gift mankind is increased, we most humbly offer unto Thee our hearty thanks for Thy great goodness vouchsafed to Thy people, in delivering Thy servant our Sovereign Lady the Queen from the perils of childbirth, and giving her the blessing of a daughter. Continue, we beseech Thee, Thy fatherly care over her; support and comfort her in the hours of weakness, and day by day renew her strength. Preserve the infant Princess from whatever is hurtful either to body or soul, and adorn her as she advances in years with every Christian virtue. Regard with Thine especial favour our Queen and her Royal Consort, that they may long live together in the enjoyment of all earthly happiness, and may finally be made partakers of everlasting glory. Implant in the hearts of Thy people a deep sense of Thy manifold mercies, and give us grace to show forth our thankfulness by dutiful affection to our Sovereign, by brotherly love one towards another, and by constant obedience to Thy commandments; so that passing through this life in Thy faith and fear, we may in the life to come be received into Thy heavenly kingdom, through the merits and mediation of Thy Blessed Son Jesus Christ our Lord.—Amen."

Prince Albert returned to Buckingham Palace immediately after the council. His Royal Highness Prince George and the Hereditary Grand Duke of Mecklenburg Strelitz visited his Royal Highness Prince Albert in the afternoon. Their Royal Highnesses the Duchess of Cambridge and the Princesses Augusta and Mary arrived in town about four o'clock, in a carriage and four, from Kew. Their Royal Highnesses soon afterwards proceeded to Buckingham Palace, to learn the state of the Queen. Dr. Locock left the palace in the afternoon, but returned about five o'clock. Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent returned to Buckingham Palace shortly before seven o'clock in the evening, and afterwards went to Marlborough House, to visit her Majesty the Queen Dowager.

The following gratifying bulletin was issued on Wednesday:—"The Queen has passed an excellent night. Her Majesty and the infant Princess are going on favourably.—JAMES CLARK, M.D., CHARLES LOCOCK, M.D., ROBERT FERGUSON, M.D.—Buckingham Palace, April 26, 1843, nine A.M."

Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent arrived at Buckingham Palace early on Wednesday morning. Her Majesty the Queen Dowager, her Royal Highness the Duchess of Gloucester, and other members of the royal family, sent to the Palace to inquire after the Queen and the royal infant in the forenoon. His Royal Highness the Crown Prince of Wurtemberg, accompanied by Baron de Hugel, the Wurtemberg Minister, called at Buckingham Palace to learn the state of her Majesty and the Princess. The inquiries on the part of the nobility and gentry were even more numerous than on Tuesday.

A ROYAL MARRIAGE.—On the 17th inst. was celebrated in the chapel of the Palace of Leuchtenberg, at Munich, a marriage between Donna Isabella Duchess de Genja and Count Paschier de Trenberg. Donna Isabella is the legitimatised natural daughter of the late Emperor Don Pedro, and has been brought up by the Duchess of Braganza, and educated in one of the first schools of Munich.

The Archduke Charles Ferdinand, second son of the Archduke Charles, uncle to the Emperor of Austria, lies so ill of a phthisis, at Vienna, that his life is despaired of. The young prince is 25 years of age.

INFANT ORPHAN ASYLUM.—The annual meeting and half-yearly election of this institution, established in 1827 for the reception of bereaved and destitute children, under seven years of age, took place, on Monday, at the London Tavern, Bishopsgate-street; when, in the absence of the Right Hon. Lord Ashley, M.P., one of the presidents, Benjamin Bond Cabbell, Esq., consented to preside over the meeting, which was more than usually numerous. Twenty-five children, out of a list of seventy-four, were elected.

CONVERT FROM JUDAISM.—On Easter-day the interesting ceremony of the public baptism of a converted Israelite, Mr. Henry Friedberg, of Kalish, in Poland, was celebrated in the parish church of Bruegar, Somerset, agreeably to the injunction of the special commissary of the diocese, acting for the Lord Bishop of Bath and Wells. The holy rite of baptism was administered by the Rev. James Mules. The witnesses were the Rev. W. Batchelor, Mrs. James Mules, and Miss Lavinia Gore, of Clifton.

CURIOUS BREACH OF PROMISE CASE.—The action of Captain (——— against Miss H———, for breach of promise of marriage, under circumstances noticed by the Dublin papers some months since, has been settled by a compromise. The jury had been struck, and the lawyers were feed; but the gallant son of Mars has, we hear, accepted compensation in the shape of £650 for the wounds inflicted upon his heart by the obdurate fair one.

THE "LEAGUE" AT DRURY-LANE THEATRE.—The Drury-lane general committee assembled on Monday last, for the first time this year, under the presidency of their noble chairman, the Earl of Glengall, who is just returned to town, and immediately expressed their disapprobation of the theatre being used for any meetings whatever involving discussion upon political subjects, the same being in their judgment altogether foreign to the purposes, as well as derogatory to the character of a patent theatre. Finding, however, that their lessee, Mr. Macready, had already pledged his word to the leaders of the Anti-Corn-Law League for two nights more (from which agreement that gentleman did not feel himself at liberty to depart), the committee did not forbid him to use the house for such meetings, but they at the same time intimated to him that no such assemblies can ever for the future be allowed in Drury-lane theatre, in which resolution Mr. Macready, upon hearing the opinions and reasons of the committee, readily and fully acquiesced. It is said that other parties have already put in a claim for a similar purpose, to which the committee immediately signified a direct and decided refusal.

LYING IN STATE.

THE LATE DUKE OF SUSSEX.

THE LAST remains of the lamented Duke of Sussex have been consigned to the vault of death—not among the tombs of his royal ancestors and kindred, but isolated from all associations of regal pomp and grandeur—amid the rural quietude of Kensal-green. He is the first of a royal race who has chosen to lay his bones in one of the cemeteries of the people—as if he desired to have his memory identified with them even in death—and this circumstance had naturally enough tended to heighten the public sensation respecting all the details of the illustrious prince's interment, and to arouse in an exciteful degree that sort of melancholy curiosity which carries throngs of living to gaze upon the last solemn obsequies of the revered and distinguished dead. Those dismal ceremonies are now over. They took place on a sweet spring morning of serene beauty, which we would fain regard as typical of that repose of spirit which all good men look for after their last journey is made.

We have in this day's paper endeavoured to keep pace with the strong general interest excited in the public mind by the succeeding events of the death, lying in state, and funeral of the royal duke. We have procured the many illustrations which are displayed upon our leaves at lavish expense and under an amount of official kindness for which we tender our warmest thanks to Lord Delawarr and Sir William Martin, from whom emanated such considerate courtesy. The pages of the illustrious prince stood in costume to our artists previous to the ceremony; the library is described by Mr. Pettigrew, long his private librarian and familiar friend; and all the other drawings have been made under the sanction of authority which places their authenticity beyond dispute. We trust, therefore, that we shall have fully met the expectations of our readers; and although we must deeply regret the occasion which has called our exertions forth, we may yet assure them that every public event of equal importance will ever be as fully and industriously recorded by us, both in news and art. We will now not allow further comment to trench upon the circumstantial details of the one absorbing topic of the week.

THE COURT AND HAUT TON.

Prince Albert, the ladies and gentlemen of the royal suite, and the household, attended divine service on Sunday morning in the Chapel-royal, Buckingham Palace. The sermon was preached by Archdeacon Wilberforce, from Numbers, chap. xxii. v. 26. The service was read by the Rev. Mr. Dune.

On Monday morning the usual bulletin was issued, containing the gratifying intelligence of her Majesty's uninterrupted convalescence; and during the week her health was so improved, that it was considered unnecessary to issue any further bulletins after Tuesday.

The inquiries at the Palace on the part of the diplomatic corps and of the nobility and gentry, after the state of the Queen and the royal infant, continued during the week to be most numerous.

The Duke of Wellington has issued cards for a grand dinner on Wednesday next, to the directors of the Concerts of Ancient Music, his Grace being director for the evening.

ROYAL ACADEMY OF MUSIC GRAND FANCY DRESS BALL.—Her Majesty has been pleased to command that this great event of the fashionable season shall take place on Friday, the 9th of June. The ladies patronesses comprise every person distinguished in royalty, rank, and fashion, and it is confidently anticipated that the ball this year will be of unprecedented splendour.

DEPARTURE OF THE COURT FOR CLAREMONT.—Should her Majesty's health and strength continue to improve as rapidly as may be hoped, the Queen and her illustrious consort, accompanied by their Royal Highnesses the Prince of Wales, the Princess Royal, and the newly-born Princess, will leave Buckingham Palace for Claremont, about the 20th instant. The stay of the Court at Claremont will be prolonged until within a few days of the period of the Ascot races, which will commence on Tuesday, the 13th of next month. Her Majesty is expected to proceed to Windsor (and to remain at the Castle until the departure of the Court to Ireland), about the 10th proximo. No period has yet been fixed for her Majesty's visit to Dublin; but it is not expected that the Sovereign will leave England until the latter end of July, or the commencement of August. Indeed, it is not anticipated that the magnificent and gorgeous fittings in the interior of the Royal Victoria and Albert yacht will be completed much before that period.

We regret to have to announce the death of Lady William Bentinck, which took place in Paris, on Monday last, after a long and protracted illness. Her ladyship had the honour for many years of being the personal friend of her Majesty the Queen of the French, and of her Royal Highness Madame Adelaide. Her memory will be much regretted by a numerous circle of friends, and deeply felt by the poor, towards whom her benevolence and charity were ever inexhaustible.

CHINA.—The news from China is to March 23. It is favourable. No fact of any importance had occurred up to that date.

COUNTRY NEWS.

HEREFORDSHIRE.—INCENDIARISM.—The village of Madley, about six miles from Hereford, continues to be the scene of a succession of diabolical outrages which are a disgrace to any country or people. Some miscreants have conceived the horrible plan of setting fire to stacks and outhouses belonging to various farmers in the parish, and during the present month no less than four fires, the fiendish acts of incendiaries, have occurred. On Sunday night last, or rather about one o'clock on Tuesday morning, a barn or outhouse was discovered to have been fired, and, although every effort was made by the villagers to check the devastation, the whole was burned to the ground. The secrecy with which these nefarious schemes are planned and executed is astonishing, and about as inexplicable as the lawless conduct of "Rebecca and her daughters" in Wales. Large rewards, varying from £50 to £100 to £200, have been offered for the detection of the marauders, but as yet without producing the desired effect.

WILTSHIRE.—HORRIBLE OCCURRENCE.—A labouring man, named Isaac Litten, belonging to the parish of Ramsey, with his wife and four children, having been ejected from their cottage, were sheltering, on the night of Friday, the 21st ult., in a miserable hut which they had constructed of bundles and straw, covered with a piece of cotton patchwork, in Golder's Rose lane, in the above parish, when, about half past ten o'clock, the fire not being properly extinguished, the place ignited. Litten had left his wretched asylum, leaving three of his children, aged respectively five, seven, and ten years, in the flames, without making any attempt to rescue them. Before any assistance arrived the poor children were burnt to death. On examining the ground where the hut had stood some blood was discovered. This excited suspicion, and on examination of the bodies the skull of one of them was found to be fractured. This added to the suspicious nature of the circumstances, and the Litten was immediately apprehended. About nine months ago a child belonging to the same person was found drowned in a ditch near the same place; suspicion at that time fell on the unfortunate man, very fearful sensation, prevailed in the neighbourhood, and a coroner's inquest was held on Tuesday week. The jury were sworn in a cottage adjoining the lane, and, after making a very minute examination of the bodies and of the spot where they were found, adjourned to Mr. Pinniger's, of Seven Bridges farm, to take evidence. The father and mother of the children were both examined, but the deepest indifference with which the father made his statement, combined with the brutal appearance of the man, caused a general feeling of horror in the jury-room.—A man, named Wheeler, deposed to having heard Litten threaten to set fire to the hurdles in consequence of the police warning him to leave the lane.—After a very protracted deliberation, the jury returned a verdict—"That Isaac Litten wilfully set his tent or camp on fire, thereby causing the death of his three children."—The verdict was received with great satisfaction by the surrounding inhabitants.

SALISBURY.—The nomination of a candidate to serve in parliament for this borough, in the room of Mr. Brodie, who has accepted the Chiltern Hundreds, took place on Wednesday last, when the Hon. E. P. Bouverie, liberal candidate, was proposed by Dr. Fowler, seconded by Mr. Saguy, and Mr. Hussey, the Conservative, was proposed by Mr. Jacob, seconded by Mr. Fry. The rival candidates having addressed the electors the mayor declared a show of hands, which he declared to be in favour of Mr. Bouverie. A poll was demanded, which was appointed to take place at eight o'clock next morning.

SALFORD.—DESPERATE OUTRAGE.—On Wednesday night last, about eleven o'clock, a number of persons, with fire-arms, sledge-hammers, and other weapons, broke down the gates, and forcibly entered the premises of the crofts of Messrs. George Clarke Pendling and Co., of Regent's-road, Salford, and wilfully and maliciously destroyed the brick tables and kilns thereon; and then broke into a building and destroyed all the moulds, and trampled upon and destroyed about 50,000 bricks. Several of the same persons also repeatedly fired at the watchmen employed to protect the said brick crofts. A reward of £50 is offered for their detection.

ROCKPORT.—DESTRUCTIVE FIRE.—About a quarter past 8 on Monday morning a fire, which resulted in the destruction of a considerable amount of property, originated in the cotton-mill of Mr. Thomas Fearnley, cotton-spinner and calico-manufacturer, of the Weir-mills, Chesterzare, Stockport.

SUNDERLAND.—DREADFUL EXPLOSION BEFORE DAWN.—Fire.—An explosion took place in this colliery, situated in the coal district between Durham and Sunderland, by which three lives have been unfortunately sacrificed, and thirteen persons injured. The accident is stated to have arisen from one of the trap-doors having been carelessly left open.

The colour is gaining ground that an alteration is to take place in the present uniform of the Navy.

SHIPPING INTELLIGENCE.

PENZANCE, April 30.—The Ann Elizabeth, from Falmouth to Wales, has put in here leaky and in distress, &c., having been in contact with the Catherine, from Looe, in Falmouth, off the Longships last night, where the latter foundered, crew saved. The Hector, Gallia, from Rotterdam to Liverpool, has been floated into the pier, nearly all her cargo saved.

JOHN'S, N.B.—By a letter from Madeira, bearing date the 16th ult., we learn that the brigantine BARBARA ANN, of New Brunswick, 135 tons register, laden with fire bricks and coke, from Port Talbot and bound to Alexandria, went down on the Bay of Biscay, in lat. N. 48 17, long. 9 11, W., after having experienced the most severe gales and continued bad weather, all hands being saved. The state of the fallen vessel came on shore in Dingle-Bay on the 11th ult.

LAW INTELLIGENCE.

POLICE.

BOW-STREET.—Elizabeth Roberts, a female in the service of the Hon. W. E. Gladstone, was committed from this office by Mr. Twyford, charged with stealing two dwt. and ten grains and a locket from the house of her master. George Johnson, one of the poor-rate collectors for St. Leonard's Shoreditch, who was committed for three months to the House of Correction, for embezzling nearly £200 which he had collected on behalf of the parish, had suddenly expired that morning in the prison. In consequence of his age, nearly 70 years, the grave nor of the prison had, out of kindness, placed him in the convalescent ward, where he appeared to be very comfortable, and told one of the gaolers tha t he had felt better in health since he had been in the gaol than he had for a number of years before. On Tuesday night he complained of feeling unwell, and never during the night, and was a corpse in the morning. He was a man very much respected among the parishioners, and his death has occasioned the greatest regret and sympathy, as a notion very generally prevails that little else than negligence occasioned the defalcation in his account s.

EXTENSIVE ROBBERY OF WATCHES, PLATE, &c.—On Tuesday morning, between the hours of four and five o'clock, as police-constable Peters, 353 K, was going his rounds, he obs served that the shutters of the shop-window of Mr. Middleton, watchmaker and jeweller, Aldour-terrace, Commercial-road, East, were somewhat displaced, and, upon a more minute inspection, he found that the bar which was placed across the whole length had been bulged out in the centre by placing stones behind it, so that the centre shutter could be displaced. He instantly knocked at the door, and upon gaining admittance into the shop, discovered that some expert thieves had, after removing the shutter, cut away a square of glass, and carried off a number of watches, chains, and, in fact, every article of property within their reach, with which they got clear away. The value of the property stolen is said to be from £300 to £5 0.

ACCIDENTS AND OFFENCES.

SUDDEN DEATH.—On Sunday the 16 th ult., the ordinance of the Lord's Supper was being dispensed in the Unit ed Secession Church, Old Meldrum, by Mr. Alexander Wilson, one of the elde rs, and just brought into the church a portion of the sacramental elements, as t hem down, and was in the act of arranging the communion tabl e, when he suddenly, and without any premonition, fell, and was dead before he struck the floor, and instantly expired.

Last week an unfortunate man named Wingrove, a stone-sawyer, was killed at the new Royal Exchange by the fal ling of a block of stone from the hand of a fellow workman, employed at a he ight of fifty feet above him.

AWFUL EXPLOSION AT A FIREWORK MAN UFACTORY.—Another of those alarming accidents which so frequently occ ur in buildings of the above description took place on Monday afternoon, shortly after five o'clock, in Regent-street, Lambeth-walk, on the premises occupied by Mr. Ralph Fenwick, firework manufacturer and pyrotechnical artist to the Queen; by which one poor man, named James Field, sustained such frightful injuries, as to render his death a matter of certainty, and t wo others, the one a son of Mr. Fenwick, and the other a workman in his employ, were dreadfully burnt in various parts of their bodies. The origin of the accident is thus explained by young Fenwick:—He states that he was engaged in charging a fuses in the charging-room, when by some accident which he is totally unable to account for, the powder was set in the lamp, immediately there it down on the floor and ran out towards the workshop, but before he could make his escape the whole apartment was on fire, and the sp arks from some of the fuses communicating with the workshop, in less than a minute the whole building was blown into the air. The southern wall fell in a body to the ground, but the other portions of the building were scattered in every direction, covering the ground for the distance of many houses. A large portion of the materials fell upon the roof of the sto chouse, breaking through the tiles, and rendering the salvage of that portion of the premises perfectly miraculous. The scene of the explosion is a establishment, with Mr. Brad wood and Mr. Henderson, and that of the West of England office, were on the spot a very short time after the explosion took place, but no surgeon can be had there, although it is generally known that very little water was required to extinguish the burning embers. Mr. Fenwick was at Astley's Theatre when the accident occurred, and was summoned to witness the dreadful scene. He is one of the oldest pyrotechnical artists in London, and his establishment is one of the largest in the kingdom. The explosion caused a state of the greatest excitement during the whole evening, and a crowds of persons congregated near the spot. Mr. Fenwick's premises are in the immediate neighbourhood of the new Victoria Theatre, and the late Mr. D'Ernst, who, it will be remembered, lost his life with three others by the occurrence of a similar calamity about twelve months since.

COURT OF ALDERMEN.—On Tuesday a court was held for the dispatch of business. Alderman Copeland proposed Mr. Stevens, son of deputy Stevens, of Bishopsgate Ward, as a candidate for the vacancy in the Farringdon-ward-without, one of the western district, now vacant by the death of the late Mr. Montague. Alderman Lucas, whose hearty appearance in this court after the report of his sudden departure from this world was first received in every quarter with loud applause, seconded the nomination of Mr. Stevens, and described him as a gentleman in every respect worthy to fill the office to the satisfaction of the corporation. There was but one other candidate, but he retired, and it was found that the interest exerted by Mr. Stevens was overwhelming. Mr. Stevens was then unanimously elected.

SURREY ZOOLOGICAL GARDENS.—The collection at this establishment received a rich addition on Thursday last, by the arrival of five giraffes, three antelopes, several jerboas, monkeys, and other animals, which have been brought from Egypt by the last Oriental steamer, and have since been receiving their strength at Southampton after their long confinement on board. The arrival of these extraordinary denizens of Africa in the yard of the railway station, and subsequent journey to the gardens, created much interest. They are accompanied by two attendants from Dongola, who have been with them from their first capture.

LAST OBSEQUIES OF THE DUKE OF SUSSEX.

THE LYING IN STATE.

The remains of his late Royal Highness the Duke of Sussex lay in state, on Wednesday, at Kensington Palace.

That the occasion had excited to the utmost degree the attention of the public was shown by the immense influx of visitors from all parts of the metropolis and the neighbourhood. Those who remembered the difficulty and danger attending such scenes on former occasions thought to avoid them by attending at a very early hour; and in fact, before the first stroke before the great mass of visitors should arrive. Accordingly, as early as four o'clock in the morning, notwithstanding that there was every appearance of unfavourable weather, a considerably-dressed persons had assembled in Kensington, at the entrance to the palace, awaiting patiently the opening of the gates, although that was not announced to take place until nearly ten o'clock. Soon after eight o'clock a vast number had assembled; but, as the hour of opening drew near, thousands of persons were congregated on the spot, or approaching towards it from different points. Vehicles of all kinds, from the private carriage down to the hack cab, arrived in great numbers with visitors, and were afterwards drawn up in long lines on every available spot in the near neighbourhood of the palace. In consequence of the excellence of the police-arrangements, and the general disposition of the public to observe order, there was no confusion or irregularity, and not a single accident occurred.

Ten o'clock was the hour at which the public generally were to be admitted, and all the necessary arrangements of the police were made and completed long before. Those arrangements will be found detailed below.

The public were admitted at the carriage entrance to the palace from Kensington. Here a barrier was placed, on the right hand side of which an avenue had been made running parallel to the wall that encloses the gardens on that side. This avenue was divided from the carriage road by a substantial wooden barrier, and it was of a width to allow about five persons to pass abreast. At regular intervals between the great entrance gate and the entrance to what is called the "Clock-court" of the palace, other barriers, at each of which a policeman was stationed. These barriers were made to slide in grooves, and rest in the brick wall on the opposite side, so that the stream of visitors could be checked at the expiration of every five minutes or so, as a sufficient number were admitted to the state apartments beyond. As soon as about 50 persons had passed through those apartments and obtained egress at the other side of the palace, on the broad gravel walk at the south-west end of Kensington Gardens, the signal was given at the nearest barrier, and the different barriers along the avenue having been removed, an equal number of persons were admitted at the entrance. Thus, without any confusion, a column of visitors was constantly moving into the apartments where the body of his Royal Highness lay, though of course at a very slow pace.

Entering at the great gate at the Kensington end of this avenue, where an immense crowd of persons were posted waiting for their turn to go in, you passed up towards the palace. The distance appears to be not more than 200 yards; yet rather more than an hour and a half was occupied in the slow progression from the one end to the other, such was the density of the crowd. Arriving at what is called the Clock-court, at which point the carriage-entrance to the palace is situated, you turn to the left, by leading to the staircase and entrance to the state apartments. At this point the first [illegible] was placed, and the arrangements will be as follow:—

At the foot of the grand staircase, and at the end of the corridor, were stationed three of the domestics of his late Royal Highness, dressed in the royal livery of crimson, and blazing with gold lace. They stood immediately in front of the entrance from the corridor, and pointed the way upwards by a staircase or gallery mounting round to the right. The interior of the grand hall in which these domestics stood was hung with black cloth in the form of a pall, and festooned at the top. Coming out of the broad daylight of the outer court into the comparative gloom of this interior, the effect was very striking, the bright uniforms of the servants shining brilliantly, while the rest of the apartment was covered with a rich deep crimson reflected through coloured blinds on the windows overhead. The black pall assumed a kind of purple hue, and over the rest of the room there was a kind of subdued light that prepared the eye for what would otherwise have been a sudden contrast between the glare of daylight outside and the deeper gloom of the funereal chambers. The long column of visitors, their mourning attire contrasting strongly with the rich dresses of these domestics, passed round to the right, and up the staircase, at the top of which is a short gallery. At this spot, facing you as you come up the staircase, and thrown into shade by the black hangings of cloth that obstructed the light, stood M'Kay, his late Royal Highness's piper. This man is of almost gigantic height and Hercu lean proportions, and, dressed as he was in the most brilliant ornamental dress of the country, with a noble black plume in his bonnet, his figure was very imposing, and, if the expression may be allowed on such an occasion, picturesque. For so faithful and attached an attendant on the Prince a better station could not have been found, and, in fact, at the very entrance of the apartment where his deceased master lay.

Leaving the short gallery at the top of the staircase, visitors passed into the anti-room to that in which the body of his late Royal Highness lay in state. This room was entirely hung with black cloth, fluted up the sides and on the top. The light of day was wholly excluded, but around the room, at intervals, of two or three yards, were massive silver sconces, each bearing two wax tapers. The artificial light struggled ineffectually with the darkness of the chamber, and the effect of the whole as you passed through it was solemn and grand in the extreme.

At the entrance to the inner chamber, called on court occasions the "Presence-chamber," stood on either side of the doorway two favourite domestics of the late Duke. On the right was Hunter, the Hanoverian jager of his Royal Highness, and on the left another domestic, who was known as his Burmese page.

From this point you spout the first view of the coffin was obtained. Like the anti room, this chamber was also hung with black cloth fluted. Round the room, at equal distances of about two yards, were fixed upon the cloth 14 emblazoned escutcheons of the arms of his Royal Highness, and in front of each two wax tapers. They failed, however, to spread more than a very dim light round the chamber, but the absence of strong light of course added to the solemnity of the scene. Fronting the entrance and raised a few feet from the floor was the coffin, covered with a pall of black velvet with white silk facings. Upon the coffin was placed his Royal Highness's coronet, and over it upon the wall was a large escutcheon with her Majesty's arms emblazoned upon it. On either side of the coffin were three massive silver candlesticks with enormous wax candles, by the light of which were seen the chief mourners, who sat in a raised chair at the head of the coffin, and the officers of state, who stood around. On the right of the coffin stood Sir Augustus Clifford, as Usher of the Black Rod, and Mr. Pulman, in a magnificent tabard, as Richmond Herald. On the left were two other officers, whose names required their presence on the occasion.

The arrangements of this room were in excellent taste. There was all that could appeal to the imagination of the spectator attach to the scene in solemnity befitting the occasion, without the slightest approach to theatrical display. The persons whose duty it was to direct the proceedings of the visitors performed their offices noiselessly and effectively, and there was nothing whatever calculated to disturb the feelings called up by the so near presence of the dead.

A raised passage, winding round a pillar to the right of the entrance way, conducted from the public out of the Presence Chamber into the room adjoining, called the Queen's Dining-room. This room was also hung with black cloth, as was the adjoining room—the Queen's Gallery. Through a window in this room a temporary way had been made for the egress of the visitors who passed down a wooden staircase erected for the purpose upon the gravel walk beneath, which leads into the broad walk of Kensington Gardens.

The general arrangements for the prevention of confusion were deserving of great praise. Although so many thousands of persons were admitted there was not the slightest interruption or decorum, which ought to prevail on such an occasion. Though, of course, the chief object was to prevent disturbance and confusion, all the provisions for that purpose appeared to have the light of facilities to the convenience than obstructions and causes of irritation, as is too often the case. The police performed their duty quietly and unobtrusively, and the visitors behaved with the utmost decency and consciousness of the solemnity. Those who remember the crushing and crowding that occurred on the occasion of a similar ceremony on the death of the Duke of York will be surprised at this; but the regularity and decorum that prevailed were the subject of general admiration.

The gates at the end of the avenue leading into Kensington were closed at four o'clock. During the whole of the day a stream of people had moved without intermission from ten o'clock until a quarter past six, when all who had got into the avenue before the gates were closed at half past four had passed through. The number of persons who were present during the day is estimated at upwards of 25,000. Visitors passed three abreast through the state apartments. From the time of entering the gates at the end of the avenue it took two hours to pass through the palace and out again to Kensington gardens.

THE FUNERAL.

Thursday being the day appointed for the interment of the remains of his Royal Highness the Duke of Sussex, thousands of persons were seen wending their way through the City, towards Kensington even at the early hour of six o'clock in the morning, in order to be time to witness the funeral procession as it passed from Kensington Palace on its way to the cemetery at Kensal-green.

The atmosphere, which was occasionally cloudy and gave a grave and serious aspect to the face of nature, was ushered in by the solemn pealings of the bells of the various City churches, and gave "note" of the "preparations" which were going forward in another portion of the metropolis, through the medium of which the last sad tribute of respect was about to be paid to one whose social and personal attributes had endeared him to a large and distinguished circle of friends, and gave to him a character with the people generally that will not soon be forgotten.

All the principal warehouses in the City were completely closed, as were also many of the shops. Indeed, such was the state of the City down to 12 o'clock, deprived as it was up to that hour of much of its busy and bustling population, to think of business was out of the question, for the whole of the human family that usually crowded and jostled each other in their daily avocations between Temple-bar and the Bank were not to be seen within those limits. The City, consequently, wore a solemn and quiet appearance that accorded well with the occasion. The shipping in the river, too, presented a solemn appearance of mourning, the yards were only half-mast high, and the churches along the shore, as far as the eye could reach displayed the same token of respect and loyalty. The same feeling that was manifested in the City seemed to pervade the metropolis generally, for the shops in the [illegible] from the shops generally were closed, and the [illegible] the West End had their [illegible] closing, as in external show could do it, respect and regard for the illustrious prince now no more. The great body of the public that we noticed on their way to Kensington were, generally speaking, dressed in accordance with the occasion, which was another proof of the general feeling of the public respecting his late Royal Highness. We observed, too, in compliment to the occasion, that many of the places of public amusement were closed during the day. About 11 o'clock a troop of Light Horse that had been stationed in the neighbourhood of Kensall-green returned to Knightsbridge Barracks, and shortly after cabs and vehicles of every description, crowded with well dressed persons, were seen returning from the great point of interest, where thousands had been collected.

KENSINGTON.

At a late hour on Wednesday night all the arrangements for the melancholy ceremonial of the funeral procession of his late Royal Highness the Duke of Sussex were completed, and notice was forwarded to the different members of Royal Family, the officers of state, and personal friends of the lamented duke, as to the order to be observed in the progress of the funeral train from Kensington Palace to the Cemetery at Kensall-green.

As early as six o'clock on Thursday morning the different roads leading to the town of Kensington were thronged with persons anxious to obtain a sight of the solemn and imposing ceremony Barriers were, in the course of the previous day, erected along the pathway, from the entrance gates of the palace to the principal door, to prevent any pressure from the crowd. The whole of the A division of police were on duty from an early hour at the palace, and the T and V divisions were stationed at short intervals along High-street, Church-street, Church-lane, &c., on the route towards the cemetery. The number of policemen employed on the occasion was upwards of 2000, and such were the admirable arrangements made that not the slightest inconvenience or obstruction occurred during the entire of the proceedings.

In the town of Kensington all the shops were closed, and from many of the houses mourning flags and banners were displayed. From the palace-gate to the extremity of the town a line of seats was erected, and the windows and house-tops were filled with spectators, the greater portion of whom were of the more respectable class, and were attired in deep mourning. During the morning the bell of Kensington Church, on which the royal standard was hoisted half staff high, was tolled at intervals.

The seats and scaffolding in front of the houses were in many cases hung with black cloth; and the whole of the town presented a sombre and melancholy appearance, strongly evincing the deep sympathy and respect entertained for the late duke by all classes of the inhabitants, to whom he had been endeared by his affable demeanour and kind and social qualities.

Shortly after seven o'clock the carriages of the nobility and friends of the illustrious duke began to arrive at the palace, where they were received by the marshalmen and royal footmen in their state liveries, over which they wore black crape sashes and hatbands. Among the earliest arrivals was his Grace the Duke of Wellington, who declined alighting from his carriage, and directed it to be drawn up on one side of the principal entrance, where it remained until the procession began to move, when it dropped into the line immediately after the royal carriages.

The Earl of Delaware and Lord Ernest Bruce, the Lord and Vice Chamberlain, and Garter King at Arms, assisted by Mr. Superintendent May, of the A division, were early in attendance, and directed all the arrangements of the ceremonial.

At half-past seven his Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge, chief mourner, attended by Colonel Keats and Baron Knesebeck, arrived, and was followed shortly afterwards by the Marquis of Lansdowne and the Marquis of Breadalbane, wearing long mourning cloaks. Immediately afterwards a detachment of the Royal Horse Guards, under the command of Captain Pitt, took up their station on either side of the palace, and a company of the Foot Guards was stationed directly in front of the entrance, on the opposite side of the carriage-way. All the officers wore crape on their arms, and the standards, drums, and musical instruments of the band were also enveloped in crape.

At a few minutes before eight o'clock the solemn procession began to move from the palace. It was headed by a detachment of the Royal Horse Guards, and a military band playing the Dead March in "Saul."

Immediately afterwards followed—

A Mourning Coach, drawn by four horses, in which were the Pages of his late Royal Highness.

A Mourning Coach, drawn by four horses, in which were the Pages of his late Royal Highness.

A Mourning Coach, drawn by six horses, in which were the Medical Attendants of his late Royal Highness.

drew up in front of the palace, and the coffin, containing the remains of his Royal Highness, was carried down the principal staircase on the shoulders of twelve of the undertaker's assistants, and deposited therein. On its appearance the immense crowd of spectators uncovered, the Guards presented arms and lowered their standards.

After the hearse followed a mourning carriage, in which was Sir Augustus D'Este; and then followed the private carriages of the nobility, among whom we observed the Earl of Arran, the Earl of Shrewsbury, the Marquis of Clanricarde, Earl of Rosebery, Lord Dudley Stewart, the Earl of Clarendon, the Earl of Yarborough, the Earl of Zetland, Mr. Milbanke, Lord J. Russell, Lord Howick, Lord Palmerston, Lord Morpeth, Lord Hallibarton, Lord F. Gordon, Lord Augustus Loftus, Viscount Duncannon, Lord Nugent, Lord Cottenham, Lord Dunmore, Captain Murray, Mr. W. The procession extended for nearly a mile in length, and the last of the carriages had left the palace a few minutes after nine o'clock

The only accident that occurred during the setting down and taking up of so large a number of carriages in the limited space in front of the palace was the breaking down of a private carriage, in turning round, after having set down at the entrance of the palace; the fore-wheels separated from the body, and the vehicle came down with a sudden crash, but fortunately no person sustained any injury. It was calculated that between 25,000 and 30,000 persons were assembled in Kensington and in the immediate neighbourhood.

PROGRESS OF THE PROCESSION FROM KENSINGTON PALACE TO THE CEMETERY.

The starting of the procession from the palace, and its progress down the palace avenue, before it could reach the high road in Kensington, was necessarily witnessed by comparatively few, when considered in proportion to those who gained a view of the mournful and impressive cortège when it had once gained the open road, and slowly wended its way to the cemetery. When once it had entered the palace avenue, and commenced its route along the High-street, thus passing through the very centre of Kensington, thousands upon thousands of eager and curious spectators beheld the sad, yet gorgeous spectacle.

Along the town, as the procession moved slowly through the High-street, the utmost interest and curiosity were exhibited by the crowds assembled in all parts,—in the roads, on the pathways, and in as well as on the houses. Every window seemed to have as many spectators stationed at it as could by any possibility gain a view of the mournful cavalcade. Scaffoldings were also erected in many places before the shops, &c., to accommodate spectators. In many instances along the line the windows were completely removed, so as to afford the inmates of the houses better opportunity of seeing the procession. The effect produced by this was very remarkable, as the houses almost looked as if they had been gutted by fire.

The cortège having proceeded through the High-street, Kensington, to the old church, turned up Church-street and passed along Church-lane; each side of the road, all the way, being lined with a dense crowd of spectators. All, however, was most quiet and orderly, owing to the excellent arrangements of the police, who, being stationed all along the route, about three or four yards apart, maintained the most perfect discipline and order among the people.

When the procession had reached the Swan, it turned into the Uxbridge road. Here it stayed a short time (as was the case, also, at different parts of the route), while the band, in their state dresses, and with the drums muffled, performed the Dead March in "Saul." In fact, the martial and impressive music was continued throughout the greater portion of the distance, and added most materially to the effect of the whole scene.

The procession was now passing the walls of Kensington Gardens, and the top of those walls was covered with persons anxious to gain a view of the cavalcade as it passed. It made another halt of a few minutes before turning from the Uxbridge-road, into the Queen's-road, leading to Westbourne. The appearance of this part of the line was very extraordinary. Not only were hundreds seated on the walls of Kensington-gardens, and stationed in front of the gate leading to them, but numbers of omnibuses and other vehicles were drawn up by the side of the road, and were filled inside and out, and their roofs completely covered with spectators. In many parts of the line not only was there every accommodation for persons to view the procession from the erections prepared for that purpose, but placards announced, in many places, that "stands for carriages" might be procured by those ready to pay for the convenience. Many had taken advantage of this, and, in several parts of the line of road, private carriages, pleasure-vans, &c., were stationed, their horses being removed, and the conveyances themselves being filled with persons eagerly watching the approach and progress of the procession.

Early in the day the sky was cloudy, and threatened rain. Indeed, a slight rain fell shortly before seven; but towards ten, and as the funeral approached its destination, the weather completely changed, and became very bright, the sun shining out, and removing a little of the gloom that necessarily arose from the nature and occasion of the mournful procession. On the vacant ground immediately beyond Queen's-terrace a very extensive scaffolding had been erected, and was filled with numerous spectators. Such was not the case with all the seats and stations prepared, for some of them (so very great and superabundant had been the speculations) were almost entirely unoccupied.

The procession proceeded along the Queen's-road (or Black Lion-lane, as it was formerly called) for some distance, and passed over the Great Western Railway, by the bridge at Westbourne green, near the mansion occupied by the late Lord Hill. It then entered the Harrow-road, about a mile from its commencement at Paddington. At the turning into this road great crowds were assembled, and some difficulty was experienced in passing by those who did not form an actual portion of the procession itself. None were permitted to pass but those who had orders from the authorities. We may here remark that the arrangements of the police were excellent, and most effectual in keeping persons out of the road and the way of the line of carriages. They also prevented the crowds accompanying the procession from accumulating, by stopping at the different barriers along the route all who were not privileged to pass along the whole distance. Thus the spectators assembled in each district were able, with ease and comparative comfort, to obtain a good view of the procession, while the progress of the cavalcade was not liable to be impeded by the masses that would otherwise have been soon accumulated on all sides of it.

When the procession reached the Paddington Canal-bridge the sight was very striking. The sides of the canal were densely crowded, as far as the eye could reach, and the surface of the canal itself near the spot was completely covered with barges, occupied by throngs of spectators, who had awaited the arrival of the funeral cortège. A little further on, the grounds of the newly-built Lock Hospital contained a great number of private carriages, filled with persons, who occupied the inside and outside seats, as well as the roofs of the different vehicles. Still further on a very extensive scaffolding was erected; that was likewise well filled.

The procession had now reached the open country; but, still, on the paths on each side of the road, and the adjoining fields, were assembled countless multitudes. Upon many of the scaffoldings, erected in this part of the line, notices were affixed (in order to tempt customers for the seats, and to counteract any fears the cautious might feel as to the safety or prudence of trusting themselves off terra firma) that the platforms had been "approved by the Surveyor of Woods and Forests." Such a notification was certainly very necessary (though we doubt if it were sufficient) to remove doubts that involuntarily arose respecting the security of some of these erections, that looked rather frail and unsteady.

Further along the route, the canal approaches the high road; and, at this point, the loaded canal boats re-appeared, their very numerous passengers thereby gaining another view of the procession as it passed slowly on its way and approached the second bridge. The canal at this part runs some way parallel with the road, and thus the boats, for some distance, kept alongside the cavalcade.

The procession now had reached Kensall-green, where the entrance to the cemetery was kept clear and guarded by a large body of the metropolitan police, so that no obstruction should be offered to the cavalcade in its progress through the gates.

It was arranged, as Prince Albert was to be accompanied by a military escort from Buckingham Palace, that his Royal Highness should proceed by another route, the road leading to the bridge by the south-east wall of the cemetery, and as it was anticipated that the assembled crowd on the bridge would render the approach inconvenient, a wooden temporary platform of planks was proposed, that he might enter by the water gate, and join the procession as it entered the chapel. His Royal Highness left town escorted by a party of the Life Guards (Reds), and arrived at the cemetery some time before the cortège reached its destination.

KENSALL-GREEN CEMETERY.

At six o'clock carriages began to arrive in rapid succession, and, as soon as the gates leading to the cemetery were open, there was a grand rush made by those who had obtained tickets of admission from the directors of the company.

From six o'clock to nine o'clock, at which time the gates were closed, there was a continual arrival of carriages. No person, however, was admitted unless attired in deep mourning.

It was intended at first to close the gates of the cemetery exactly at eight o'clock, and orders were given to that effect, but they were kept open some time longer, and a great number of individuals admitted. The arrangements of the police, under Superintendent May, were excellent: there was not the least confusion in obtaining entrance at the gates or within the grounds of the cemetery.

In front of the chapel and catacombs two large areas were railed off for the accommodation of the public, and strong barriers erected to prevent pressure. Nearly 2500 of the metropolitan police were engaged on the present melancholy occasion, a great number of whom were stationed within the walls of the cemetery. There has never, on any former occasion, been so many of the police force withdrawn from their regular duty on one day, except on the coronation of her present Majesty.

The directors of the Cemetery Company issued 6000 tickets of admission within the walls, nearly all of which were made available by the possessors long before the funeral cortège arrived.

By the courtesy of the directors at an early hour we were allowed to take a view of the preparations that had been made, in the chapel and catacombs, for the impressive ceremony about to take place. The walls of the chapel, the reading-desk, chairs, forms, &c., were entirely covered with black cloth.

At the back of the reading-desk was an emblazoned escutcheon of the royal arms.

The vault in which the remains of his late Royal Highness are deposited, until a suitable mausoleum can be erected, is situated about the middle of the catacombs, on the right of the chapel. It is a plain vault, containing two wooden trestels, on which the coffin of his Royal Highness has been deposited. Immediately on the conclusion of the ceremony masons were employed to build a strong brick wall in front, closing in the remains of his late Royal Highness.

Col. Tynte, one of the executors of his late Royal Highness, was early in attendance, and minutely inspected all the arrangements made by the directors, and expressed his satisfaction at what had been done.

The whole interior of the chapel, as before stated, was hung with black cloth, and on each side of the reading-desk chairs placed for the chief mourner, his Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge, his Royal Highness Prince Albert, his Royal Highness Prince George of Cambridge, and his Serene Highness the Prince of Mecklenburg Strelitz.

Shortly after nine o'clock a detachment of the First Regiment of Grenadier Guards, under the command of Colonel Stanhope, arrived, and acted as a guard of honour.

The Earl Delaware, Lord Chamberlain; the Earl of Liverpool, Lord Steward; the Earl of Jersey, Master of the Horse; the Bishop of Norwich; Sir William Martins, Garter King at Arms, and several of the officers of the Heralds' College, were in attendance, and gave the necessary directions as to the arrangements.

The Cabinet Ministers arrived before 10 o'clock in the following order: Sir Robert Peel, First Lord of the Treasury, the Lord Chancellor, the Duke of Buccleuch, Lord Stanley, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, Sir J. Graham, Lord Wharncliffe, Sir Edward Knatchbull, Lord Aberdeen, Lord Fitzgerald, Sir Henry Hardinge, the Earl of Ripon, and the Earl of Haddington.

The Duke of Wellington was the only member of the Cabinet who joined in the procession. The other Ministers met it at the chapel.

All the Ministers and great Officers of State were attired in the Windsor uniform, with the silk scarf, except Sir Henry Hardinge, who wore a military dress.

Amongst the first of the nobility who arrived we noticed the Duke of Bedford, the Duke of Devonshire, the Duke of Sutherland, and the Earl of Arran, who supported the pall.

The steps leading to the chapel were covered with black cloth. At half-past nine o'clock the chapel bell began to toll, announcing that the procession had left the palace.

His Royal Highness Prince Albert, accompanied by his Royal Highness Prince George of Cambridge, the Marquis of Exeter, Colonel Wylde, and other members of his Royal Highness's suite, arrived shortly before ten o'clock. The directors of the Cemetery Company conducted their Royal Highnesses into a waiting-room, which had been temporarily erected on the right wing of the chapel for the accommodation of the royal family and their attendants. On the left wing was another temporary room, erected for the Cabinet Ministers and all those taking part in the funeral ceremony.

Exactly at half-past ten o'clock the funeral cortège entered the gates of the cemetery.

Upon arrival at the chapel, the cavalry formed on either side of the portico. At the entrance to the chapel the procession moved in the following order :—

Upon entering the chapel the body was placed on a platform, and the coronet and cushion laid upon the coffin.

The chief mourner sat at the head of the corpse, the supporters standing on each side.

The Princes of the Royal Family, with the Hereditary Grand Duke of Mecklenburg Strelitz, sat near the chief mourner.

The Lord Chamberlain of her Majesty's Household took his place at the feet of the corpse.

The supporters of the pall stood on each side of the body.

The train-bearers stood behind the Princes of the Royal Family, and also the executors of his Royal Highness.

The other persons composing the procession were arranged on either side of the chapel, the pages having filed off at the entrance.

The part of the service before the interment being read, the corpse was deposited in the vault, and the Bishop of Norwich having concluded the burial service, the Garter Principal King of Arms pronounced the style of his late Royal Highness.

The Knights of the several Orders present at the solemnity wore their collars, with white rosettes.

The Bishop of Norwich read the funeral service of the Church in a most impressive and solemn manner. The responses were said by the Rev. J. Sinclair, Vicar of Kensington.

The coffin was carried from the hearse by twelve of the undertaker's men, and placed in the chapel under a canopy of black cloth, previous to the alighting of the mourners and friends of the illustrious deceased.

The procession entered the principal gate of the cemetery at half-past ten o'clock. It arrived at the chapel shortly before eleven o'clock, and at a quarter to twelve o'clock the whole of the ceremony was concluded.

The royal and distinguished personages present did not return to town in procession, but left the cemetery at different times, in their own carriages.

Two of the carriages of her Majesty the Queen Dowager, each drawn by six horses, were in the procession. The Duke of Cambridge left the cemetery in a private carriage immediately after the remains of his Royal Highness's brother had been consigned to the tomb.

As the body was carried into the chapel, the Bishop of Norwich, in a most solemn manner, read, "I am the resurrection and the life," &c. &c. As soon as those who took part in the procession had arrived, the doors of the chapel were closed, and kept fastened until after the conclusion of the ceremony.

The chapel was exceedingly crowded. A number of the directors were not able to obtain admission.

Colonel Rowan and Mr. Mayne accompanied the procession from Kensington, and, with the able assistance of Superintendent May, Inspector Hughes, and other of the police force, not the least confusion occurred, neither did we hear of any accident.

Mr. Banting, the royal undertaker, had the management of the funeral after it arrived at the chapel.

The road from Kensal-green to Paddington was densely crowded with persons at the time we departed, waiting to obtain a view of the distinguished individuals as they left the cemetery.

The directors of the company were most obliging in giving all the accommodation possible to the gentlemen who attended for the public press.

LIBRARY OF HIS LATE ROYAL HIGHNESS THE DUKE OF SUSSEX IN KENSINGTON PALACE.

An accurate account of the formation of the library of his late Royal Highness the Duke of Sussex must necessarily be interesting to the public, not only from the recent decease of its founder, but also as displaying the love of literature and science possessed by the illustrious prince, and as demonstrative evidence of the superior estimation in which he held learning and talent to the fortuitous circumstances of birth and rank. For several years weekly dinners were given at Kensington Palace to select parties of literary and scientific men, travellers and learned foreigners, when subjects connected with the library were freely discussed, and intellectual exercise blended with princely cheer and generous hospitality. At these meetings, which will be long remembered by many of the most distinguished men of the day, "the feast of reason and the flow of soul" were amply illustrated, and no difference of opinion, either in religion or politics, was allowed to constitute a barrier to the freedom of intercourse.

Until about the year 1818 his Royal Highness did not appear in any prominent manner, either as a collector of books or a patron of literature; but the course of his life, and the confinement consequent upon the sickness which attended a considerable part of the earliest period of his career, had led him to cultivate a taste for letters. Aware of the interest which the Duke of Sussex took in literary and scientific researches, his Royal Highness the Duke of Kent was anxious to introduce to him his surgeon, Mr. Pettigrew, observing to the latter, "You ought to be acquainted with the Duke of Sussex: I have been educated in the field, my brother in the closet." Mr. Pettigrew was accordingly made acquainted with the Duke of Sussex, and various conferences were held between them on literary topics, which occasioned reference to be made to some works which his Royal Highness stated were in his library. They, however, could not be found, from the irregular manner in which the books were placed, there being nothing like an arrangement attempted. At this time the library consisted of not more than 6000 volumes, occupying five rooms. Mr. Pettigrew, who had long been familiar with the best libraries, and conversant with most classes of literature, suggested to his Royal Highness the necessity of adopting some regular plan, and, at the request of his Royal Highness, drew up a system under which the various books were to be arranged in classes and orders, and this, being subjected to discussion, was agreed upon, and Mr. Pettigrew unexpectedly solicited to undertake the labour of classification and arrangement. Being much engaged by his professional avocations, this charge became one of serious responsibility; but with an ardent mind, a real love of books, and an anxious wish to gratify his Royal Highness, he accepted the duty, and was then appointed librarian.

From this period the library improved, and increased rapidly—faulty and spurious editions were rejected—deficiencies supplied—and, with the increase of the collection increase of appetite prevailed, until it had risen with extraordinary speed into a most distinguished library. The manner in which the Duke of Sussex entered into this labour proves how strong was his taste for letters. He examined with his librarian all the sale catalogues of books; he constantly consulted the best bibliographical works, and kept for his private use abbreviated catalogues of collections either of the beautiful classical productions of the Aldines, the Variorum, and Elzevir classics, and, above all, lists of the several editions of the Old and New Testament, in his possession. By this means no work of which he stood in need escaped his attention; and often has his Royal Highness, after attending the House of Lords, or presiding at some public charitable institution, resorted to the house of his librarian, either to examine recent purchases, or make arrangements to supply the deficiencies of the library, and in this exercise he would often be engaged until long past midnight. In this way was the library formed; and it now consists of about 45,000 volumes, an evidence of the taste and superior mind of its illustrious possessor. What can be more gratifying to a people than to have their princes distinguished as the friends of learning and of science, the promoters of true religion, and of those means by which the advancement of the happiness of mankind is effected? A spirit of genuine patriotism, and a correct notion of the rights and duties of man, must necessarily be obtained by the cultivation of letters. His Royal Highness was not a book collector in the mere sense of the word, for the purposes of display or simple accumulation; he had a higher aim, the acquisition of knowledge, and the means of affording facilities to others in the same laudable pursuit. Those only who have been engaged in works of extensive erudition can duly appreciate the benefit of having the records of learning carefully preserved, and easily accessible. That such a public advantage really existed in the magnificent collection of the Duke of Sussex no one who had the honour and happiness of having seen it will for a moment doubt; and who knows also the feelings and purposes under which that collection has been made? It is a remarkable peculiarity of the library in Kensington Palace that it has been literally accumulated, volume by volume, and that at no time, and on no occasion whatever, has any collection of books been purchased to occupy the shelves of any particular department; and the vast amount of information obtained by this individual selection of works must have been immense.

The mode in which the library has thus been formed will serve to explain its nature. It is not a collection of rarities, but it is a library. There are the best works in all branches of letters, philosophy, the arts and sciences. It is a working library—it contains whatever is most useful. We shall presently glance at the strength of the different departments; but it will be useful also to allude to some of the rarities and scarce productions of the collection. The library is not confined to printed books; there are many manuscripts, the chief of which are classical, lexicographical, and theological. Of the latter a printed account was published in 1827 by Mr. Pettigrew, together with the first part of the account of the printed Bibles (the second, which completes this division of the library, being published in 1839), under the title of "Bibliotheca Sussexiana: a Descriptive Catalogue, accompanied by Historical and Biographical Notices of the Manuscripts and Printed Books contained in the Library of his Royal Highness the Duke of Sussex, K.G., &c. &c."

The principal MSS., and the most valuable ones, are the Hebrew, of which there are forty-eight. Four of these are what is called rolled manuscripts, being such as are used in the synagogues. These are without illuminations, for ornament in them is strictly prohibited. The directions given in the preparation of the rolled manuscripts of the Pentateuch have unquestionably served to secure the integrity of the text of Scripture. They are to be written upon parchment made from the skin of a clean animal, and to be tied together with strings of a similar substance. Those skins must be prepared by a Jew. Every skin is to contain a certain number of columns, which are to be of a precise length and breadth, and to contain a certain number of words. They are to be written with the purest ink, and no word is to be written by heart, or with points; it must be first orally pronounced by the copyist. The name of God is directed to be written with the utmost attention and devotion, and the transcriber is to wash his pen before he inscribes it on the parchment. If there should chance to be a word with either a deficient or a redundant letter, or should any of the prosaic part of the Old Testament be written as verse, or vice versa, the manuscript is vitiated. The Spanish character of the Hebrew MSS. is the most elegant, and it formed the model upon which the types of the celebrated printers, Robert Stephens and Christopher Plantin, were made.

The subjoined specimen is taken from the commencement of the Book of Deuteronomy, in a MS. of the thirteenth century, which was obtained from the Meerman collection.

A Hebrew and Chaldaic Pentateuch of the thirteenth century, executed for some private individual, is one of the richest illuminated Hebrew MSS. in existence. Mr. Pettigrew has given in his catalogue five plates of illumination from this MS., distinguished by their beauty and singularity.

We give a fac-simile of the illumination which commences the Book of Genesis. The architectural and other ornaments serve to fix the period of its execution. It is in gold and colours.

Several of the Hebrew MSS. contain sentences at the conclusion of the books written by the scribe, and serve to illustrate the devotion with which the labour was performed. The following specimen, taken from a commentary on Isaiah, may interest the reader; it runs thus:—"I praise my God, who girded my loins. I will raise my voice and bless Him, for He is my rock. He was my help till I finished Isaiah. To Him do I hope that He will prosper my ways at the time I begin Jeremiah."

There is a very fine MS., on vellum, of the twelfth century, of the "More Nevochim" of Moses Maimonides, a work held in the highest estimation by the Jews, and is a critical, philosophical, and theological explanation of the most difficult words, phrases, passages, metaphors, parables, allegories, and ceremonies of the Old Testament.

A Greek MS. of the New Testament of the thirteenth century, with illuminations, is both curious and valuable. It has never been collated, which should be done for any future edition of the New Testament in the Greek language.

The first page of the Gospel of St. Matthew has an illustration in gold and colours, of which we subjoin a fac-simile.

Among the Greek MSS., there is one which contains a "Life of Theodore, the Studite" (so called from having settled in a famous monastery founded by Studius, a patrician and consul), Bishop of Thessalonica, who died in the year A.D. 826. This is a very interesting memoir, and throws considerable light on both the political and religious history of those times. It has never been printed.

In the theological department of Latin MSS. there are no less than sixteen copies of the "Vulgate," on vellum, besides various copies of distinct portions of the greater and lesser Prophets. Two of these MS. Bibles are furnished with very numerous illustrations, one having nearly one hundred, and the other upwards of one hundred miniatures in gold and colours. Another, having forty-four illuminated drawings, one of which, attached to the 1st chapter of Genesis, represents Adam digging and Eve spinning, is a very choice MS. There are two MSS. in which the history of the Bible is allegorised in Latin verses, some of which are in rhyme. These MSS. are known under the title of "Aurora," which is probably intended to allude to the light supposed to be thrown upon obscure passages of Scripture by the allegorical mode of interpretation. The work is attributed to Petrus de Riga, a canon of Rheims, a writer of other Latin poetry, and who died in 1209. One of the finest Latin MSS. is a "Psalter" of the tenth century, written on thick vellum, and upon 186 folio leaves. A splendid miniature in gold and colours of the Saviour in the act of giving the benediction, precedes the Psalter, which we here present to our readers. The initials are very large and grotesquely arranged.

A commentary by the venerable Bede on the Gospel of St. Luke and the Acts of the Apostles, a MS. of the fifteenth century, in folio, written upon the purest vellum, and made for Frederick, King of Castille, is also worthy of notice. A collection of the various readings of the New Testament, by Cæsar de Missy, one of the French chaplains to George III. at St. James's, is of some importance to any future editor of the Greek New Testament. "St. Augustine's City of God," a MS. of the fifteenth century, is beautifully illuminated. The four books of the "Dialogues of Pope Gregory," a MS. of the thirteenth or fourteenth century; the "Christianismi Restitutio" of the unfortunate Servetus; a MS. of the twelfth century of the "Works of Flavius Josephus" the Jewish historian; another, "De Clusio Decretum," of the Monk Gratian, of the fifteenth century, highly illuminated, in two vols. folio, containing the Papal ordinances up to the year 1150; another of the fourteenth century, collected by Pope Boniface; a MS. of the fifteenth century, of the "Liber Sententiarum, or Book of Sentences," taken from the fathers of the church, and select questions for disputation (formerly held in such high esteem, that they were more frequently read than Holy Writ, and commented upon by innumerable authors), by Peter Lombard, the very first of scholastic divines, and called the Master of the Sentences; the "Commentaries of Duns Scotus on the Four Books of the Sentences," in 4 vols. folio; and the "Testamenta Duodecim Patriarcharum Filiorum Jacob," a translation from the Greek made by Robert Grossetete or Grosthead, Bishop of Lincoln, deserve to be specified. The missals, breviaries, hours, offices, &c., are both numerous and splendid; many are illuminated in the highest degree.

A "Book of the Hours or Offices of the Roman Catholic Church," a MS. of the fifteenth century, presents one of the most exquisitely illuminated works of the kind; and we copy the painting attached to the Burial Service, as a specimen of the arrangement and workmanship

Of the French MSS. it is sufficient to notice "La Bible Moralizée," a beautifully executed MS. of the fifteenth century, and in which, amidst innumerable illuminated letters and figures, there are eighteen miniatures in chiaroscuro of truly beautiful art, representing, 1. The sacrifice of Abraham; 2. Pharaoh seated on a throne, and the taskmasters watching over the erection of the building of the cities of Pithon and Raamses; 3. Offerings for the Tabernacle; 4. Moses being commanded to number the people; 5. Moses addressing the people before crossing the river Jordan; 6. The appointment of Joshua to succeed Moses; 7. The death of the Amalekite who slew Saul; 8. The usurpation of the regal office by Adonijah; 9. The re-building of the Temple; 10. The departure of Tobit; 11. King David playing on the harp; 12. Solomon, corrupted by his women, sacrificing to idols; 13. King Solomon writing the Book of Wisdom; 14. Emblematical representation of the marriage of Christ to the Church; 15. The Judgment of Solomon; 16. Jeremiah prophesying before Jerusalem; 17. Lamentation for the desertion of the Temple; 18. The vision of Ezekiel. This MS. was formerly in the Townley collection. "La Legende Dorée," or the lives of the Saints, in 2 vols. folio, a MS. of the fifteenth century; a large collection of MSS. of M. De la Cane, in 10 vols. quarto; a collection of pieces relative to the Council of Trent; and an immense body of commentaries and notes on the Old and New Testament, by Cæsar De Missy.

An ancient Italian MS., entitled "Historia del Vecchio Testamento," is very curious and beautiful, and has 519 miniatures. Many of these are of considerable size, and the groups are exceedingly well managed.

A German MS. of the Apocalypse, with a gloss, of the fourteenth century, has 14 illuminations in gold and colours, each occupying an entire page, and containing many figures illustrative of the work some of these are remarkably grotesque and singular.

Spanish and Dutch MSS. are not important.

In the English department there is a paraphrase upon Job, by George Sandys, which Mr. Pettigrew thinks is an original transcript of a well-known and highly-esteemed work; and some MS. sermons, by the Rev. Matthew Denny, an eminent nonconformist of the seventeenth century, in the author's own handwriting.

Among the Arabic MSS. there is a dictionary in Arabic and Persian; several copies of the Koran, some with Persian interlinear versions; one of which, in particular, is deserving of notice, as having belonged to Tippoo Saib, and obtained from his tent at the taking of Seringapatam, and presented to the Duke of Sussex by one of the officers of the Indian army. Major-General Ogg, afterwards Groom of the Chamber to his Royal Highness.

Armenian MSS. are of rare occurrence. The Duke of Sussex's library contains a valuable copy of the Gospels, of the thirteenth century, upon vellum, curiously illuminated. It is of a date prior to that from which the first printed edition has been made, and belonged to an Armenian family long resident at Madras, where they settled, on their expulsion from Armenia by Tamerlane. It was highly esteemed by the Armenian Christians, and should be collated for any future edition of the Gospels in the Armenian language.

There are also MSS. in the Pali, Burman, Cingalese, and other Oriental languages, some of which are written upon leaves and plates of ivory.

In the PRINTED BOOKS the theological department is entitled to a decided preference; and in this division the editions of the Old and New Testament are the most conspicuous. There are the five larger Polyglots of Ximenes, Plantin, Le Jay, Walton, and Reineccius; and the five lesser ones of Weldon, Hutter, Bagster, Vatablus, &c., all in very fine condition. There is also a work of very great rarity—a Polyglot Pentateuch, printed at Constantinople in 1546, a most choice and valuable article in sacred literature; of which only one other copy, and that imperfect, is to be found in this country, in the public library at Cambridge. There are seven Polyglot Psalters; that of 1516, printed upon paper and also upon vellum; the latter obtained from the collection of Count Macarthy. Erasmus's own copy, with numerous notes, of the edition of 1518; many polyglot portions of the Old and New Testament; 24 editions of the Hebrew Bible; 17 Hebrew-Samaritan and Hebrew Pentateuchs, and some portions of the Old Testament, very great scarcity: these, the earlier and later prophets, with the commentaries of the Rabbi Kimchi, are among the rarest works in Hebrew typography, printed in the fifteenth century by the Sonsinates. The Bomberg editions and the great Rabbinical Bible are in the finest possible state, and exhibit the most magnificent specimens of Hebrew printing.

In the Greek Bibles there is the first or Aldine edition, printed at Venice in 1518; the first printed edition of the MS. in the Vatican library at Rome in 1587, of which work there are two copies, one of which belonged to Casimir, the French poet, and has his autograph; Grabe's Septuagint; the Old Testament, fac-simile from the Alexandrine Codex, preserved in the British Museum and reputed to be of the fourth century, certainly one of the most beautiful specimens of Greek calligraphy that has escaped the ravages of time.

Of Latin Bibles there are more than 200 editions, beginning with a fine copy of the first edition of the Holy Scriptures, which is also generally conceived to be the first book printed with moveable metal types. It is known as the "Mazarin Bible," the first copy of it having been discovered in the Cardinal Mazarin's library, belonging to the College des Quatre Nations. It is also known as the Editio Princeps of the Vulgate, and is the version made by St. Jerome in the fourth century. It was printed at Mayence by Guttenburg, between the years 1450 and 1455, and the Duke of Sussex's copy possesses a statement made by the illuminator, rubricator, and binder of his having completed his work on "The Feast of the Assumption of the Blessed Virgin Mary, A.D., 1456." It was purchased by Mr. Pettigrew, at the sale of the library of James Perry, Esq., the proprietor of the Morning Chronicle, for the sum of 100 guineas. The Bible of 1462, by Fust and Schoeffer, is the first extant with a date and with the name of a printer, and is upon vellum. The richness of the Latin Bibles may be estimated by the fact that there are upwards of 50 editions, printed in the fifteenth century, and it is not too much to say that there are very few of any known importance not to be found in the collection. Many of these are furnished with MS. notes by distinguished scholars, and several are illustrated by valuable prints. Such of our readers as may be anxious to know the particulars of these editions we refer to the "Bibliotheca Sussexiana." Vol. I. part 2, pp. 288—316. The Bibles in the Hebrew, Greek, and Latin versions just alluded to form upwards of 1,200 editions in the Oriental languages — Coptic, Ethiopic, Armenic, Irish, Syriac, Arabic, Persian, Sclavonic, Illyrian, Slavonic, German, Saxon, Bohemian, Swedish, Danish, Bohemian, Dutch, Russian, Flemish, Welsh, Manx, Portuguese, Manx, Anglo-Saxon, Italian, Polish, Lettonian, Gaelic, Calmuck, Hungarian, Chaldee, and Chinese. Of the New Testaments there are Hebrew, Greek, Latin, Coptic, Armenian, Irish, Syriac, Arabic, Anglo-Saxon, Gothic, Georgian, Saxon, German, French, Italian, Spanish, English, Swedish, Danish, Dutch, Wendish, Welsh, Basque, Turkish, Japanese, Malay, Manx, Cingalese, Hindostanee, Bengalee, Tehinga, Darnulic, Chinese, Calmuck, Amharic, Mohawk, Greenlandish, and Esquimaux. From this statement the extreme richness of the Biblical department will be evident, and the library may indeed be looked upon as without an equal in this respect.

It would be too serious an omission not to mention that there are the first Armenian, the first Irish, the first Slavonic, the first German, the first Reformed edition of Luther, the first French Protestant, the splendid folio Elzevir edition of Des Marets, in superb Grolier binding and upon largest paper. The first Italian; two copies of the Italian Bible of Diodati, one of which is particularly interesting as having been the Bible of Queen Charlotte, and having several notes in her Majesty's autograph in the margins; the first Spanish, both Jewish and Christian copies; the first English, by Coverdale; the first Great Bible, or Craumer's; the English Bibles of Matthews, Taverner, Nicholson, Whitchurch, Grafton, Reynolds, Hyll, Daye, and Jeras; the first Genevan edition; the Bishop's Bible; the first Scotch edition, by Bas. Sandyne, Edinb. 1576, folio. A copy of the Genevan Bible printed by Bacher in 1577, which belonged to Queen Elizabeth, and the covers of which are embroidered by her Majesty's own hand; this was formerly in the Duchess of Portland's museum. The first English Roman Catholic edition, and the first of King James's authorised version. There are also the first Dutch, the first Welsh, the first Malayan, the first Manx, and the first American-Indian versions. Of the New Testament there are 202 editions in Greek, among which are the first Greek of Complutum, 1514, and the first of Erasmus, of 1516; the principal editions of Stephens, Elzevir, Sedar, Mile, Matthæe, Stock, Bangelin, Welstein, Goldenhagan, Reineccius, Griesbach, Woide, Valpy, Knapp, &c. The "Quatuor Evangelia" of Birch; the "Codex Bezæ," by Kipling; the Gospel of St. Matthew, by Bartelt; and the "Acta Apostolorum," of Hearne. There is the first Syriac New Testament, and the first edition of the German. The French New Testaments are numerous and in beautiful condition, and the English commence with an edition, by Tyndale, of 1526. There is also the first Genevan, the first Rhenish, Wickliffe's, edited by Lewis and by Baber, and many others of very great rarity. The other portions of the theological division are also of great importance. The collection of Talmuds and Rabbinical literature is very extensive. All the works of the Fathers, the Benedictine editions, as well as many of the older printed and rare copies. The original pieces of Martin Luther, Bullinger, and the Reformers, with the curious wood-cut frontispieces. Prayer-books, homilies, commentaries, and systems of divinity, critical and philological dissertations, &c. are in great abundance. Albert Durer's splendid efforts in wood-engraving, illustrative of the history of the Old and New Testament; the works of the German and Dutch illustrators of the same, and various curious works, to notice which particularly would far exceed the boundary assigned to this notice.

Although the theological department is the richest of the Sussex Library, the other divisions of learning are by no means scanty in the specimens they can afford. In the classics there are many of the first and scarcest editions, both in Greek and Latin, several printed on vellum, and the most useful edition is always to be found. There is a set of the Delphic classics, but wanting the Statius and the Opera Philosophica of Cicero. The collection of Variorum classics is most perfect. The Aldine editions are very numerous and some of them in the most beautiful condition. Specimens of the beautiful typography of the Elzevirs, Stephens, Baskerville, Foulis, Barbou, Maittaire, Bodoni, and Didot abound.

The Lexicography is of very great extent. The chief and most rare lexicons, dictionaries, encyclopædias, grammars, vocabularies, &c. are to be seen in all languages. The collection of chronicles, foreign and English, in the historical department is very rich, and the arrangement of this division is both geographical and chronological. The tracts relating to general or particular history are bound up and arranged in the cases in which the larger histories are found, and these are so managed as even to fall into the different reigns to which they appertain. Rooms being assigned to different departments the books are most accessible, and under the arrangement adopted can be readily obtained even without the aid of a catalogue, of which, however, there is a most complete one in the library. Law and Parliamentary history, heraldry, &c. constitute another excellent portion of the library. The dramatic literature is not of any extent, but there is a copy of the first edition of our immortal bard, with a brilliant impression of his portrait, to which the well-known lines of Ben Jonson are affixed.

Taken altogether the library is a truly splendid one, and it is impossible not to feel the deepest regret in the contemplation of its early dispersion. It has been made very accessible to scholars, whose labours and researches have often been cheered by the presence of his Royal Highness, eager in making inquiries to obtain information and no less zealous in imparting his own acquisitions to facilitate their views. It is a library which has not been won by conquest, nor inherited as a legacy, nor got together for purposes of idle ostentation. It has been purchased volume by volume at the sacrifice of many an object of princely luxury and indulgence, and from a pure love of knowledge, and a desire to secure the best means of acquiring it for himself, and imparting it to others who may seek it.

The gallery represented in the preceding wood-cut is about 100 feet in length, and herein is placed nearly the whole of the theological collection. The editions of the Holy Bible and New Testament occupy one entire side, the smaller works being arranged in the cases, and the folios beneath. The portraits of the Rev. Samuel Parr, LL.D., and the Rev. Abraham Rees, D.D., both painted by J. Lonsdale, are placed over the doors at each end of the gallery, into which the light is admitted through stained glass, looking into the courtyard of the palace.

☞ We are obliged, for this week only, to defer the Ninth Chapter of the Novel, "England and France."

In this merry and propitious month of May falls the birthday of the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS; and, by way of shaking hands with our readers over that auspicious event, we have the pleasure to declare that the ANNIVERSARY OF THIS PUBLICATION will not only now, but always, be attended with due celebration. In this first instance, and on the 20th of May, we shall produce in which all that we have ever promised will be exceeded—while the novelty and beauty of the subjects produced will surpass anything that has yet been attempted in the columns of a newspaper.

Among the other features of attraction will be the presentation of

OUR MAY GARLAND, wreathed into forms of beauty by the first artists of our time, and entwined around a series of

EXQUISITE ORIGINAL PICTURES

(Separately illustrated with poems)

of the "spring life" of town and country of our own century and of the olden time—the field, the farm-yard, the cottage, and the village; the court, the club-room, the streets, the race-course, and the park, will fall each in its season, among our gems of literature and art; and to these will be added

A SPLENDID ALLEGORY OF OUR ANNIVERSARY, DESIGNED BY HARVEY, and a number of magnificent subjects connected with the events of the day, and with the fine arts generally; the whole forming

TWO SUPPLEMENTS IN ADDITION TO THE REGULAR PAPER.

The price of the paper and the two supplements will be one shilling.

We last week announced to our readers the fact of the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS having so far exceeded the bounds of ordinary prosperity as to be in the midst of opposition, that we were obliged to have recourse to an experiment unprecedented in the history of the newspaper press; that we have commenced a double establishment—that we print our journal twice over—that we have two sets of engravings—and that those who doubt our circular on may see two different machines working those numbers of the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS at the same moment. This was an expedient to which we have recourse until our new machines are completed; and until when we are stabbed in the dilemma of supplying the forbearance of our customers. Then the beauty of the working, and cancellation, will be taught to keep pace with the rapidity with which we shall meet the public will. And then we feel confident of combining abundant means of supply with an even tenour of perfection in the first department pervading the whole impression of the Journal.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON, SATURDAY, MAY 6, 1843.

One of the most grand and philosophical subjects which can engage the attention of the present times is the free interchange of intelligence and communication between the nations of the earth by means of that wonderful institution which forms peculiarly a bond of brotherhood among men, which is the interpreter of the thought, heart, and power of the universe, which spreads the sails of commerce and the wings of mind—the post. It folds within its bosom all the confidences of the human kind, the intercommunion of spirits national and individual, the loves—the affections—the hatreds—the friendships—the disputes—the cares—the speculations—the prospects—the ambitions of all races of men. The post-office of every capital city is the very heart of the nation, from which its blood flows ceaselessly on into all the channels which form its arteries of life—every more supplying and supplied. It grasps the secrets of life and death; and with the solemn inviolability of its moving silence is as powerful in its noiseless grandeur as its brother of the trumpet-tongue—the press. At the pregnant moment of each daily arrival the post-office is, for the instant, the terminus of all the high-roads of the world. There centre—though but for a term brief as the flash of thought, and only before they are impelled away by a new velocity—the mighty destinies of earth. The wonderful history of the commerce of countries sheds there its written leaves; thence all the machinery of society is brought into free and rapid action, and the wheels of empires take their motion from the secret springs. Through that channel, no matter how lofty its architecture, or how humble its design, rush all the streams of civilization that glad the vast pastures of intelligence. There the merchant has his cargo, the philosopher his light of wisdom, the Christian his test of religion, the patriot, the soldier, and the legislator the voiceless sentences of fate; there, in one word, storm the passions of the earth; there is consummated its greatness or humility; there are agitated its conflicts of glory, love, and pride. And while the mightier national influences are wed with that marvellous temple of human destiny, there, individuals, do those humbler workings which play upon the hearts of individuals, and stir the family homes of society, spread joy or havoc from the threshold of a broken seal. That brittle sign of secrecy once snapped, and suddenly are opened all the flood-gates of the spirit—all the avenues to the heart and soul. Then beams the smile of hope, the radiance of happiness, the joy of love; then rush up quick waters from the fount of tears; then clouds the brow, or works the hard torture of anguish, or wakes the hopelessness of despair. Beautifully was it written (by Hervey) of the St. Martin's-le-Grand of modern London, when its aspect awakened thoughts within him from which he drew the inspirations of philosophy—"Oh! the crowd of human interests that come, day by day, to that modern Delphi, and take away from its innermost shrines the oracles of hope, or rapture, or despair! The prizes and the blanks in the lottery of life that have been drawn from those close boxes! The human passions that have throbbed within that stony hall! The prison hath known no anguish, and the churchyard witnessed no sorrow, like the anguish and the sorrow that have wandered amid those walls. Many a light heart hath ascended the steps of that temple, and taken away a weight too great for the bearer to carry long or far, through the rough places of the world. There hath been quickened in many a breast the undying worm; and there hath arisen in many an one the ineffable star. Hope hath laid down her treasure, and fear his burden, on the threshold of that place of oracles; and beneath that one lofty roof have met all the secrets, and mingled all the emotions, of the human soul." But we are writing essay when we really intended only to turn the attention of our readers to the immediate business of life. What we have said, however, may have the effect of working a reminfulness of the immense importance of post communication between countries, whether regarded by the eye of the poet, the politician, the philosopher, or the man of trade—and it is here time to add that the subject has been forced upon our attention by receipt of an official copy of a new convention between her Majesty and the King of the French, regulating the communications by post between the British and French dominions, and signed at London, by the ministers of the high contracting parties, on the 3rd of April, 1843. We have made careful perusal of all the terms of this convention, and we do not hesitate to declare that, if ratified, they will be of the greatest advantage to the communities of the two countries, of all their dependencies, and, indeed, of other lands abroad, to which proper negotiation may enable them to extend. Moreover, England and France will be pointing an example to the rest of Europe, of which avail may be taken for the general benefit of mankind; and we have no doubt that no inopportune conflict of party in either country—no national prejudice—no insane prestige in favour of war—no miserable restrictions of false and stupid pride may interfere with the ratification of a project which is meant for the good of the great family of human creatures whose interests and happiness are blended with the sway, and influence, and friendship, and peace, and power of the two great nations of England and France. By this new convention all the inhabitants of both countries, and all their colonies, will have the advantage of communication at a reduced and uniform rate of postage—with the option of paying that postage on the onset or at the destination of the letters—and with a perfect protection of the correspondence of the subjects of either power. Even war will not interfere with the scheme, there being a clause to the effect that, in the event of such a contingency between the two countries, the mail packets of the two offices shall continue their navigation, without impediment or molestation, until a notification is made on the part of either of the Governments that the service is to be discontinued; in which case they shall be permitted to return freely, and under special protection, to their respective ports.

The rate of postage is much simplified, and its reduction important. The exchange of correspondence between the two offices will be effected, on the part of Great Britain on the Channel, through the post-offices of London, Dover, Brighton, Southampton, Jersey, and Guernsey; and on the part of France through those of Paris, Calais, Boulogne, Dieppe, Havre, Cherbourg, Granville, and St. Malo. And again in the Mediterranean on the part of Great Britain, through the post of Alexandria (the British office), Gibraltar, and Malta; and on the part of France through the offices of Marseilles, Alexandria (the French office), Smyrna, the Dardanelles, and Constantinople.

The international uniform rate of postage will be fivepence for every single letter not exceeding in weight half-an-ounce, and so on in proportion, according to the scale of postage now established in the United Kingdom. The Channel Islands, however, will have to pay threepence per ounce instead of fivepence, and so on in proportion; and these two general uniform rates of fivepence and threepence will be extended (subject only to the exceptions of territorial transit) to all the places we have mentioned above. Moreover, as far as France and England can influence them, the convention will affect letters from Spain and Portugal; from the Sardinian States and Southern Italy; from the Swiss Cantons; from Germany and the Northern States; and letters originating in the kingdoms of Belgium and the Netherlands, which the Belgian and Netherland post-offices may think proper to send through France.

There are a number of minor advantages evidenced by the multifarious clauses, and, among the rest, the fact that newspapers will go internationally post free.

Altogether we recommend a general perusal of the convention, which may be had at the Government offices, and which we long to see ratified in time to come into operation according to the terms of the treaty, on the 1st of June, 1843.

In connexion with this convention we may notice a bright prospect of almost daily communication between London and Paris, arising out of the opening of the Rouen Railway—a circumstance which, as tending to promote the blessings of civilization, and the ends of peace, is most enthusiastically regarded by those inhabitants of France and England who have genuinely a friendly disposition towards each other, and do not partake of the madness of party strife. With the remarks of an evening contemporary on this head, we may bring to a period this notice of a new national benefit:—"England and France are now turning their 'swords into ploughshares, and their spears into pruning-hooks,' and we look forward with confidence to the day when they will not only be united as brethren; when, in the words of Count St. Aulaire, the sons of England will marry the daughters of France; when London and Paris can be visited in the same day, and sit down with his English guest in the evening—but when they will spread their influence over the world, and give effect to those divine laws which cherish good-will and peace to all mankind."

A very painful occurrence has taken place in Whitecross-street Prison,—the death of an unfortunate gentleman confined there for debt in the face of the certificates of medical men that longer incarceration would assuredly terminate fatally, and that the life of the unhappy sufferer—then in rapid consumption—depended inevitably on his immediate liberation. The story is as follows:—

To one of his creditors, a Mr. Heathcote, of Manchester, he owed £43. The wife of the deceased having, in answer to an inquiry after him, said he had gone, or was going, to Ireland, Mr. Heathcote went before a judge and made affidavit that the deceased was going to leave the kingdom, and obtained an order for his arrest. He was accordingly arrested, and reached Whitecross-street Prison on the 23th of March. As he was evidently labouring under the distressing symptoms of consumption, he was immediately placed in the infirmary, and received all the care and additional nourishment his case required; food, however, would not remain on his stomach, and in a few days he was confined to his bed. On the 18th an application was made to Mr. Justice Maule to liberate him on account of his illness, Mr. Wadd giving a strong certificate that there was no hope of saving his life if he remained in the prison. Dr. Heath gave a similar certificate. The application was strongly opposed by the creditor, who repeated his affidavits that the deceased wished to leave the kingdom. The judge felt that he had no power under the act to order the liberation of the deceased on the ground of extreme illness. He, however, made an order for his release on finding sureties for the sum of £40. This was only £3 less than the sum for which he might be lasted as of right, without any special application. The deceased was unable to find sureties and lingered till Sunday last, when he died of consumption.

This is a very horrible state of law, and is part of that un-Christian system which places misfortune on a level with crime, and then punishes it more severely.

If a criminal be sentenced, for degrading offences against society, to imprisonment-incarceration in a common gaol (no worse gaol than Whitecross-street, by the way, would he be likely to encounter), he is liberated, by the order of the Home Secretary, the moment it is proved that his imprisonment is likely to affect his life; and yet the judges of the land have not power to grant the debtor the mercy afforded to the criminal, even though it be certified that he is almost within the jaws of death. Why is not this dreadful system of imprisonment for debt abolished altogether? Why not draw the clear and definite line between misfortune and fraud, so that the one may not be tyrannised over nor the other escape? If a man be a swindler he is fit for the prison of the thief; if he be honest, as well as unfortunate, he is the more entitled to respect and sympathy, and the less to oppression and disgrace. There is no power of reason that can justify the giving to a creditor the means of a vindictive revenge—revenge which may hurry a cruel man to the relentless lengths of persecution, of which the melancholy case we have adduced is so distressing an example. We do not envy this Mr. Heathcote of Manchester his feelings—if he be susceptible of any—at the perusal of the sad story before us, nor should we like to find the public papers achieving our renown in such a paragraph as the following:—

The coroner asked if any affidavit were filed to show that the deceased was not in a state of danger, and was answered in the negative. The coroner remarked that it was to be regretted that the law did not authorise a judge to liberate a person detained for debt where a man's life was really at stake. To return to his native country, if he did intend to return, was what a man in his state of disease would naturally think of; and, if the judge had not authority to interpose, he should have hoped that the creditor, from humanity, would not have so strongly opposed the unfortunate man's application. He trusted the Legislature would extend the judge's power, so that he might liberate on common appearance where a man's life was believed to be in danger. The jury heartily concurred with the opinion of the coroner, and a verdict of "Natural Death" was recorded.

There are few subjects interesting to the public of more importance than that of prison discipline, which is expected to accomplish a double purpose,—the prevention of crime, and the reformation of criminals—and there is none to which we have more anxiously or earnestly applied ourselves than to it, in the hope of promoting, as far as in us lay, those desirable objects. In doing so (our readers will do us the justice to remember) we have ever contended for a cessation of all harsh and unnecessary cruelties and restrictions in the treatment of prisoners, and for the adoption of such ameliorated regulations as might conduce to their health and moral and religious improvement in accordance with the principles of Christian humanity, and as sanctioned and upheld by medical science. In the few observations, therefore, which we here intend indulging in in reference to a matter connected with the discipline of the gaol of Newgate, which has just transpired, and which appears to attract a good deal of public attention, it cannot be supposed that we have any intention of sanctioning, for a moment, any extra-official interference with the privileges or comforts of its unhappy inmates. The facts of this case, as they are gathered from a late Report of the Inspectors of Prisons, and communicated by the chaplain of Newgate, are as follow:—

"A female prisoner, named S. S., was tried on the 27th of August, 1842, for the murder of her infant. She was found guilty, and sentence of death was passed upon her without the least hope of mercy being held out. Some legal difficulty having been raised by the prisoner's counsel, the judge reserved the point for the consideration of the judges. The prisoner was aware that her fate could not therefore be decided before November, but she did not entertain much hope of a favourable decision. In some conversation which the chaplain had with one of the judges, but not in his official capacity, he was impressed with the improbability of the Home Secretary recommending the prisoner to mercy, and therefore, for a week or ten days before the expected arrival of the warrant, he had endeavoured to impress on the prisoner's mind his own increasing fears that the result of the approaching consultation of the judges would be fatal, and that she ought, therefore, to prepare for death. Her own apprehensions were quite in accordance with those of the chaplain, and she with many tears acknowledged that her crime fully deserved death. In this state of mind she continued until Sunday, the 20th of November, when, after morning service, the warrant for a free pardon by her Majesty was placed by Mr. Cope, the governor, in the hands of Mr. Sheriff Hooper, who then transferred it to the chaplain, and requested that he would accompany him and communicate this unexpected extension of the royal mercy to the wretched convict."

It being certain that the free pardon did not issue from the Home-office on a Sunday, the inspector, Mr. Russell, on being informed of the circumstance, felt it his duty to investigate the matter, and he begged the governor would reply to the question about to be put to him to the best of his recollection; he was then asked, "When did you receive the pardon of S. S. ?"—To this the governor replied, with much warmth, and in a highly disrespectful manner, that, "as the inquiry was made at the request of an alderman, he declined answering it." Subsequently Mr. Cope stated that, to the best of his belief, it arrived at the prison about six o'clock on Saturday evening, the 19th of November; that he was absent from the prison at the time, making inquiries respecting the friends of a prisoner who had died that day; that he did not return until between ten and eleven o'clock that night; that he then found the free pardon for S. S. on his desk; that he thought it too late to summon the chaplain and to open the prison to make the communication to the prisoner that night; that he did not send for the chaplain the following morning, that the communication might be made before the morning service; that he kept the pardon in his desk until after the service, when, to the best of his recollection, he gave it to Mr. Sheriff Hooper about one o'clock; and that he acted thus because he wished to consult the sheriff relative to a part of the pardon which limited it to the crime of which she had been found guilty, and which stated that it did not extend to any other charge of which she might stand accused.

This occurrence has been made the subject of very grave discussion in the columns of several of our contemporaries, who have dwelt with considerable force on the agony of mind endured by the prisoner during the interval of nineteen hours which was suffered to elapse before her pardon was made known to her, and the Court of Aldermen, we understand, have deliberated on the matter with closed doors. We quite agree in the impropriety of keeping prisoners in a state of painful suspense; but, in the present case, we really think that, looking at Mr. Cope's general conduct in the important situation which he holds—the benevolence and humanity with which he has hitherto discharged its most painful and disagreeable duties—and taking into consideration his own explanation, that he was absent on as merciful an errand as the heart of a philanthropist could suggest—we really think that certain of our contemporaries have been too unscrupulous, if not somewhat unjust, in applying to Mr. Cope's conduct the epithets which, with more of indignation than reason, they have thought fit to employ. As to Mr. Cope's warmth of temper, we have only the inspector's own version of that incident, and it may have been provoked, perhaps, by the haughty and overbearing demeanour of his accuser. At all events, whatever may have been Mr. Cope's conduct on that occasion, want of temper is an infirmity which he has never exhibited towards the prisoners under his charge. The office of a gaoler is anything but an agreeable one, under any circumstance, and, when it happens to be filled by a gentleman possessing all the requisites to render it respectable, boards of magistrates and the public press should be as indulgent as possible in censure of his conduct, in order to encourage persons of his class to accept an office which must cost him many sacrifices, and, not the least, his liberty, for—

THE PROCESSION IN KENSAL-GREEN CEMETERY

THE BURIAL
Garter King at Arms

POSTSCRIPT.

Saturday Evening.

His Royal Highness Prince Albert honoured the Royal Academy with a visit yesterday, to inspect the exhibition. His Royal Highness arrived in Trafalgar-square at a quarter past one o'clock, attended by Lord Colville, Captain Francis Seymour, and Colonel Wylde. The Prince spent upwards of an hour inspecting the different schools, and then returned from the Academy to Buckingham Palace.

Her Majesty the Queen Dowager went to Kensington Palace yesterday, and visited the Duchess of Inverness. Many of the nobility called in the course of the day to make inquiry after the health of her Grace. Sir George Cowper called, on the part of her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent, to inquire after the Duchess of Inverness.

A Cabinet Council (the first that has assembled since the adjournment of Parliament for the Easter recess) was held to-day at the Foreign-office, at two o'clock. All the members were present.

Mr. Justice Coleridge resumed his official duties this morning for the first time since the death of his lordship's son.

We regret to announce the death of the Hon. and Very Rev. Joseph Bourke, Dean of Ossory.

The Canbury election has terminated in the return of Mr. Hussey, the Conservative candidate, the numbers being—For Mr. Hussey, 262; for Mr. Bouverie, 176: Majority, 86.

ALARMING FIRE.—Between the hours of one and two, yesterday morning, a destructive fire broke out on the premises in the occupancy of Mr. Dolling, tobacconist, &c., No. 22, Whitcross-street, Finsbury, adjacent to the old church, which raged for a considerable time, totally destroying the building and its contents.

ANOTHER SERIOUS CALAMITY BY FIRE AT LIVERPOOL.—On Thursday afternoon, about half-past three o'clock, a fire broke out in the warehouse surrounding the Duke's Dock, in Liverpool. Mr. Hewitt, superintendent of the fire police, immediately on the premises, ascertained that the fire followed by another with his brother. On arriving at the Duke's Dock it was found that three of the large pile of warehouses belonging to the trustees of the late Duke of Bridgewater, and situated between the Duke's and King's Docks, were on fire, and the flames had got so far ahead that the roof of one of the warehouses had fallen in. The pile in which the fire occurred consists of ten warehouses—six of the description of some little extent, which run back on each side, all of them having a frontage both to the Duke's and to the King's Dock. The flames were first discovered by one of the workmen in the top story of the third warehouse from the east end, and that and the two stories below it being filled with cotton, the fire soon communicated downwards and to the warehouses on both sides. When the engines arrived, the second, the third, and the fourth warehouses were on fire, and the smoke was issuing in dense masses from the windows of the fifth. The top stories of the third warehouse and their contents have been entirely consumed, with the exception of some little cotton, which will be saved in a damaged state. It is supposed that upwards of a thousand bales of cotton have been destroyed, as the three top stories of this warehouse were filled with that article. The fire, which rose above the roofs and exhausted the third story, but entirely consumed the two stories at the top, and about a similar amount of damage has been done to the fourth warehouse. About six o'clock the fire was considered under control. There are no returns as to the amount of loss likely to be sustained, but we have ascertained, from very good authority, that it will be very little short of £50,000. We have heard, also, that the property is insured in the Royal Exchange, the Globe, the Sun, and a little of it in the Liverpool insurance office. Nothing has yet transpired as to the origin of the fire.

COURT OF QUEEN'S BENCH, FRIDAY.—SENTENCE OF THE CHARTIST PRISONERS.—The sentence of the Court—that Thomas Cooper be imprisoned in Stafford Gaol for two years; and John Richards be imprisoned in the same place for one year; and in the meantime be committed to the custody of the Marshal of the Marshalsea.

The Toronto packet-ship arrived at Portsmouth yesterday with New York papers to the 11th ult., but they contain nothing of importance.

The Paris papers of Thursday contain no news of the slightest interest.

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

FRANCE.—(From our own Correspondent.) Paris, May 2.—The Marquis De Dreux-Brézé, the leader of the Legitimist party in the Chamber of Peers, on the 28th ult., made his monthly complaint against what he is pleased to call "the ingenuousness of Don Carlos." "Not a word," he observed, "that is given to this subject than it merits; and France would act wisely were it to permit the Prince to go to any part of Europe he pleased. I can state most positively that were Don Carlos to leave France the greater part of the partisans would offer their submission to the Queen, and re-enter Spain. They are led to believe that Don Carlos has the secret support of the French Government, and that the day a serious rupture takes place between the two will break out in Spain. Far be it from my intention to accuse M. Guizot of not acting a straightforward policy in Spanish affairs; but thus much is positive: CARLOS persons do intrigue with the Carlist refugees, and promise them not only support, but success. One day they are told that Isabella will be married to the eldest son of Don Carlos; another, that France, to counteract British influence, would prefer Don Carlos to Espartero. To keep up the delusion, many Carlist officers are secretly sent to the frontiers to organise an entry into Spain. At the present moment several are on the frontiers of Catalonia and Navarre, and a partial insurrection may be daily expected. Send Don Carlos from France—his party would break up, and many a well-panned intrigue destroyed; make him a victim, and the tranquillity of Spain cannot be consolidated. We have nothing fresh in the political circles; everything is quiet, very quiet—indeed Syria seems to be forgotten; but, notwithstanding the apparent tranquillity, the French Cabinet is already at work; and M. Appony, the Austrian ambassador, and M. Guizot have more interviews than those held at the Foreign-office. Several Cabinet couriers have also been secretly despatched to Vienna. Let Lord Aberdeen be on his guard, and prepare for a change in the policy of my Court—the Servian question is more serious than is generally imagined. It is true that the French are disarming a part of their fleet; but, on the other hand, they are fitting up steamers for the transport of horses and artillery in contemplation of applying them as a line of packet-boats. Already the following steamers are preparing for sea:—Frigates of 450 horse power: Le Labrador, L'Ormonque, Le Gerboise, Le Sphinx, Le Mentor, Le Zénobie, Le Phlégéton, Le Christophe, Colomb, Le Magellan, Le Canada. L'Ulloa, Le Darien, Le Cassabe, Le Carinne, L'Eldorado. Corvettes of 220 horse power: L'Espadon, Le Calman, Le Phoque, and L'Orénoque.

The news from Algiers is anything but satisfactory, notwithstanding the report of General Bugeaud, dated the 31st of March, and which was only published on the 29th of April. This report stated that Colonel Lamoricière had taken de combat 130 Arabians; himself having 4 killed and 20 wounded. The accounts from Oran to the 22nd of April, however, give as positive that Abdel-kader had appeared in the neighbourhood of Tlemcen with 3000 men, and had taken de combat 130 Arabians; himself having 4 killed and 20 wounded. The accounts from Oran to the 22nd of April, however, give as positive that Abdel-kader had appeared in the neighbourhood of Tlemcen with 3000 men, and had imposing body of cavalry, and had thrown the whole of that district into great alarm. It was greatly feared that this movement of the Arabian chief would destroy the long-continued project of the occupation of Tener and the camps of el Esnam and Trerca.

Before closing our musical season, it is but just to mention the brilliant success of Madame Cinti Damoreau, on her representation for the benefit of the Grande Opera. On that occasion Madame Damoreau sang in the first act of the "Ambassadrice;" the first act of "La Muette;" and the third act of "Il Barbiere di Seviglia." The house produced about 30,000 francs. Madame Damoreau and the violinist artist leave soon on an American speculation. Madame Rosi Caccia is engaged for six months at Lisbon.

We have much chit chat in the musical world. I will give a resumé of the most saillants:—Madame Pauline Garcia Viardot appeared for the first time in Vienna, in "Il Barbiere di Seviglia," and was encored several times. The King of Greece has conferred on Rossini the decoration of "The Saviour." There have been just published in Germany three very old and very celebrated sonnets—one by Luther, in 1546; another by Hasse, in 1730, and a third by Fischer, in 1787. The former production was lately produced at Bucharest, and was hissed. The journals call it barbarous music! The Academy of Sainte Cecile, at Rome, has named as honorary members—the Grand Duchess Maria Nicolowna of Russia, Prince Metternich-Lauchtenberg, the Count Matteo Walthorski, and Spontini. Within the last 50 years there have been represented at Vienna 99 German operas, from 30 different masters (24 of them obtained success), 50 were tolerated, and 13 died a natural death. Yesterday we had for the first time this season horse racing on the Champ de Mars. Do not for a moment imagine that the amusements are anything equal to those of England; quite the reverse—no music—no shows—no jugglers—no drinking booths—but, on the other hand, plenty of police agents, gens d'armes, and foot and horse soldiers in abundance.

The first race, for 1000 francs, given by the Jockey Club, 3 yrs old, was won by Prospero, the property of M. A. Rothschild, the second, for 2000 francs, 3 yrs old, was won by Karagheuse, the property of M. Sabatier; and the third, for 2000 francs, given by the Minister of Commerce, was won by Pamphile, the property of M. Pasquel. We had a hedge course, which was cleverly won by Pantaleon, the property of M. E. Mathews. I am sorry to say that M. Cremieux, one of the riders, was thrown and nearly killed.

Yesterday being the "fête" of the King was duly celebrated in the Champs Elysées, with the usual amusement of public theatres, dancing, &c. The King received the usual authorities, other public bodies, and then leaving there was a beautiful display of fire-works on the Quai d'Orsay. The weather, threatening in the morning, was most beautiful during the remainder of the day.

A M. Faulcon has invented a new species of steam-paddles, so far worthy of notice as, I understand, they are here to be applied by the French Government. The two paddles are placed in the hold of the vessel and strongly cased. The inventor promises many advantages:—1st, the paddles are not exposed to the bullets of an enemy; 2nd, the sides of the vessel are not bu ged out; and 3rd, the paddles always work, notwithstanding the heaviest weather

The lottery at the Palais Royal, in aid of the Guadaloupe fund, produced nearly £4000.

The increase in public journals in Paris within the last 30 years has been most astonishing. In 1819 there were only 45 journals or periodical writings; in 1839 there were 329; in 1837, 326; and, in 1843, 353. Are 26 daily papers.

On Saturday I was favoured with a sight of the wooden house built for the governor of the island of Marguerite, by order of the Minister of Marine. It is about 65 feet long, and 35 feet high. The ground floor is composed of seven rooms, some very spacious; the first floor, to approach which there are two staircases, has eight rooms and four cabinets; on the roof, which is covered with zinc, there are several lofts. There is an uncovered gallery, about 14 feet in width, around each story, but which is protected by an extending roof. These galleries, as well as the roof, are supported by six columns. The number of pieces of which this house is composed, and already numbered, are 86,200.

Several Catholic missionaries intend embarking on board the Phaeton for the island of Marquesas.

The English residents in Paris went into mourning on Sunday last for the late lamented Duke of Sussex.

The "post treaty," signed in London on the 3rd of April, and ratified on the 28th, has been officially published in the Moniteur. By this treaty all single letters will pay 30 c. as England, and 5d. French postage, making from London to Paris 10d. instead of 1s. 8d.

Eight hundred workmen have been dismissed from the royal arsenal at Brest.

SPAIN.—BARCELONA, April 25.—The British steam frigate Medea, Capt. Warden, arrived at Barcelona on the evening of the 24th, and relieved the Hecate, ordered to Malta. M. Gaulier d'Arc (French), Consul and Charge d'Affaires at Alexandria, took a passage in the Medea, and proceeds from Barcelona to Paris, via Perpignan. He is on sick leave.

On the afternoon of the 25th, General Cortines received an order from the Minister of War to resume the reports of the chiefs with all despatch, and to continue them until the whole of the curtain and other works are completed—30,000 dollars have also been sent to him.

It is found impossible to complete the new Municipal Council, as several of the members continue to absent themselves from Barcelona. The reason is, that most of the respectable and rich inhabitants of Barcelona avoid having anything to do with the affairs of the town.

Since the 26th no less than eleven assassinations have been committed in Barcelona and Barcelonetta.

LEGHORN, April 25.—The Grand Duke of Tuscany embarks from this place on the 19th, on board the steamer Leopold; he is accompanied by the whole of his family, and proceeds direct to Naples, for the purpose of congratulating the sister of his wife on her approaching nuptials with the Emperor of the Brazils.

MADRID.—On the night of the 23rd ult. the Queen of Spain, accompanied by her sister, the Infanta Louisa, honoured the representation of "Norma," at the Theatre del Circo, with her presence. Her Majesty was attended by the Countess Mina, the Regent, the Duke de Hijar, the Conde Santa Colonna, and the Marquis de Branciforte: her reception was most enthusiastic; no one appeared to take any notice of Espartero.

The Madrid Journals of the 25th ult. have come to hand, with private advices of the same date. The Senate had commenced on that day the debate on the address, wh ch was being continued when the latest accounts left.

PORTUGAL.—DESTRUCTION OF A JESUIT COLLEGE AT LISBON BY FIRE. The Times correspondent gives the following account of an alarming and destructive fire at Lisbon:—

[illegible] its able and observant correspondent at Lisbon, [illegible] the Jesuits' College, [illegible] the Royal Estates, [illegible] the Jesuits [illegible] Government, [illegible] the premises [illegible] Government [illegible] well-ascertained fact that the fire was so insignificant (and entirely accidental) in its origin that a couple of barrels of water might have extinguished it, but the regulations, in connection with the mode of using the building, are so very imperfect and unsatisfactory, that, before the alarm was properly given, and the poor, and in number very limited, engines of the metropolis were enabled to reach the spot, all the upper part of the building had departed. The college, which is situate towards the northern outskirts of Lisbon, and is of great extent, presenting a vast façade of considerable beauty, was speedily on fire in every part, notwithstanding the quantity of [illegible] attached to the edifice. From eight to nine o'clock the roofs fell in with an enormous crash, and the elevated position of the building, giving breadth and effect to the conflagration, rendered it one of the largest objects out of Lisbon, gave a lurid aspect to a sky in which only a few stars were visible, and was even reflected on the broad bosom of the Tagus as far as Trafaria and Val de Caens, on the opposite shore, rendering the scene more or more terrible spectacle. The wind blew from the north with such violence, that it was not possible to arrest for a moment the progress of the flames, and during the whole night, and after every active means were praiseworthy; but some idea may be formed of the degree of co-operation which prevails at the several Government departments, they were not to be had, and all attempts at extinguishing the burning, because certain official scamps had walked off with the keys! Much of the furniture and valuable scientific instruments was saved, but the total loss is estimated at not less than 20,000. Three of the British and French ships of war now lying in the Tagus rendered every assistance. The students of the school and numbers of the populace gave active assistance at the imminent risk of their lives, and some unfortunate accidents occurred. How the surrounding district escaped it is difficult to conceive. Less than twenty feet divide it from the College and the unburned houses around it; their fronts were blackened, and the stone broken in fragments, yet not one of them caught fire. The smoke and ashes sent forth from the conflagration were so thick and suffocating, as to render progress difficult at the distance of a musket shot; the flames continued to rage until after midnight, a portion of the walls was alone left standing, and 30 hours after the fire had left the ruins very still smoking. The King, the moment his Majesty heard of the disaster, repaired to the scene of the conflagration, and even personally assisted, with the generous ardour of youth, in the attempt to extinguish the flames, and save some portion of the valuable property. His Majesty received a slight wound in one of his hands. The professors of the various schools concentrated in the building likewise gave an energetic assistance, and the bulk of the valuable books in the library, with the mineralogical and chemical collections, was saved. The final organisation of these important schools had been but recently completed by the Government at the suggestion of the Queen Regent, and the remaining remnant is the blackened and tottering walls. The report of the authorities announces three lives lost, and seven persons wounded. The killed and wounded were chiefly among the sailors of the French ship-of-war Suffren, whose zeal had been stimulated by too liberal a ration of brandy."

TURKEY.—By the latest accounts from Constantinople it appears that the affairs of Servia are unchanged, and that the Divan has conceded all the demands of Russia. Prince Georgewitsch is to abdicate, his councillors and Kamil to quit Servia, and a new election to take place, probably in favour of Prince Milosch.

The Augsburg Gazette of the 20th ultimo contains the following important information relative to this long-pending dispute:—CONSTANTINOPLE, April 12. The Porte, in reply to question put to it by the Council of Ministers held in the presence of the Russian Ambassador. The following are the resolutions adopted:—Firstly, Karageorgewitsch shall voluntarily abdicate; in the event of his refusing to do so, he shall be declared to have forfeited the Governorship of Servia. Secondly, A new election of a Sovereign shall be proceeded to. Thirdly, Kiamil Pacha, Wolentin, and Petrowewitch, shall leave the Servian territory. These three resolutions are almost a verbatim repetition of the terms of the Russian Cabinet's ultimatum. The Cabinet, seconded in its views by that of Vienna, has thus [illegible] conspiracy to destroy the independence of Turkey, and over the [illegible] had striven to frustrate its designs. Under these circumstances, it is scarcely doubted that the new Sovereign about to be elected will be Prince Michael Obrenowitsch, the father of Prince Michael, who is patronised by the Emperor Nicholas.

GREECE, April 12.—Political as well as commercial affairs in this country appear to be fast progressing towards a crisis. King Otho and his Greco-Bavarian Government are as unpopular as they well can be, and persist in withholding a constitution which the Greeks consider themselves entitled to.

EGYPT.—CAIRO, April 7.—The new Transit Company, which has been formed by Mr. Tourburn, under the auspices of the Viceroy, and who has advanced the necessary funds, holds out every prospect of the passengers to and from India, through Egypt, being henceforth forwarded with the greatest regularity, comfort, and despatch, and also at fixed moderate rates.

IMPERIAL PARLIAMENT.

HOUSE OF LORDS. MONDAY.

Lord WHARNCLIFFE moved the second reading of the bill to amend the registration of electors for members of the other house of Parliament.—Lord BROUGHAM warmly eulogized Lord Grey as the author of the Reform Bill, and took credit for the very few defects which eleven years of practical experience had discovered in that measure. The great evil of the system was the annual registration, which, as the voter generally looked upon his privilege with indifference, threw upon the candidate the expense of a contest against a more watchful opponent. He would prefer that when a person had once proved that he possessed the requisite qualification, his vote should remain unchallengeable for at least the duration of the Parliament for which it was registered. This principle was also necessary in respect to members of Parliament and justices of the peace, and should hold good also in the case of the voter. He objected to that portion of the bill which rendered the receipt of parochial relief a disqualification, but approved equally the establishment of an appeal from the decisions of the revising barristers, and the vesting that power in the court of Common Pleas.—Lord DENMAN also welcomed the change an improvement which would afford an appeal to a judicial from a political body, always more or less influenced by party bias, but objected to the causes respecting personation as unnecessary, because the law already took cognizance of the offence, and sufficient as imposing too severe a penalty—one indeed much less severe than at present inflicted. A clause, too, which provided that persons attempting to personate electors might be seized and carried before a magistrate was liable to great abuse, and would add dangerously to the excitement inseparable from elections.—Lord CAMPBELL defended the registration system, but concurred with Lord Brougham in wishing to secure to the voter a more permanent possession of his franchise. He exonerated the revising barristers from all blame as to the inconsistency of their decisions, but should be glad to see their number reduced from 85 to 50, who should act constantly, instead of for only a few days in each year. He objected to the proposal for vesting an appeal in the Common Pleas; and after briefly noticing one or two other clauses, which he intended to reserve for future discussion, said that the bill should be considered in committee.—The bill was then read a second time, and the house adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS. MONDAY.

Fully two hours were occupied in the presentation of petitions against the education clauses of the Factory Bill. Some few were also presented in favour of the bill. Some private bills were advanced a stage.—Lord G. SOMERSET replied, in answer to Mr. HUME, that the report on the subject of the customs was in preparation, but not yet drawn up.—Lord STANLEY gave notice that on Monday, the 15th instant, he would submit to a committee of the whole house resolutions preliminary to the introduction of a bill for the importation of flour and wheat from Canada.—Sir J. GRAHAM, in answer to Sir S. Crossley, said he intended to go into committee on the Ecclesiastical Courts Bill on Friday, the 12th instant.—The Exchequer-bills Bill was read a third time and passed. The order of the day for going into committee, pro forma, on the Factories Bill having been read, Mr. BAINES moved that the amendment on the 4th instant be now taken, in order to state the alterations which Government proposed to introduce into it. After adverting to the excitement which it had produced in the country, he referred to the objection made against it on account of its sudden and simultaneous operation, which objection he answered by reference to the checks provided in its 56th and 65th sections. He next proceeded to the objections of the working body, which he considered as having been stated in the fairest manner, and as being entitled to the highest consideration, from the praiseworthy efforts made by that body for the advancement of education. He accordingly specified the alterations which he intended to propose in regard to those objections. The first would be the allowance of a liberty to the parents in the selection of Sunday-schools. Another would relate to the hours of attendance at the Sunday school, for the purpose of instruction in the Catechism and Liturgy of the Church, which hours he proposed to arrange for the convenience of those who might desire them, and to exempt from the operation of the clauses. The next would also be relieved from the perhaps invidious obligation which the bill in its present shape imposed upon him, of declaring that he had a ground of objection to any institution; and besides the bill would be altered on each week-day for the attendance of the children not belonging to the church upon the instruction of the licensed minister or other authorised teacher whom the parents might wish them to attend. A provision would likewise be made for the Roman Catholics, who object to the reading of the Scriptures in their entire form. With respect to the trustees, he would propose, instead of leaving the second clergyman to be nominated by the clerical trustees, the bill should give a right of election to those persons who should have been donors or subscribers of a certain amount to the school. The remaining four trustees he proposed to nominate through the election of rate-payers assessed at £10; but in order to prevent the minority from being unrepresented, he would propose that no rate-payer should be allowed to vote for more than two of these four trustees. The appointment of the head-master of the school he would leave with the bishop, but all the assistants should be appointed by the trustees. He would give to any one trustee a power of appealing to the Committee of Council against the acts of his colleagues; and he would suggest some enlargements in the powers of the Privy Council. The alterations which he had thus proposed would be in accordance with the principle of the bill as he had originally opened it, as well as with the respect which was due to the conscientious feeling of the Dissenters. If this important measure, brought forward by the Government, and treated with singular forbearance by their opponents, should, with all these advantages, fail to obtain the public approval, he feared that the chance of concord and conciliation would be gone by, and a spirit of antagonism and bitterness would long prevail throughout this country. He deprecated such a controversy, and referred to the great Christian test, "that ye love one another;" but he feared that the accusations now made in some professing Christians, and say, "See how these men hate one another!" This bill was the olive-branch which he had to tender, and he trusted that the waters of strife would now subside.—Lord J. RUSSELL approved of the hope that this bill would be accompanied with calmness. Meanwhile he begged it might be remembered that which general education was first attempted in this country through the agency of Mr. Lancaster, the dissenter. Dissenters were the foremost to aid it, both with their exertions and with their contributions. And yet he understood that one section of the Church was at this day treating those Dissenters with suspicion and obloquy; and under that sort of reproach it could not be matter of surprise if the education clauses in this bill were received with some alarm. He considered the alterations now proposed as being a more efficacious fulfilment of the original design of the Government, rather than as any departure from that design; but for the present he must conserve upon them, that the necessity of having the school-master a member of the Church would, as to all the masters, amount to a test and a disqualification.—Sir R. INGLIS inquired to what extent the masters were to have the right of teaching the peculiar doctrines of his own creed?—Sir JAMES GRAHAM answered, that the word "teach" was used in this bill in the sense to which it was confined in the British and Foreign Schools; that sense was to be an expositor, not a commentator.—Dr. BOWRING declared that the objections of the Dissenters would not be removed by the concessions already announced. Nothing short of the total abolishing of the second clause—struct on, and leaving religion to the people themselves, would satisfy them.—Mr. EWART, Mr. Hawes, Mr. M. Gibson, and Mr. Hindley expressed themselves well satisfied; and Mr. G. Sandars, Mr. Ellice, Mr. Cowan, and Lord Dungannon prayed for a calm consideration of the proposals of the Government.—The bill was read pro forma, and ordered to be printed; the further consideration to be taken on Monday.—The Municipal Corporations (Ireland) Bill was read a second time.—The house went into a committee of supply, and the votes for the expenses of the late special commission, which had been postponed from Friday last, were then made, was taken.—The house having again resolved itself into a committee of the whole house, a resolution was passed, on the motion of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, giving the Government power to issue from time to time Exchequer bills to such sums as might be necessary to defray the salaries and allowances of the Queen's Bench officers, in the event of the fees becoming deficient for that purpose.—Sergeant Murphy obtained leave to bring in a bill to amend the Grand Jury Presentments (Ireland) Act of last session.—A return of fees taken by clerks of assize and clerks of the peace was ordered, on the motion of Mr. Escott.—Adjourned at half-past two.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—TUESDAY.

On the presentation of a petition by the Duke of Argyll, praying the Lordships to take into consideration the differences that [illegible] Church of Scotland, the Marquis of BREADALBANE took occasion to treat the Government to make some declaration of concession to that Church before the meeting of the General Assembly, in order to arrest the threatened secession, which he was prepared to say would be to the extent of a hundred ministers. He maintained that the constitution of the Church had been invaded by the Legislature.—Lords Brougham, Cottenham, and Campbell entered into a long conversation, in which the law was the chief topic.—The Earl of ABERDEEN answered, that he had already made a declaration of concession on the part of the Government, which they were prepared, at a proper time, to confirm by legislative measures; that the noble Lord had not long been satisfied, with that declaration, he despaired now of being able to give [illegible] ency.—In reply to the Marquis of Lansdowne, Lord ABERDEEN explained the circumstances of the negotiations with Portugal. The intimation of the British Government had not been accepted by Portugal, and a declaration had been made by that Power, stating that the negotiations were at an end, and forbade any further overtures to be made.—In the strict translation of the word used.—The Marquis of CLANRICARDE gave notice that he would move the second reading of the Sabbath Drafranchisement Bill on Friday week.—The Duke of MARLBOROUGH moved that the noble Lord do not leave the chair, on the subject of the Corn-laws, to Thursday se'nnight.—Lord BROUGHAM moved the second reading of the Townsend Peerage Bill.—Lord COTTENHAM moved that the order of the day for the second reading be dismissed. He stated shortly the facts of the case as alleged in the bill, viz.:—That the Marquis of Townshend having been married at a certain time, after the expiration of a short period his wife left his house—that she had since been cohabiting with a Mr. Margot, and had certain children born during that col ab tation who ought to be considered to be legitimate as they never had been any bil. before the house to dissolve the marriage—and that it was proposed by the present bill to enact that the several children of Sarah Geraldine Marchioness Townshend shall be taken to be illegitimate from their birth, and sh not be taken to be the lawful issue of George Ferrers, Marquis Townshend after citing many cases, the noble and learned lord ere ard his dete on to oppose the bil, as one unprecedented and dangerous, as establishing a bad principle.—Lord Brougham implored their lordships, for the sake of justice, and for the dignity of the peerage, to pass the bill through this stage, and so enable the parties concerned to be legitimate to prove their allegations at the bar.—After a legal argument, in which the Earl of Devon, Lord Campbell, Lord Denman, and the Lord Chancellor took part, the amendment was negatived without a division, and Counsel were called in to be heard at the bar. Ten o'clock next day was then fixed for the hearing of evidence in support of the bill.

HOUSE OF COMMONS, Tuesday.

Mr. G. Berkeley moved the second reading of the Dean Forest and Gloucester Railway Bill.—Mr. Pakington moved that the bill be read a second time that day six months.—He was opposed to it on public grounds, particularly as it interfered with the navigation of the river Severn. Captain Berkeley supported the bill. The railway could not interfere with the navigation of the Severn, as the description of vessels which passed the part of the river which the railway would cross were such that could lower their masts for the purpose of passing under bridges.—Sir T. Dyke opposed the bill.—The Earl of Lincoln supported the bill; and he did so after a most careful examination of the propriety of the measure, both as regarded the necessity for the railway, and the alleged interference with the navigation of that portion of the Severn. He believed that the construction of this railway would be very advantageous to an extensive district, and several large and important towns.—After a few words from Mr. H. Berkeley, Captain Prothero, and Lord G. Somerset, Mr. Gladstone said he should support the second reading of the bill. It had been referred to the Board of Admiralty, who referred it to the opinion of a scientific gentleman in whom they placed confidence, and that gentleman thought it ought to get a second reading.—Mr. G. Berkeley replied.—The house then divided, and the numbers were For the second reading 103; Against it, 84: majority for the second reading, 19.—Sir C. Napier gave notice of his intention to bring the State of the Navy Retired List before the House on an early day.—Mr S. Crawford gave notice that, on going into committee on the Factories Bill, he would move an instruction that no system of national education could be satisfactory which gave the entire control of education to the Established Church.—Sir H. W. Barron gave notice to move, on the 5th of May, for a return of arms delivered up by the Irish yeomanry on being discharged, and also of those that had not been delivered up.—Lord J. Russell gave notice that, on next Tuesday week, he would propose the 9th and 10th of his resolutions on the subject of education. The remainder he would defer, preferring to move them substantively as amendments in committee on the Factories Bill.—Sir R. Peel gave notice that next Friday he would move that the Speaker do leave the house after Thursday, on account of the funeral of the Duke of Sussex.—In reply to Lord Dungannon, Sir R. Peel promised to lay on the table a return of the sums accruing to the Ecclesiastical Commission from the falling in of canonries, and other Church preferments, which had been applied to the augmentation of small benefices.—Mr. Hume then moved that the clauses of the house should be presented to Lord Ashburton, for having brought to a successful issue the negotiations with America, relative to the long-disputed boundary question. The hon. member resorted to all the arguments so repeatedly urged in support of the noble lord's claim to a pension, and concluded by moving the resolution of which he had given notice.—Lord Seymour seconded the motion.—Sir R. Peel abominished that a plain, honest Scotchman, like Mr. Hume, should have followed in the eccentric footsteps of Lord Brougham. The Government had originated no motion of this kind, from which it was only far to infer that Ministers did not think Lord Ashburton's services deserving of a vote of thanks. The right of visit question was unsettled, and, from the expressed opinions upon that subject of the President of the United States, there existed at the present moment every chance of collision. He would, therefore move, as an amendment, that the house should adjourn.—Captain Berkeley seconded the amendment, but thinking Lord Ashburton was not entitled to the thanks of the house, though he had no wish to cast any reflection upon his lordship.—Mr. Hervey supported the motion.—Mr. E. Buller regretted that the amendment had been made, for though he did not wish to blame Lord Ashburton he did not see why they should step out of their way to thank him. Sir H. Douglas approved of the treaty, and supported the original motion.—Mr. S. Lucas said that Sir R. Peel, on this occasion, regretted that he was unable to move the thanks of the house to Sir H. Pottinger, but it was not usual to give thanks to a diplomatic agent, and he was therefore, surprised when he perceived it to be the intention of the right hon. baronet to support a vote of thanks in the case of Lord Ashburton. He best that could be said of the noble lord's mission was, that we were well out of it.—Mr. Ward thought that by supporting the Government side of the house; but was it not strange, since they were prepared to follow him, that they had not themselves anticipated his motion, and, if they thought he deserved the thanks of the house?—Mr. C. Buller was prepared to overlook the want of precedent, believing that the treaty of Washington was a great diplomatic achievement, and highly honourable to Lord Ashburton and all concerned in it, and particularly as it settled disputes and ended between the two nations, but had actually caused the Americans so much to alter their laws that a case as that of M'Leod could never occur.—The Attorney-General was glad to find that the opinion of the country than the award of the King of the Netherlands, and the navigation of the St. John which we had conceded was more than counterbalanced by other advantages which we gained by the treaty.—Sir J. Hanmer, while admitting the importance of the treaty, protested against the establishment of a precedent which might be found very inconvenient hereafter.—Mr. Stanley said that the Government, in the ordinary course of its proceedings, could not have estab ished a new precedent by proposing the thanks of the house to a negotiator, however successful he might have been, as they were peculiar. The noble lord had been attacked by Lord Palmerston, and this it was which secured to Lord Ashburton the unprecedented honour of a vote of thanks. It had been asserted by the honourable member for Edinburgh that Lord Ashburton had by this treaty cast a stain upon British diplomacy, but, from all that had passed that evening, it had appeared that the treaty was by no means a bad one after all, and the only objection now urged against the vote was the want of a precedent. Perhaps it would be difficult to point out a treaty which had been concluded in the face of such difficulties on which had so thoroughly settled probability of a war between two great countries. Lord Ashburton was successful in concluding a treaty in a few months, which Lord Palmerston, with equal honesty and zeal in protracting for several years, failed to effect. The noble lord had even brushed the two countries that he had left a most difficult task for Lord Ashburton to accomplish, and yet in less than six months he brought it to a successful issue. He denied that Lord Ashburton had compromised the question of the right of search, although the superfluous style of Lord Palmerston in addressing a sensitive people was not imitated by Lord Aberdeen. The United States had not denied the right of search, but only denied the right of visit, which was a question for future discussion for such delay. In fact, no treaty could be made a matter of triumph, and he now considered it impossible that any treaty of Lord Ashburton, and yet he now contended it was impossible that any treaty of Lord Ashburton, and yet he now contended it was impossible that any treaty of Lord Ashburton, and yet he now contended it was

DRURY LANE THEATRE.

On Monday evening last Mr. Anderson took his benefit at this theatre, and, with correct taste, selected Shakspere's great drama, "Julius Cæsar." The principal parts were disposed of as follow:—Brutus, Mr. Macready; Cassius, Mr. Phelps; Marc Antony, Mr. Anderson; Portia, Miss Faucit; Julius Cæsar, Mr. Ryder: Casca, Mr. Bennett, &c. We never saw Mr. Anderson to so much advantage as in Marc Antony, and his whole performance gave evidence of careful study of his part.

O, pardon me, thou bleeding piece of earth, &c.,

was given with great power. The concluding lines,

Cry havoc, and let slip the dogs of war, &c.,

with fearful emphasis; and the famous oration,

Friends, Romans, countrymen, &c.,

was delivered in a style of sustained declamation, which drew down long and enthusiastic plaudits. The character of Brutus was portrayed by Mr. Macready with admirable delicacy and feeling. His great quarrel scene with Cassius was a fine illustration of the moral superiority of a well-trained mind over a bold but irritable spirit. By his quiet dignity of bearing, he reduced the storming Cassius to a point of humiliation which it was almost painful to witness; but then his generous advance towards reconciliation came like a healing balm, and rendered the character as amiable as it was admirable. Mr. Phelps made a perfect picture of the lean and irritable Cassius. He seemed to feel that he was in his element in the part. It wanted a little polish perhaps here and there, particularly in the great scene we have just referred to, where we fancied he rather over-coloured the weakness of the character. Miss Faucit performed her brief part most exquisitely. The lines

Ah me, how weak a thing
The heart of woman is! &c. &c.

were delivered with inexpressible pathos. Mr. Ryder, as Cæsar, went through his part with great dignity, and Mr. Bennet was very effective, especially in the second scene in Act 1. As a whole, it was decidedly successful—the careers of the principal characters, and there are many in this play, were watched with growing interest and attention from the beginning to the end. Each noble sentiment, as it was uttered, called down an enthusiastic response, and the curtain fell at the close of each act amidst plaudits which denoted a generous sympathy on the part of the audience. In details the play was admirable.

At the fall of the curtain Mr. Anderson and Mr. Macready were successively called for, and were loudly cheered. Some bouquets were thrown at the former, who, evidently, a little embarrassed at the circumstance, picked them up, and carried them off smiling.

Our artist has selected for his illustration the first scene in Act 5.

VIEW OF HAVRE.

The accompanying view of Havre, one of the most rising and considerable of the French sea-ports, will be interesting to the English reader, as being about to become, by the construction of a railway, one of the most important intermediate stations between this country and the French metropolis. It also derives a temporary interest from the occurrence of a devastating conflagration during the past week, the details of which will be found below.

DESTRUCTION OF THE HAVRE THEATRE.—The theatre of Havre was burnt to the ground in the night of Friday week. We regret to add that M. Fortier, the manager, who resided in the apartments attached to the theatre, lost his life. The following account of this catastrophe is from the Journal du Havre of Saturday last:—"At about half-past one o'clock this morning some persons were attracted to the Place du Spectacle by cries of distress, proceeding from the apartments of the manager, in the upper part of the theatre. The night was dark, and no sign of danger was apparent; but M. Fortier, the manager, was heard, exclaiming that the theatre was on fire, and imploring assistance. Some of the persons who had arrived at the spot ran for the engines; others called to M. Fortier to save himself. He replied—'My dear friends, it is not the engines that will be of immediate use, but a ladder, for I am suffocating; the smoke is gaining rapidly upon me: run to the scene-room, where you will find ladders.' At this moment the smoke was seen forcing its way through the roof of the theatre. Some persons ran to the scene-room at the back of the theatre and obtained ladders, but time had been lost in searching for the keys. The ladders were placed in front of the theatre, but unfortunately they were so short as scarcely to reach to the windows of the saloon. While this was going on M. Fortier got out of his window, and his female servant, who was the only resident in the building besides himself, took his place at it. He held by the ridge of the attic, and with seeming calmness awaited relief. When asked by the persons below how he proposed to escape from his perilous position, he suddenly exclaimed—'I can bear it no longer, I am suffocating; it is useless, my friends, I burn, and must throw myself off;' and at the same moment he jumped to the ground from a height of twenty metres (more than sixty feet). He came upon the pavement on his feet, but immediately fell senseless. He still breathed, and would perhaps have recovered, if, by a deplorable fatality, the servant, on seeing the desperate act of her unfortunate master, had not followed the example, and fallen upon his body. When taken up he was a corpse. The servant, who was still alive, was taken to the hospital in a senseless state. She had one of her legs broken, and had received other injuries; she expired this morning. Whilst this tragic scene was taking place in the presence of the few persons who were on the spot, and of the inhabitants of the neighbouring houses, who, being disturbed, had risen from their beds, the fire was gaining ground, and immense columns of smoke were rising in the air. The drums now beat, the tocsin was sounded, and from all parts the inhabitants rushed to the scene of the disaster. The seamen of the Entrepôt were amongst the first who came. It was soon ascertained, however, that there was no chance of saving the theatre, and that all that could be done was to prevent the extension of the fire to the adjoining buildings and this splendid quarter of the town. It was now half-past two; the flames had become visible, and were forcing their way through all the windows of the theatre. The wind was to the south-east, and blew the flames directly towards the houses, which are only separated from the theatre by the Rue Corneille. It was on this point that the engines played, and, happily, with success. At half-past 3 the whole of the interior of the theatre was a vast furnace, and a loud explosion announced that the gas-pipes had burst. A portion of the roof now began to give way, and the flames finding an issue through it, rushed forth in an enormous body, scattering burning fragments to a great distance. Some fell on the roof and into the garrets of houses, and others even on the Quai d'Orléans. The danger was now become imminent for the vessels moored to the east of the bassin du Roi, and an order was given for them to remove. Towards four o'clock the whole of the roof fell in. A loud cracking of the building was heard, and the streets were blocked up with portions of the freeze and entablature. At day-break all danger to the surrounding buildings was at an end, but the fire continued to rise at the theatre. Whilst we are writing it is still burning, and consuming the portions which had remained intact. Nothing remains but the four walls and the façade, with the calcined dial of the new clock. Measures have been taken to maintain order and prevent accidents. The crowd is kept at a distance, and the engines are on the spot, ready for renewed action, in the event of their being required. The cause of the fire is not yet known. It is presumed that it had its origin under the stage, where the attendance of machinists had been rendered necessary by the performance of "Robert le Diable." The first alarm was given by a young man to the porter, by whom it was communicated to M. Fortier, who retaining all his sang-froid, roused his servant, and before he attempted to escape put on some articles of dress, and secured some papers. But the alarm was given too late; all the issues from the theatre were blocked up by flame and smoke, and M. Fortier was compelled to return to his apartment, in the hope of saving himself by the exterior. M. Fortier was a clever actor and an intelligent and generous man. He is universally regretted, and the regret is the more painful on account of the horrible nature of his death. The theatre was opened for the first time on the 22nd of August, 1823. The building of it, imperfect as it was, is estimated to have cost the town 1,600,000f. It was not insured. In consequence of this sad event, the rejoicings for the King's fête on Monday are suspended by an order of the mayor."

A few weeks ago some labourers who were grubbing up the roots of trees in Tufnell-park, Holloway, the property of Mr. H. Tufnell, M.P., found 300 sovereigns, which it was subsequently ascertained had been buried there by Mr. Frost, an ironmonger in St. John-street, Clerkenwell, whilst labouring under temporary insanity. Mr. Frost has since entirely recovered the use of his reason, and had a faint recollection that he buried another and a larger sum somewhere about the same spot. On Tuesday morning last Mr. Frost and his brother visited the place, and after they had been about two hours employed in digging up the ground with trowels, they found a pewter vessel containing 400 sovereigns, a few perches distant from the place in which the 300 sovereigns had been found. They took the treasure in the first instance to the station-house, and then to their own residence.

REMARKABLE CASE OF CONSCIENCE.—The Suffolk Herald publishes the following:—"Our readers may frequently have seen advertisements in the daily papers acknowledging, on the part of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, certain payments made by anonymous persons, who, having defrauded the revenues, make this restitution, and it is called 'conscience money.' A remarkable instance of this kind has come to us from a most creditable source. An individual wrote a letter to the Exchequer-office, saying, that although he had returned his income-tax correctly on his ostensible business, yet that he was extensively engaged in smuggling, and as his returns from that source were very great, he had it on his conscience not to have made any return of that, and he therefore enclosed, as the amount of three years' tax, £14,000! Every effort has been made to discover the conscientious contrabandist, but hitherto without effect. The fact may be relied on."

EXTON CHURCH PARTIALLY DESTROYED BY LIGHTNING.

On the 25th of April the northern portion of Rutlandshire was visited by a terrific hailstorm, accompanied with thunder and lightning, when the fine old church was struck by the latter, and its spire destroyed for several yards downwards. The shock was awful at the moment the church was struck, and large volumes of smoke were seen issuing from various parts of the fabric. Broken fragments and stones have been forced through the roof and demolished the leads. Large stones have been carried from the church to a considerable distance. The roof is completely open to the sky. The windows are most of them shattered to pieces. The organ loft and pews underneath have suffered severely from the melted lead running down. Large portions of the roofing, with lead, broken beams, rafters, &c., are very dangerous. Grave stones are broken and smashed, and the churchyard as well as the church itself presents a very mutilated appearance.

One of the celebrated mansions in the county is the Exton-hall, of the period of Elizabeth, the property of the Noels, earls of Gainsborough.

POPULAR PORTRAITS.—No. XXVIII.

SIR HENRY HARDINGE, M.P.

There are no men who "fall in," to use a military phrase, to important political offices in the state with more apparent ease, or fill them with greater credit, than the soldier of high character and standing in his own profession. The respect they have gained in one character secures them consideration in the other. Even though their talents for the administration of civil affairs may not be of the very first order, the honour which is the invariable attribute of the British officer ensures a firm confidence in their integrity: their probity is unquestioned even by those who differ the most widely from them in political opinion. There cannot be a finer example of this than in the character of the present illustrious head of the army. His personal character, with its frequent exhibitions of a plain, direct, unequivocating honesty of speech and purpose, has often won the praise of those who bitterly denounced the principles on which he has conducted and now conducts his Government, for it is not affirming too much to say that in his hands a large share of the power of the present Ministry is placed. Those who have exercised great power and almost unlimited responsibility are often found far above even the temptation of committing a mean or unworthy action: they are not so safe from the commission of what must frequently be considered great crimes, as the history of Napoleon abundantly proves. Our great dramatist, in painting the fall of Marc Antony, makes him lament as his greatest degradation that he should be compelled to temporise with the "Roman boy;" to encounter his enemy, not with force, but intrigue, and to stoop,

> To patter in the shifts of lowness—I,
> Who with half the bulk o' the world play'd as I pleased,
> Making and marring fortunes."

PORTRAIT OF SIR HENRY HARDINGE.

It is a sense of the great degradation the high character for honour stamped on a man by such employments must undergo before it can adopt the common artifices of political deception that makes men yield so high a consideration to those of the profession of arms whom position and the accidents of party have called to exercise an influence upon civil affairs. It is, as we before observed, possessed in a high degree by the Duke of Wellington, and, though playing minor parts on the stage of politics, it is shared by such men as Sir George Murray, Sir Howard Douglas, and the subject of our present sketch, Sir Henry Hardinge, the present Secretary at War. Looking both at the man and the office, it strikes us as an advantage to the army to have its government directed by members of the military profession.

Sir Henry Hardinge is the third son of the Rev. H. Hardinge, rector of Stanhope, Durham, and was born in 1785. He entered the army at a very early age indeed, in 1794, but the system of that day was very different from the present. He could not have entered active service in the early part of the war of the Revolution, but as a "Peninsular officer" he acquired a high military reputation. He served throughout the campaigns of Spain and Portugal, and was present at the battles of Busaco, Albuera, "lavish of its dead," at the terrible storming of Badajos, at the battles of Salamanca, Vittoria, the Pyrenées, Nivelle, Nive, and Orthes. For his services in these actions he has received a cross and five clasps, many foreign orders, and the title and honour of K.C.B. He terminated his career of active service on the bloody field of Waterloo, in which memorable battle he lost an arm, for which loss, we believe, he enjoys a pension of £300 a year. For some years, from 1809 to 1813, he acted as Deputy Quartermaster-General of the Portuguese army. In 1823 he was appointed Clerk of the Ordnance, which office he filled till 1828, when he was made Secretary at War; in 1830 he was appointed Chief Secretary for Ireland, but of course lost office, with his party, on the break up of the Duke of Wellington's Ministry in the same year. In 1834 he was again named Secretary for Ireland, but resigned the post in April, 1835. He entered Parliament in 1828, as member for Durham: he has also sat for Newport and St. Germain (Cornish boroughs), and at present is member for Launceston.

At a Board held at the Royal College of Physicians, London, on Saturday, the 29th ult., Sir H. Halford, Bart., president, the following gentlemen were examined, and obtained their degrees of membership:—Mr. W. T. Ballantine, surgeon Royal Navy; Mr. J. Cale, Ludgvan, Isle of Man; Mr. S. Newington, A.B., Oxford; Mr. G. Moore, Hastings; Mr. W. Major, Hungerford, Berks; Mr. W. Ironside, Yeovil; [illegible]. In the Circuit Court of Justiciary, at Glasgow, on Friday week, Charles Mackay was charged with the crime of murder, in so far as on the [illegible] day of December last, he attacked and assaulted Catharine M'Kenzie, his wife, who [illegible] died. The prisoner pleaded guilty, "but not with intent to murder." The plea was rejected by the Advocate Depute, and the case went to trial. After the examination of several witnesses, Lord Medwyn summed up the evidence, and the jury having retired about twenty minutes, returned with a verdict, finding Mackay guilty as libelled. Lord Medwyn then assumed the black cap, and in the most solemn manner sentenced the prisoner to be executed on Thursday the 18th day of May next. The prisoner during the time the sentence was being passed stood upon his feet, and exhibited considerable firmness. The court was much crowded during the trial.

NEW ENGLISH PROTESTANT CHURCH AT ATHENS.

The church represented in the engraving has been erected at Athens principally by the voluntary donations of the English residents and travellers, aided by a grant from the British Government. The style is pointed, the design having been furnished by Mr. Cockerell; the church is built of stone, and the walls are particularly massive; it is calculated that there will be accommodation for 500 to 600 people. It was a happy and a proud day for the Christian of every denomination, and especially the Protestant, to witness the consecration of this church, dedicated to the Triune Jehovah, very near the spot where about 1800 years before stood an altar inscribed to the unknown God! The interesting ceremony of the consecration was performed on Palm Sunday, the 9th of April, by the Right Rev. the Bishop of Gibraltar, who came expressly for this object from Malta; the Rev. Messrs. Leeves, Miles, Lake, Rawley, Tucker, Hill (the American missionary), and Hilner, assisted the Right Rev. Bishop. His lordship preached a very impressive sermon from the 1st Corinthians, 3d chapter, 11th verse:—"For other foundation can no man lay than that is laid, which is Jesus Christ."

Among others there were present, her Majesty's Minister Plenipotentiary and Lady Lyons; Mr. P. Griffith, secretary of legation; Mr. Green, her Majesty's consul, and his family; the Grand Duchess of Oldenburg and suite; the Swedish and Dutch ministers; General Sir R. Church; Captain Sir J. Sterling, commanding her Majesty's ship Indus, and several of her officers, as also of the Devastation steam frigate; Mr. Sergeant Heath and family; the Queen of Greece's chaplain; several of the Greek clergy, and all the English, Scotch, and Americans residing at or visiting Athens.

We are indebted for the original of the above engraving to the kindness of a gentleman residing in Greece. The view is from the ruins of the beautiful temple of Jupiter Olympus.

INTERIOR OF ST. GEORGE'S CHURCH, HANOVER-SQUARE.

This noble church, situated on the east side of Great George-street and the corner of Maddox-street, was built by Gibbs in 1724, and is one of the most elegant churches in the metropolis, greatly surpassing Wren's designs in the classical dignity which it derives from its portico, while it is certainly not otherwise inferior to them. It is one of the fifty new churches voted by Parliament, and was dedicated, in compliment to the reigning king, to St. George. It has a plain substantial body, with a stately and unique hexastile Corinthian portico, and a handsome and well-proportioned steeple: it can only be viewed in profile; but, "were it not for two or three intervening houses, it would be seen in the noblest point of light in the world." The ground upon which this church stands was given by Lieutenant-General William Stewart, who also bequeathed £4000 towards erecting and endowing a charity-school.

The interior, as the engraving shows, is handsomely fitted. Over the altar is a large painting of the Lord's Supper, said to have been executed by Sir James Thornhill. The parish, originally taken from that of St. Martin-in-the-Fields, is one of the most opulent in the metropolis, and the church is celebrated for the number of "marriages in high life" performed within it. Thus, on Tuesday last, were married here, by the Right Rev. the Lord Bishop of Rochester, Sir Thomas Moncrieffe, Baronet, of Moncrieffe House, Perthshire, to the Lady Louisa Hay, eldest daughter of the Earl and Countess of Kinnoull. Among the company present were the Marquis and Marchioness of Camden, the Earl and Countess of Dalhousie, the Earl and Countess of Jersey and Lady Clementina Villiers; the Earl and Countess of Haddington; the Earl and Countess of Rosebery, and Lady Anne Primrose; the Marquis of Bresadalbane; Lord and Lady Willoughby d'Eresby and Miss Willoughby; Admiral Sir Charles Rowley, Bart., G.C.B.; Captain Rowley, R.N., &c.

This church has also been this week the scene of one of the most gratifying spectacles that could possibly gladden the heart of a Christian, namely, the confirmation of several hundred adults, many of them members of the first families in the land, by the Bishop of London.

MUSIC.

ANCIENT CONCERTS.—The fourth concert (of the season) took place on Wednesday evening, under the direction of the Archbishop of York. Though many first-rate productions were to be found in the programme, yet we have to complain of the incongruity and medley manner in which theatrical music was mixed up with ecclesiastical. If the selection be always made by the director of the evening, we must confess that Earl Howe displayed an infinite deal more of taste and judgment in the choice of the previous concert's programme than have been exhibited in that of last Wednesday. Miss Birch sang "The marvellous work" most admirably. Madame Caradori Allen executed two charming airs of the immortal Gluck in her very best manner. Mr. Bennett was very happy in the portions from the "Creation;" but the gem of the evening was Herr Staudigl, who sang two airs by Mozart in a most finished and masterly manner. We must not omit to mention Mr. Williams, who performed a clarionet obligato accompaniment with beautiful tone, taste, and precision. By the way, there was not a single morceau of English music in the whole selection! Rich as the library of this society is in the greatest ecclesiastical music of the world, it is strange that his grace totally forgot, or could overlook, the names of Purcell, Tallis, Gibbons, Wilbye, &c., whose noble church services are worth all the theatrical noisy Continental masses that were ever written by even Mozart, Haydn, or Beethoven. They abound with a holy dignity which accords "with dim-lit aisles, and organ's solemn sound," and fill the heart with a deep piety that is sure to be dissipated by fiddles and other instruments that are associated with the theatre.

THE THEATRES.

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.

That most mercurial of all comic operas, "Il Barbiere di Seviglia," has been within the last few days twice represented at this house with a perfection which it never before attained, the cast being the most powerful that we have hitherto been delighted with. Great as Formasari is in characters of intense feeling and tragic grandeur, we know not which to incline to the more—his serious dignity and passion, or his buffa breadth and freedom. He is, like Garrick, between Thalia and Melpomene, and seeming to say, "How happy could I be with either!" His Figaro has proved him to be a dramatic vocalist of the most extraordinary yet consistent kind. Of Lablache's Dr. Bartolo, a part before his time usually consigned to an inferior, we know not how to speak in terms sufficiently descriptive of its vis comica, and thorough knowledge of the delicate shades of theatrical portrait painting. He is a most consummate artiste, and excited the house frequently beyond its usual decorum by his graphic delineation of the old guardian. Mario is very much improved in voice, style, and deportment, and was a perfect personation of the Spanish nobleman. Grisi was as enchanting as ever in Rosina, and sang with a freshness of voice and manner that were quite delicious. Altogether the opera was one of the most delightful treats of this or any other season. The house continues to be crowded.

DRAMATIC AND MUSICAL CHIT CHAT.

MR. BALFE.—At last the new opera by this popular composer has made its appearance at the Opera Comique, and met with, according to some, an indifferent reception; but selon des autres, a very different one, being highly applauded throughout. No doubt there is a little jealousy on the part of our French neighbours; but taking all things into consideration, the production of a successful opera in their capital, in their own language too, by an island foreigner, is alike creditable to his genius and their patronage.

A NEW SOPRANO.—A Signora Adelaide Gambaro has just appeared at the Italian Opera, Berlin, in Mercadante's "Gabrielle di Vergy," and created an extraordinary sensation, both as a singer and an actress.

SCRIBE.—We regret to learn that the health of this thousand-and-one dramatist is seriously affected. His present indisposition is attributed to over-exertion and fatigue in his professional pursuits.

M. DREYSCHOCK.—The rehearsal of the fourth concert of the Philharmonic Society, this season, takes place to-day (May 6th), on which occasion this extraordinary pianist will be heard for the first time in this country. We shall soon want a new vocabulary to describe the powers of modern instrumentalists. This young artiste, we learn, as far as execution goes, leaves all rivalry at a distance, and possesses a beautiful singing style, coupled with the most hard learning of an able contrapuntist. One of his tours de force is to play whole chapters in the stile antico with the stile moderno, with which single notes have been astonishingly executed by the hitherto-supposed first-rates!

SOMETHING MORE EXQUISITE STILL!—The Parisian dilettanti have scarcely recovered from the extraordinary effects produced upon them by Dreyschock, than they fall into raptures on hearing the performance of M. Adolfe Wilkmers, who first appeared at Hamburgh, and subsequently at the concert of the Conservatoire at Paris. His success was such as to obliterate all memories of predecessors. He plays, and with one hand, a movement combining a tema sostenuto, a solid basso marcato, and a dazzling bravura arpeggio at the same time!

MR. PARISH ALVARS.—This unrivalled harpist gave a concert in the Court Theatre at Gotha (the use of which was granted to him by his Serene Highness the Duke), on the 15th ult., which was honoured with the highest patronage of the locality. Will England ever learn to foster her native talent before it has received the stamp of the Continent?

IRELAND.

Great consternation was caused in Dublin on Monday morning last by the dismal announcement that Mr. Finn, the City Treasurer, elected by the "Reformed" Town Council, had avanted off a couple of Irish exemplars, with him corporate funds to the tune of £4000 or £5000. On the discovery of his absence instant pursuit was made, Sir D. J. Dickenson, accountant of the corporation, having left Dublin the previous night in the hope of catching the missing bird ere he winged his transatlantic flight, but it is supposed without success, as the Great Western was expected to sail from Liverpool at nine o'clock on Saturday morning. Mr. Walsh, a wealthy merchant, and Mr. Nolan, a rich pawnbroker, are Mr. Finn's sureties to the amount of £2000 each.

It was rumoured that the names of 36 magistrates had been struck off the roll is for taking part in the Repeal of the Union agitation.

The Lord Lieutenant was to have left Dublin for England on Wednesday or Thursday week, but, in consequence of a pressing communication from Government, it is stated that his excellency's departure is now indefinitely postponed.

It is rumoured that the Government have determined to prevent the great repeal meeting, advertised to take place on the Curragh of Kildare, on Sunday next, and which Mr. O'Connell has announced it as his intention to attend.

It is stated that Mr. O'Connell has declared it as an intention not to obey the call of the house on the 11th ult., and that he will not come over from Ireland unless forced to do so in the custody of the Sergeant-at-Arms.

THE MARKETS.

CORN EXCHANGE.—Since our last reports the arrivals of English wheat have been very moderate, but of fair average quality. On each market day the attendance of both town and country has been somewhat numerous, and the demand, for all kinds of grain, has ruled steady, and, in some few instances, an advance of 1s. per quarter has been obtained for the finest parcels of white Essex. In foreign wheats more business has been passing, but we have no improvement to notice in the quotations. Barley and beans have been a steady, but by no means brisk, inquiry, at full rates of currency; but malt has proved a mere drug, and been neglected by the trade. The oat trade has ruled steady, and the prices are been generally maintainance. Beans, peas, and flour have sold slowly, at late rates.

English Wheat, Essex and Kent, red, 41s to 43s, ditto white, 45s to 52s; Norfolk and Suffolk, red, 39s to 40s; ditto, white, 42s to 45s; rye, 34s to 36s; grinding barley, 27s to 29s; malting ditto, 34s to 36s; Chevalier 37s to 38s; Lincoln and Norfolk malt, 56s to 62s; brown oats, 20s to 24s; harvest ditto and Ware, 25s to 27s; potato ditto, 19s to ——; Yorkshire and Lincolnshire feed oats, 17s to 21s; potato ditto, 19s to ——; Youghal and Cork, black, 17s to 19s; ditto white, 19s to 20s; tick beans, new, 34s to 36s; ditto, old, 34s to 37s; grey peas, 36s to 38s; maple, 38s to 40s; white, 36s to 38s; boilers, 42s to 37s per quarter. Town-made flour, 44s to 48s; Suffolk, 38s to 40s; Stockton and Yorkshire, 36s to 38s per 280 lbs. Foreign—Free wheat, 50s to 58s. In Bond—Barley, 30s. oats, new, 15s to 17s; ditto feed, 14s to 16s; beans, 34s to 36s; peas, 36s to 38s per quarter. Flour, American, 24s to 25s. Bags, 2s. per sack.

ARRIVALS.—English wheat, 1780 barley, 1920, oats, 2640; and malt, 1050 flour, 3050 sacks. Irish—oats, 4010 quarters. Foreign—wheat, 4170; and barley ——.

The Seed Market. The season having been brought to a general conclusion, the demand for all kinds of seed, since this day se'nnight, has ruled dull, at almost the usual currencies. The following are the present prices:—Linseed, English, sowing, 48s to 57; Baltic, crushing, 42s to 46s. Mediterranean and Odessa, 40s to 46s, sowing, 42s to 48s per quarter. Coriander, 12s to 18s per cwt; brown mustard, 12s to 14s; white ditto, 10s to 16s 6d; tares, 4s to 4s 9d per bushel. English rapeseed, new, £30 to £—— per last of ten quarters. Linseed cakes, English, £5 0 to £10 10s; ditto foreign, £7 to £7 10s per 1000; rapeseed cakes, £5 5 to £5 per ton.

Bread.—The prices of wheaten bread are from 7½d to 7¾d, of household ditto, 5d to 6½d for the 4lb. loaf.

Imperial Weekly Average.—Wheat, 47s 7d; barley, 28s 7d; oats, 17s 6d; rye, 29s 3d, beans, 36s 9d; peas, 36s 3d.

Imperial Average of the Six Weeks which govern Duty.—Wheat, 46s 4d; barley, 28s 6d; oats, 17s 4d; rye, 30s 9d; beans, 36s 1d; peas, 36s 0d per quarter

Duties on Foreign Corn.—Wheat, 20s; barley, 7s; Oat, 8s, Rye, 11s 6d, Beans, 11s 6d; Peas, 11s 6d

Tea.—The imports of tea, direct from China, continue on a liberal scale, upwards of 1,200,000 lbs having arrived in London and at Liverpool within the last ten days. In consequence of this part, on the last instant, was [illegible] the black, and 1d to 2d per lb on the finer kinds, causing a total of 2½d to 3d per lb. Since the 1st instant [illegible] at the same rate, and the deliveries of this year have been 11,741,662 lbs, against 11,418,287 [illegible] during the first year. Out of the 60,000 packages submitted for public sale, about [illegible] were sold. The private sales disposed of. By private contract the transactions are of a limited character, and no change can be quoted in prices.

Sugar.—The demand for most kinds of raw sugar—the supply of which in good the week has ruled steady, yet, in some instances, a slight decline in the late advices to us the quotations. The refined market has ruled dull, and the tendency is in favour of the buyer. Grocers' lumps may be had at 72s per cwt

Coffee. The market remains very flat, and sales cannot be effected except at reduced prices. Sales of good ordinary Ceylon may be made at 40s per cwt.

Indigo.—Small parcels of East India indigo brought to the hammer last week continued to be taken off the market at about the prices realized at the last sale, but to a quantity passed under the hammer.

Oils.—Although the market is not flat the prices are generally maintained, with larger supplies of oil on offer

Provisions.—The demand for old Irish butter continues dull, and to effect sales the holders are obliged to accept very low rates. Foreign butter is in increased supply, and the market presents a very gloomy appearance. In the choicest parcels of the best Friesland nothing like to 90s per cwt. Last week's quotations are unaltered, with little doing.

Tallow. The market is quiet, but prices are steadily maintained; 42s to 43s 6d continue to be paid for fine yellow candle on the spot, and 41s 3d to 42s 3d for second sorts. Small American sales remain from 34s to 35s per cwt. The letters from St. Petersburg report the market dull; prices about equal to 4s 1d and down here for August delivery. The last reported season's supply is 110 to 120,000 casks

Lard.—This market is very dull, and the late depression in the prices is still maintained.

Hams.—The public sales of wool have progressed steadily this week, and prices have risen 1d per lb. The imports are good.

Hops.—There is nothing to report in the value of any description of hops, and the transactions reported this week fully equal ever

Potatoes.—In consequence of the late increase in the supplies of green vegetables, the demand for potatoes is somewhat abated, late rates.

Smithfield.—We have been supplied with each kind of fat stock, since our last statement, and the demand has proved heavy at drooping prices. Beef, from 2s 8d to 3s 10d; mutton, 2s 8d to 3s 8d; lamb, 4s 8d to 5s 4d; veal, 3s 4d to 4s 4d; and pork, from 3s 2d to 3s 8d per 8lb.

Newgate and Leadenhall.—Our markets have received a larger supply of fat cattle since last return to per [illegible] England this week, and we have to report a very dull general inquiry, on the following terms. Beef, from 2s 6d to 3s 8d; mutton, 2s 8d to 3s 8d; lamb, 4s 8d to 5s 4d; veal, 3s 4d to 4s 4d; and pork, 3s 2d to 3s 8d, by the carcase. ROBERT HARVEY.

COMMERCE AND MONEY.

At Liverpool and Glasgow, although the arrivals of cotton wool have already been unusually large, and still continue to be so, the supplies are weekly on the increase, the demand has considerably fallen off, and prices are weekly lower. Our letters from Manchester are not quite so unfavourable as they were a month ago, but the present tone is not the one on which we can be enabled to improve the quality of our cotton goods, but, also, to a certain extent, to dispose of them to the retail trade on reasonably moderate terms. They are enabled to do so, more cheaper, because the foreign purchasers now universally is amply sufficient for regular purposes, being made by them, and therefore the manufacturers, for the present at all events, do not [illegible] to the wool. Some few months since, we have to report a very gloomy state of affairs, and the [illegible] of the manufacturing districts. For China, the large orders are in the course of execution, and upon the whole it is most satisfactory to [illegible] present favourable ground, as seldom has been at a more wholesome state of [illegible] manufacturers than it is at [illegible] moment.

The very mottled prices of commodities, whether they be of manufacturing or of agricultural [illegible], and the fluctuations to which commerce generally is now subjected, render the present the most difficult period for the merchant, banker, and manufacturer to [illegible] unusually small in their amount, even the channel very little more [illegible] now finds employment. The rates of discount, [illegible] a class of good character have seldom been lower than they are at the present moment, but [illegible] to well-established [illegible] probably equal, [illegible] discounts continue to be charged. Had the Bank of England not [illegible] be made on Monday next, the [illegible] of the Directors would have [illegible] the Exchequer bills. In the course of the week [illegible] to 96¾, but they have [illegible] since advanced to 97, and [illegible] cent. The [illegible] Spanish securities [illegible] April is in every way satisfactory. The [illegible] of Senade to our Indian empire secures the [illegible] to be in no small degree to our commerce many rich and powerful nations in [illegible] and the [illegible] of one hundred millions of [illegible] information to our capitalists. Everything we also understand progresses favourably [illegible] the Chinese empire.

On the Foreign Stock Exchange the attention of speculators, jobbers, and of brokers has generally been [illegible] to Spanish Three per Cents, which, we have [illegible] undergone rather violent fluctuations. They have been as high as 20, and as low as 18. An express from Madrid, dated on the 30th ult [illegible] here on Thursday last, did not improve the estimation of them, for [illegible] the assurances of the late ministerial circulars to be the President of the Council [illegible] favourable to Spanish credit. The business done at American securities has not been large, but their value has ever fully supported. Dutch stock is also fully as dear, and rather even [illegible] than it was [illegible] in this quarter. In the arguments [illegible] a decided impression prevailed in the value of the shares of [illegible] but [illegible] the close of them partly recovered their previous prices before the end of the week. Upon the whole, however, little business has been exhibited in the money market since our last publication

LAUNCH OF HER MAJESTY'S STEAM YACHT "VICTORIA AND ALBERT."

This magnificent steam-vessel, constructed for the use of her Majesty, was launched from the royal dockyard at Pembroke on Wednesday week. The ceremony of naming the vessel was performed by Lady Cawdor, at the express desire of her Majesty, and, precisely at half-past three o'clock, the last supporter was knocked away, and the Victoria and Albert glided gently and gracefully into the water amidst the cheers of the assembled thousands. The dockyard band, which was in attendance, then struck up "God save the Queen," and immediately ten thousand voices joined in singing the national anthem.

The following are the principal dimensions of the vessel:—Length, extreme, 225 ft.; on the deck, 205 ft.; between perpendiculars, 200 ft.; of keel for tonnage, 181 ft. 2 in.; breadth outside paddle-boxes, 59 ft.; for tonnage, 33 ft.; moulded, 31 ft. 11 in.; depth in hold, 22 ft.; burthen in tons, 1049. She is divided into five watertight compartments, and her engines (by Messrs. Maudsley) are of 450 horse power. Her construction is entirely novel, and according to designs prepared by the surveyor of the navy. She is considered by competent judges to be superior in point of beauty, buoyancy, and strength to any other description of steam-vessel ever produced in this country; and the Earl of Haddington, first lord, and Admiral Sir George Cockburn, first sea lord of the Admiralty, are the individuals who suggested this fitting accommodation for her Majesty. Some idea may be formed of the novel style of her construction, as well as of her great strength, when it is stated that she is built only with plank; the first two layers being of oak, one inch and three quarters thick, placed across each other diagonally, at an angle of forty-five degrees, the outside plank being of larch, three inches thick, lying longitudinally, or with the sheer of the ship, and the whole being bound up with vertical and diagonal iron bands. Between each layer of plank the surface is covered with thick tarred felt: the vessel, therefore, cannot leak, nor be in the least degree damp inside; and being divided into five compartments by four watertight bulkheads extending as high as the state deck, it is impossible for the body ever to sink, although it might be bilged in any part from accident. Her keel was laid on the 9th of November, 1842, the anniversary of the birth of his Royal Highness the Prince of Wales; and the greatest praise is due to the respective authorities for the skilful arrangements and extraordinary exertions made in building this ship in the winter months in the short period of only twenty-three weeks. She is to be taken forthwith into dock to be coppered; and when rigged will appear as in our engraving, the drawing for which has been obtained from an official source.

The three annexed engravings illustrate the construction of the vessel. In the third cut are shown the inside planks, caulked; and the second planks, over the first, caulked, and well fastened with copper screws through both planks. Over all is a sheathing of three inches.

NEWMARKET FIRST SPRING MEETING AND ITS EFFECTS.

The sport of racing began in earnest with the Craven week at Newmarket, and now its business is at high 'change. The last four days have made ample amends for the flat and unprofitable anniversary so recently held at Chester. It is to be devoutly wished that another year may call us to a more worthy exhibition, and more worshipful company, in that venerable city, and also that we may not again find the course of the Dee making an attempt to run over Lausdowne Hill; in plain English, that Chester and Bath meetings may not clash next season as they did this. With these provisions turn we to the pleasant times and pleasant tidings to which our present paper is devoted. The first spring is the most popular of all the Newmarket meetings. It so immediately precedes Epsom, and so regularly organises a favourite—whether on true or false premises it matters not—that, malgré the strong muster of two-year old débutants and débutantes that takes place in the October weeks, the middle meeting, as the natives term it, is the cynosure of all true turfites. The present was a golden one—lots of two and three hundred sovereigns sweepstakes were to be disposed, sundry matches, such as our forefathers used to disport in, for want of knowing what to do with their money—and would not the "Two Thousand" be a foregone conclusion of the Derby? With such prospects, May-day dawned upon the Beacon and the Warren-hills. The attendance by no means equalled that of which the sport and the weather seemed to give assurance. On Monday the town was comparatively empty, and the front of the rooms presented a beggarly account. The racing, too, was third-rate. Old St. Francis with old Sam—as the young stable scamps call him—won the fifty-pound long journey plate. Canton, a Derby nag, and Cowslip, an Oaks filly, won a couple of mendicants sweepstakes. Sir Harry, the Dirce colt, supported the colour of Scott's stable, by winning a £300 match, and so the opening-day concluded.

Tuesday began, as the daily papers announced, by a certain Mr. "Newcome" (Johnny?) "attending on the flats with his hawks." We have authority for stating that the Newmarket hawks are able to take care of their own flats. Thus speaking of flats we come naturally to the great event of the day—the "Two Thousand." Here was a net—£1350 going a-begging, only three to start for it, and one backed at 3 to 1 to win! This was Cotherstone, and the way he disposed of Cornopian and Wild Duck showed they might have backed him at ten times the odds. This year the winner of this stake beats a miserable field of three, and is fancied at 2 to 1 for the Derby; last year Meteor beat a tolerable field of seven for it, and it was 40 to 1 for his Epsom engagement. To be sure he never went to Surrey at all, but his people only could have been sure of that pull. On this day, also, Lord Exeter won a stake worth £300 with a colt worth, probably, £80; and Lord George Bentinck another, worth £400, because some of his opponents were dead, and others "wrong nominations." Now who shall say that the turf is so very desperate a forlorn hope.

Wednesday, full of fun for the lovers of sport, and affliction for the industrious fielders, did nothing for the events to come; and Thursday's influence on the Oaks betting had not shown itself when our report left. The result of the meeting, so far as our dates reach, has been to leave two horses (one dark as a three-year-old) backed at a point less than even for the Derby. Who, with memories Spaniel, Mundig, Phosphorus, Amato, Bloomsbury, and Little Wonder, will refuse to try his luck at such figures as these:—

NEWMARKET, WEDNESDAY NIGHT—LATEST BETTING.

THE FASHIONS.

PARIS, Rue Chaussée d'Antin, May 1, 1848.

Mon cher Monsieur,—Though the fête of Longchamps may this year be considered as a decided failure, so far as fashion is concerned generally, still the last day was sufficiently fair to tempt numerous cavaliers, and some few brilliant equipages. In all these, however, winter toilettes were the only ones observable, and so far from offering anything new, or very elegant, or noticeable, it was a general remark that the only thing at all piquant at the fête was the extreme cold. Fortunately, if the holy week was ridiculously cold, Easter day has been sufficiently warm to make us some amends, by permitting the exhibition of our spring toilettes in the public promenades. These, though as yet very timidly shown, and half hidden under graceful paletots and summer mantels of cameleon silk, or in cashmeres, still enable us to glean some slight ideas of what is likely to follow, and of which we may now give some more detailed notice. In the first place, we may observe that shot fabrics and plaids appear to be viewed with much favour, and that the same may be said of pekins. All these different stuffs are employed in the formation of our most piquant spring costumes, and they are invariably trimmed with frills of the same material, with flounces or with a biais repeated upon the corsage and on the sleeves, the latter of which I should remark remain quite plain. Redingotes are seen in glazed mohair, trimmed with rushes or with silk gimp; and for country toilettes the most successful, I should say, are robes of light woollen stuffs, of a dark shade, with ornaments en soutache of cloth. These toilettes are also to be met with executed in silken stuffs, in cashmere, and in reseda ganikins. The paletots now worn vary exceedingly in their style and fashion, though there are many that I have seen that really deserve the favours of fashion as well for the taste as the elegance displayed in getting them up. Of this class let me particularly distinguish the paletot guipûrée in black net-work, trimmed with embroidered net; the Polish paletot, in embroidered muslin, or in tulle, lined with rose-coloured or white satin, and trimmed with lace and ribbon piping; the Venetian paletot, which, by the by, is a sort of double mantle—the whole in net trimmed with lace, and fastened at the neck by a bunch of ribbon, and forming behind two pelerines of which the first is as long as the petticoat. The fashion in hats and in capotes is, however, much bolder and more positive than that of dresses, and the air of spring-time breathes in the various elegant inventions of our Paris belles. Among these I have observed several hats in white crape, covered with tulle prettily gathered around a bunch of little roses; straw hats of open work, trimmed with a simple garland of small field flowers, with plaid ribbons; capotes of paille de riz and China gauze; others in lilac crape, in two shades, ornamented with a torsade in ribbon, and with a branch of Persian lilac. The whole of these are not merely pretty—they are elegant, and have a most charming effect. In speaking of head ornaments let me not, however, forget two that I observed at the artists' benefit ball, at the Opera Comique, and which were extremely beautiful. The one consisted of a long floating plume of feathers, called "Marabout Barenne," whose graceful undulations gave the appearance of a fall of snow. The other was a feather elegantly turned in a spiral form, a fashion quite new, but which bids fair to become very general; both these were ordered expressly for the occasion, and worn by two of the most fashionable ladies in Paris, whose choice is generally supposed to affix the seal of distinction upon everything they patronise. I need scarcely say the Dejazet plumes still are quite the rage.—Adieu.

POLISH LITERARY ASSOCIATION.—Wednesday being the anniversary o the great revolution of 1791, the annual general meeting of the Literary Association of the Friends of Poland took place at their chambers, Duke-street, St. James's. The meeting was most numerously attended, and amongst the members present were the Right Hon. Lord Foley; Viscount Jocelyn, M.P.; Lord Charles Fitzroy, M.P.; Lord Dudley Coutts Stuart; Hon. Colonel Leicester Stanhope; Sir Hedworth Williamson, Bart.; John Abel Smith, Esq., M.P.; J. Wilson Patten, Esq., M.P.; W. Gibson Craig, Esq., M.P.; H. R. Yorke, Esq., M.P.; Samuel Rogers, Esq.; Thomas Campbell, Esq.; J. Sheridan Knowles, Esq.; C. B. Sheridan, Esq.; J. B. Kirby, Esq.; G. A. Young, Esq.; E. Romilly, Esq.; Slingsby Duncombe, Esq., &c. Mr. Birkbeck, the hon. secretary, read the report of the council, which gave a brief account of the progress and proceedings of the association since its commencement. A series of resolutions confirmatory of the report, and returning thanks to the Duke and Duchess of Sutherland, to the Lord Mayor and Common Council of the City of London, were passed with much applause, and several noble lords and gentlemen addressed the meeting. An address of condolence to the Duchess of Inverness was also unanimously adopted, and will be forwarded by the vice-presidents and a deputation from the council. The usual business of the annual meeting, the election of officers, &c., having been disposed of, thanks were voted, on the motion of Mr. Gibson Craig, M.P., to Lord D. C. Stuart, for his conduct on that day, and for the invaluable services which he has rendered to the association, and to the Polish cause. The meeting then broke up.

THE CONQUEST OF SCINDE.

In other columns of this journal will be found an account of brilliant successes in India, achieved by British troops—of a great city taken, a great battle won, a million of money grasped as treasure, and another fine and fertile country added to the dominions of the Crown, and swelling the vast and wondrous extent of our mighty empire. Behind these sounding and magnificent triumphs, however, a grave question lurks. Have we gained them in honour?—without doubt of right? without disarming justice by expediency?—without setting the fatal vice of mere interested policy above the brightness and the beauty of truth? There are several of our contemporaries, Ministerial and Opposition, who appear to think these new conquests won at the expense of public virtue—who judge that a spirit of bold and bad ambition has stirred the energies of a grasping government to display its nerve and power only to aggrandize, to intimidate, to despoil. It is argued with solemn sense, and in a fair spirit of philanthropy, that if our Governor-General in India has converted well-disposed friends into subjected foes—if he has conciliated the Ameers only to conquer them—if he has gained a footing among a brave and intelligent people only to rob them of their country for their good-fellowship, and to fix the broad arrow of the Crown upon lands which it could not fairly or honourably claim to sway, then he may have followed out the rapacious policy which distinguished former oriental victories; but, assuredly, he will not have promoted the aims of humanity or the ends of civilization, or added one laurel to the wreath of lustre which girds the brow of Freedom, and has lent so much of its brightness and glory to the independence of the British name. The truth of this argument our readers are not of a class to dispute. They will readily agree to a proposition which has its dictates from humanity, and its spirit in pure justice, and which refuses to yield the claims of either to the most magnificent inducements of ambition, and the most tempting lures of power or of wealth. The virtuous community would rather that we should have suffered comparative disgrace in the Indian territory of Scinde than that we should have won a single inch of its fertile soil at the cost of the moral character of our country—of that national pride of honesty and frankness which clings instinctively to the truly English heart. Most deeply would have been experienced the mortification of knowing that a naturally jealous, brave, and independent people had had their jealousy converted into trust by the advances of British friendship, and then their courage humbled by defeat, and their independence changed into subjection upon the impulse and action of British treachery. Then acutely indeed would the bad eminence of our power have been felt by every honest mind.

Now, for ourselves, we find no evidence in the official documents before us to hasten us into these deprecatory conclusions, or to tempt us to throw the cold water of cant upon a victory of which we yet hope to find the justice equalling the splendour. All parties in this country are supposed to write in a sort of comparative ignorance of the position of affairs in the East, and to claim allowance, upon that ground, for any errors into which they may be led. Yet many of them choose the position of attack upon the new acquisition we have made, while we are content to take the most natural and national one of believing our country to be right, until some tangible evidence declares her to be wrong. We will not believe—until the melancholy faith shall be forced upon us—that the curse of English treachery has sullied the battle of Meeanee. We cannot but notice that the official papers all urge emphatically the failure of their engagements on the part of the Ameers—their violent breaches of trust while in the very act of treaty—their hollow pretensions of kindly feeling at a time when they were most insidiously working to betray—in a word, their desperate abandonment of all the principles which are held binding upon men and nations, and which give them the security of truth. It is thus that the Governor-General pithily indicates the circumstances which led to conflict and to victory.

The Ameers having signed a new treaty proposed to them on the 14th of February, attacked on the following day with a large force the residence of the British Commissioner. In this treacherous attack they were repulsed. On the 17th Major-General Sir Charles Napier gained a decisive victory over their whole army, and on the 20th the British troops occupied the city of Hyderabad. Six of the Ameers delivered their swords to the British General upon the field of battle. All their guns, ammunition, and treasure were taken, together with their camp. The Beloochees lost 5000 men. Thus has victory placed at the disposal of the British Government the country on both banks of the Indus from Sukkur to the Sea, with the exception of such portions thereof as may belong to Meer Ali Morad of Khyrpore, and to any other of the Ameers who may have remained faithful to his engagements. The Governor-General cannot forgive a treacherous attack upon a representative of the British Government, nor can he forgive hostile aggression prepared by those who were in the act of signing a treaty. It will be the first object of the Governor General to use the power victory has placed in his hands in the manner most conducive to the freedom of trade, and to the prosperity of the people of Scinde, so long misgoverned.

The passages we have printed in italics are worthy of remarking. They declare the treachery of the enemy in such terms as to justify the results of the war; they prove that there is no disposition to despoil of their territory those allies who have remained faithful, and they evidence a desire to govern our new subjects in the improving spirit of peace. Nor must we omit to mention that abolition of slavery was instant upon the acquisition of British power. Lest, however, the proclamation of the Governor-General should not be relied upon for its facts, let us take the letter of that gallant old soldier Sir Charles Napier. In this he says:—

> On the 14th inst. the whole body of the Ameers assembled, in full durbar, formally affixed their seals to the draught treaty. On leaving the durbar, Major Outram and his companions were in great peril, a plot had been laid to murder them all. They were saved by the guards of the Ameers; but the next day (the 15th) the residence of Major Outram was attacked by 5,000 of the Ameers' troops, headed by one or more of the Ameers. The report of this nefarious transaction I have the honour to enclose. I heard of it at Hala, at which place the fearless and distinguished Major Outram joined me with his brave companions in the stern and extraordinary defence of his residence against so overwhelming a force, accompanied by six pieces of cannon. On the 16th I marched to Muttare: having there ascertained that the Ameers were in position at Meeanee (ten miles' distance) to the number of 22,000 men, and well knowing that a delay for reinforcements would both strengthen their confidence and add to their number, already seven times that which I commanded, I resolved to attack them, and we marched at 4 A.M.

By this it is clear that the Ameers were traitors and aggressors both. But there is another passage in General Napier's report which is still more emphatic, and which, coming from one who, though a soldier, entertains political opinions the full reverse of those of the Governor-General, is entitled to much weight. It is couched as follows:—

> Finally, I trust for receiving indulgence from one who so well knows how difficult my position has been for the last five months up to the present moment, and how hard I have laboured, and how much I have risked, to avoid a recourse to arms. This sanguinary engagement has been forced upon me by the duplicity of the Ameers, though I must say that until the attack upon the Residency neither Major Outram nor myself believed they were resolved to fight, and against which duplicity I never ceased to warn them. My conscience acquits me of the blood which has been shed. The tyrannical and deceitful Ameers brought on the battle, the fierce tribes of Beloochee robbers were resolved that it should be so, and bravely did they execute their resolution.

This is plain speaking, and no conjectural reasoning can overturn its force. It says, in so many round words, that we made a hard struggle for peace, but that war was forced upon us, and that the blood shed in the conflict should lie upon the conscience of the conquered. We hope it may be thus, and that British valour may not have been disgraced by the wickedness of the quarrel in which it was enlisted.

We have elsewhere printed the whole of Sir Charles Napier's soldierly report. It is written in a plain, homely, and sometimes incorrect style, but in its force, eloquence, and spirit, it is beautiful throughout. It is one of the most stirring blood-warming discourses of battle we ever perused. It is full of the glow of heroism, the true fire of glory, the nobility of manhood, and the soldier's generosity of heart. It should make all Englishmen proud of English brotherhood—of their fellowship with their countrymen—of their full participation in their fame. It is truly a splendid, and genuine, and feeling history of a mighty deed of prowess and renown.

DULWICH COLLEGE.—ELECTION OF WARDEN.

The recent death of the master of this munificent foundation occasioned a vacancy in its wardenship; for, according to the statutes of the founder, Edward Alleyn, on the situation of the master being void, the warden at once succeeds to it; but the appointment to the office of warden is vested in the body—namely, the master and fellows and assistants—viz., churchwardens of the parishes of St. Saviour, St. Botolph (Bishopsgate), and St. Luke—in all eleven persons. Having assembled at the college at eleven o'clock, accompanied by the five poor brethren, the five poor sisters, and the 12 poor scholars, they proceeded to the chapel of the college with the candidates (twelve in number), all bearing the surname of Allen or Alleyn, to hear prayers; after which the electors proceeded to ballot for two out of the list to be the candidates—as by one of the statutes only two persons are eligible to be the candidates; when, upon the ballot papers being examined, the choice was found to have fallen on Mr. Charles Allen, of Brasennose College, Oxford, and Mr. J. G. N. Alleyn, of No. 23, Dover-street, who had come over from Dresden for the purpose of offering himself. As soon as this announcement was made, two exceedingly long strips of paper were taken, and in the corner of one of them was written "God's Gift; they were then rolled up and tied round with a piece of tape. The prize and the blank were then put into a tin box and the lid put on, which was then handed to the master, who, standing at the altar, held the box in his right hand, which he elevated above his head, and then shook it three times, turning it over at each of the shakes. The votes of the electors having made Mr. Charles Allen the senior candidate, he was called to the altar, and the lid being removed, the box was placed on the crown of his head, from which he drew one of the rolls of paper. The box was then handed to the other candidate, who, as a matter of course, took the other paper. The two candidates were then desired to unfold their papers, but so great was the anxiety of each, that it was with great difficulty they unrolled the papers. At length the second candidate's (Mr. J. Grey Newton Alleyn) paper exhibited the "God's Gift" written on it, when he was declared to be duly elected warden of the college, and which terminated the proceedings. The new warden is not above twenty-three years of age. The present head of the college is a son of the Bishop of Ely.

The choice of fellows is very similar to that of the warden. The ate organist, the Rev. Ozias Linley, brother of the first Mrs. Brinsley Sheridan, drew the successful lot against the celebrated bassoninger, Mr. Bartleman. In addition to this handsome provision he erected almshouses in the parishes of St. Botolph, Bishopsgate; St. Saviour, Southwark; and St. Giles, without Cripplegate, for thirty poor men and women, ten from each parish, to be elected by the respective churchwardens and vestry, and to be admitted afterwards into the college (named "God's Gift"), as vacancies occurred, particularly that of the parties being single and elderly. One of the brethren, two of the sisters, and three of the scholars, just specified as belonging to the college, are chosen out of the parish of Camberwell, in which the college is situated, the remaining nine brethren and sisters and nine scholars coming from the three parishes above mentioned; besides thirty out-members.

By the terms of the statutes it is necessary that the master and warden should be unmarried, and have the founder's name of Alleyn, or Allen. It is also ordained that three of the fellows should be clergymen, the fourth being the organist, and that they should all be single persons. Although the words of the foundation-deed are express on the latter point, the first master and warden were married men; and the founder himself showed his approval of the state of matrimony by marrying secondly, after the death of his first wife Joan, who lies buried in the college chapel. Some of the masters have endeavoured to procure leave to marry, but without success, owing to the clear terms of the will.

Edward Alleyn, or Allen, the founder of the college, was a distinguished actor in the reigns of Elizabeth and James I., and was born in 1566, at the sign of the Rye, in Lombard-street. He rose to great eminence as an actor before he was 26 years of age; and a letter of Rede, the dramatic poet, is extant, in which he relates a convivial meeting of Alleyn, Ben Jonson, and Shakspere. Ben Jonson charged his brother poet with having been indebted to his observation of Alleyn for the famous directions about acting in "Hamlet." Alleyn eventually became a fortunate theatrical proprietor, and built the Fortune playhouse; but his most profitable speculation was a bear-garden at Bankside. With the wealth thus wrung from the people he commenced building the college in 1614, it is stated, from a design by Inigo Jones, and finished it in 1617; but few of the old buildings remain. The site begins at the five-mile stone (i. e. five miles south of London). The gates, bearing the founder's arms, crest, and motto, "God's Gift," lead into the outer court or green. The college stands in the inner court; the west wing being the most ancient. The front is divided in the centre by a porch, over which is the treasury chamber. Eastward of the porch is the chapel, with a noble copy of Raffaele's "Transfiguration," by his pupil Julio Romano. Westward of the porch is the college hall, where the elections are held, and the scholars dine; and adjoining it is the dining-room of the master, warden, and fellows. Above are the library and apartments for the master and warden. The original revenues of the college amounted only to £300, but have since greatly increased.

Dulwich College has, from its foundation, been celebrated for its collection of pictures. Alleyn left it some; and Cartwright, the comedian, many more. But the most valuable accession has been from the bequest of the late Sir Francis Bourgeois, in 1810. For this noble collection a new gallery has been built, to which the public are admitted gratuitously, by tickets, which may be easily obtained. The most curious relic is a very curious diary of the founder, from 1617 to 1622, which has, we believe, been recently printed.

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

FRANCE.—Paris, May 9th, 1843.—(From our own Correspondent)—The fall of the Spanish Ministry has created a great sensation in our diplomatic world, and current talk is of every country but Spain. Here the Government, I am inclined to believe, are far from being satisfied; they were strongly opposed to General Rodil, but they are more so to M. Cortina; Rodil was so far favourable to the views of the moderate party of the chiefs of the Ayacucho party (so called from having taken an active part in the American revolution), he was obnoxious to the nation, and his presence tended greatly to prevent foreign intervention in favour of Queen Isabella; be denied that the French Government are active partisans of Christina, and the only chance for her restoration is to keep the country in a state of continual disaffection; Cortina is a man in a position of character and talent, an enemy to military despotism, and, should he succeed in forming a stable government, there is little doubt that he will render the most essential service to his country. But in the eyes of our Gallic friends M. Cortina has one great fault; he is a strong partisan for an intimate alliance with England. M. Cortina is also a friend of Espartero, and many of his measures have gone nothing, therefore, easy to imagine that M. Cortina is obnoxious to the French, and intrigues of all descriptions will be best afloat to prevent him from forming a majority. It is a curious fact that the people in the world take less interest in politics than the Spanish, and there is not a nation more a prey to political intrigues—the work chiefly of strangers! The Spaniards are strongly attached to their religion and their sovereign—all else they know nothing, and care, if possible, less. I am most confidentially informed that soon after the formation of the new Ministry a partial insurrection will be attempted in the northern provinces. It will not succeed; the people are determined to remain neuter, and take no active part for any party—either Carlist, Christino, Ayacucho, Espartero, or Republican.

The Chamber of Deputies during the last few days, the scene of much angry discussion and scandalous exposure, arising from a debate on the validity of the election of certain ministerial deputies; it was proved most satisfactorily that, during the election, several high functionaries conducted themselves in a most blameable manner, and the members were unanimously declared not to have been duly returned. In the Chamber of Peers the committee has declared itself in favour of a project for the construction of a canal for ship, and a railroad, in water, however, meet with much opposition in the lower house.

The accounts from Algiers continue most unsatisfactory. Private letters received to the 30th give a deplorable account of an expedition from the province of Constantine, under the orders of General Baraguay d'Hilliers; the French lost a great many men; the official despatch, I believe, acknowledges about 150 hors de combat. The news from Mexico is also bad, owing to the Arabs. On the other hand the Duke d'Aumale has made a most victorious russia, and succeeded in capturing a certain number of sheep and camels. It is truly deplorable, I may say barbarous, for an enlightened people that wage war against unarmed peasants, to rob them of their cattle and burn their kereals—and why? because they have no taste for French civilisation! they prefer Abdel Kader to General Bugeaud! This was most clearly shown in the terrible affair of the 8th of May last year. The unfortunate cripples applied to the court to award them damages against the directors of the railroad: they were not only refused, but were rebuked—that is to say, to the prosecuted new railroads. The prices given for rails are very high. Messrs. Schneider and Co. have contracted for 11,500 tons, for the Dijon and Chalons railway, at 348f. 50c., or about £14, the ton; and Messrs. Bernard and Mertz for 45,000 chairs, at about £11 15s. There are many new railways in agitation, but many years will elapse before they are carried into execution. our French friends prefer discussing to acting. The people are no strong partisans of railroads: the numerous disasters have indisposed them; besides, they now find that should they unfortunately meet with an accident, they have no chance of obtaining redress

Lieut. Scott, of the 17th N. I., with 100 men, conveying the mail from Kurrachee to Hyderabad, was attacked, and repulsed the enemy with severe loss.

CABUL.

The chief portion of our Cabul intelligence is derived from the Lahore news-writers—a dubious source of information, but the only one now open to us. Dost Mahomed had left the Seikh court under a guard of honour, about the 15th of February. His visit to Lahore had cost the Maharajah £15,000; the officers on the line of his march were directed to furnish him and his escort £70 a-day to defray the charges of the journey. He expected stout opposition in the Khyber country, and was endeavouring to raise men in the Punjaub. Akbbar Khan meanwhile had sent intimation that he would be ready to receive his father at Jumrood, on the confines of Peshawur, where the passes first open. He was to bring with him an escort of 10,000 or 12,000 infantry and 7000 cavalry: and it was stated that it was his intention to attack Peshawur. Mahomed Sooltan Khan, brother of Dost Mahomed, who, since his expulsion from Cabul in 1836, has never ceased to intrigue against the ex-Ameer, appears to be the source of these inauspicious rumours. The Sirdar may in reality find 4,000 men requisite to force the Khyber, when half that number of regular troops was considered by General Pollock too light an armament. Dost Mahomed is still within the Seikh territory, and might, until he joins his son, be detained as a hostage for the good conduct of the Cabulees: and the Sirdar, had he mischief in view, would take care not to disclose his intentions. Akbbar Khan, meanwhile, has written to the Governor-General, professing his zeal, as is reported, to collect the Sepoys still scattered through the country, and have them safely forwarded to India; making general tenders of friendship; and deploring the death of the envoy as the most unhappy event in his life. No answer to this has been returned; but it is believed that so soon as Dost Mahomed reaches Cabul friendly arrangements will be entered on. Along with the letter to Lord Ellenborough came another to Captain Troup. This officer had left behind him a favourite horse of great beauty and utility, and of such value in the eyes of the Sirdar that he would not consent to part with it, though willing to grant anything else. He promised, however, that should Captain Troup ever return to India, his steed would be restored to him; and, accordingly, during his stay at Delhi, the animal arrived in safety. It was on this occasion the letters referred to were received: both were forwarded to the Governor-General, who returned unopened, but with permission for its perusal, that belonging to Captain Troup. The latest news is to the effect that the son of Meer Waez is at present on the throne of Cabul, and that Mahomed Akkbar has become so unpopular (it is not stated on what grounds) that two attempts have been made to murder him in the Laghman country, and that the people are only prevented from rising against him by the unexpected arrival of Dost Mahomed.

The Delhi Gazette has published a narrative of the events immediately preceding our advance upon Cabul, drawn up apparently on the authority of the officers who conducted the negotiations—Sir Richmond Shakspeare and Captains Lawrence and M'Kenzie; it is not so stated, but there are none others who could have supplied the information. From this it appears, that before the 1st of August arrangements were concluded with Akkbar Khan for a free exchange of the prisoners on both sides, on condition of our retiring from the country; the Sirdar pledging himself to collect the Sepoys scattered throughout the mountains, and have them escorted through the passes, provided a couple of officers remained behind to take charge of them till our troops reached Peshawur. Sir Richmond Shakspeare, then military secretary to General Pollock, and Captain Troup, one of the prisoners, volunteered on this duty. The general declined having any written correspondence with the Sirdar, who accepted his verbal promise, he himself coming under a written obligation. All this was finally and satisfactorily settled by the beginning of August. Fresh instructions afterwards arrived, connected, as is understood, with peremptory orders from home, when negotiations were broken off, and preparations entered on for proceeding to Cabul.

It is stated in the last Lahore news-letter that Dost Mahomed has asked 12,000 Seikh troops to assist him in punishing the King of Bokhara for his former treachery; and that the Rajah Dhyan Singh has offered him 20,000, provided he will send Mahomed Akbbar to Lahore as a hostage. This the Ameer declines, as he has at present no control over the movements of the Sirdar; but offers to leave any other members of his family. The Lahore Darbar will have Akbbar, and Akbbar only. The continuance of the negotiation, and the honours directed to be shown to Dost Mahomed till his arrival at Peshawar, dispel apprehensions of an attack on that province by the Affghans for the present.

As a territorial acquisition the importance of Scinde cannot be denied; the command of such a river and such a country, capable of becoming a second Bengal in wealth and productiveness, is beyond all question.

The Governor-General was at Agra, where he has taken up his residence in one of the palaces, and in which he held an investiture of the Order of the Bath. He has ordered the celebrated Somnauth gates to be locked up there, and the officers employed in escorting them have been sent back to regimental duty.

The declaration of Sir Charles Napier, that the Indian army is too scantily officered, has attracted attention, and has become the subject of general comment.

The Ameers of Scinde, who are prisoners, will, it is said, be placed for safety in the fortress of Ahmednugger or Asseergbur.

Some disturbances still exist in the mountainous districts of Bundelkund, but they are not of very great importance. India is otherwise tranquil.

His lordship has begun a work which will connect his name with those of the many benefactors of India, and will be remembered when the memories of wars have passed away. The canal, so long projected by Captain Cauthy, in the Doosb, which had been all but abandoned, is to be commenced directly, and a sum of five lacs of rupees has been appropriated for the purpose. This will be a work worthy of the British government of India.

Lord Ellenborough is also determined to give a help to the cotton interests, and to extend the services and operations of the American cotton planters, as well as to erect the graining machines which as yet have lain idle. Nothing can be said of praise too great for such works as these, and for such intentions, if fairly carried out.

Major Sleeman has been appointed commissioner, vice Mr. S. Fraser; and there has been a clean sweep made of all other civil assistants and functionaries, and for the most part a new set appointed. The establishment for Central India has also been remodelled altogether, and Lord Ellenborough is going to have a "new police" throughout it, which is to be of a decidedly military character.

The virtual abolition of slavery in India by Mr. Bird, the Vice-President in Council, is an act which will well stand beside the abolition of Suttee. Commentary on it is unnecessary, the act speaks for itself. As no one can lay claim to another as his slave, slavery is gone. In Ceylon, also, slavery has been abolished, though the enactments have not appeared.

The Gazette of Tuesday contains the whole of the notifications relative to the annexation of Scinde and the victory at Meeanee, but as they exhibit no feature of novelty we do not consider it necessary, having already made the facts known, to give the details to the public.

AGRA, Friday, March 24, 1843.—The Governor-General having been commanded by the Queen to invest Major-Generals Sir George Pollock and Sir William Nott with the decorations of the highest class of the most honourable military order of the Bath, that ceremony was performed, on the 20th of March, at the palace of Agra, before all the troops composing the garrison; many native gentlemen were also present. The Generals were received, on alighting from the Governor-General's state carriage, by a deputation of the principal officers of Government. After the ceremony, which was accompanied by a flattering address from the Governor-General, Generals Pollock and Nott withdrew, under a military salute. In the evening the generals and all the officers of the garrison and station dined with the Governor-General in the Dewan Aum, and the entertainment concluded with a ball in the Dewan Khass. The Ungoorie Bag, the Jasmin Boorj, the Sheesh Mehal, and the fountains were illuminated on the occasion.

CHINA.

The news from China extends to the 21st of February. The latest was brought to Bombay by an American schooner, the Zephyr, which is now paying as an opium trader from Bombay to China, and is remarkable for her swift sailing. The Emperor has ordered an investigation into the conduct of the crews of the Ann and Nerbunda at Formosa. Nothing had been done in the arrangements of the commercial treaty, for the British Plenipotentiary was bound to be within the treaty as ratified by her Majesty. The Chinese Commissioner and he were on good terms. Doubts are said to exist of the durability of any arrangement now entered into. The Chinese were also increasing their forts and strengthening their defences at the ports of the different places attacked last year. Trade was dull, but expected to revive speedily. At Canton some dissatisfaction still prevailed. The immature rebellion of Manilla had been put down, and the rebels executed. The hope for its object to declare the independence of the islands of the Spanish yoke.

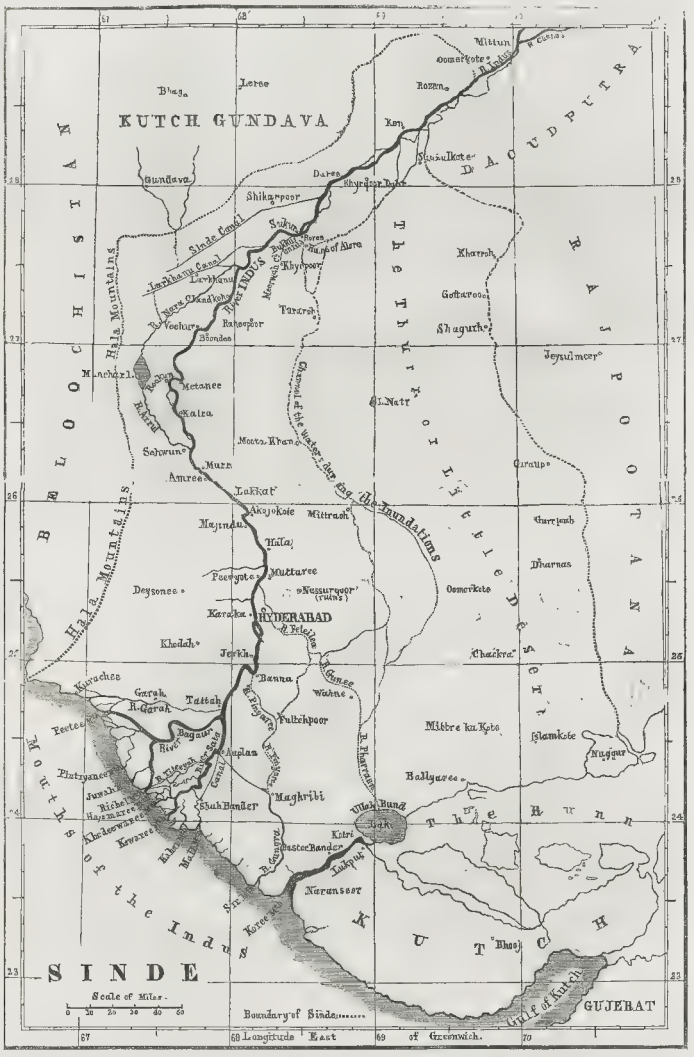
The Hindostan arrived at Madras on the 15th of March, sixty hours after the mail had arrived at Bombay. The rapidity promises well for the steamers from Calcutta to Suez: her arrival at Calcutta took place on the 23rd, before the express from Bombay with the mail had reached that city. The Hindostan was obliged, on going up the Hoogly, to anchor at Mud-point from want of water.

Dwarkanauth Tagore has been excluded from his family caste, in consequence of a repeatedly proving wife "unclean and improper."

The captain of the Belvidere, which ship was burned some months ago at Singapore, was tried at Bombay for taking goods out of the ship while in harbour. He was honourably acquitted.

In a postscript, our correspondent states that a steamer had arrived at Bombay from Kurrachee, which brought intelligence to the 28th of March, and mentioned that a fight of three days had taken place between Sir Charles Napier and the Ameers, in which the British were successful. There was great loss on both sides. Report said that the British General was slain, but this part of the report was not credited.

The Beloochees had thrown a chain across the Indus, which they intended to defend by fortifications on both sides. Her Majesty's ship Nimrod and two small steamers were about to force the Beloochees to retire and leave the river open.



MAP OF SCINDE.

SCINDE AND THE RIVER INDUS.

The annexation of Scinde to the British dominions (as officially detailed in the news just received by the Overland Mail in another part of our journal) must render this newly-acquired kingdom of great interest to our readers; whilst its position on the Indus is important in connexion with the published avowal of the Indian government to direct its energies to fostering trade on that hitherto neglected river. "The Indus," observes Captain Postans, in his well-timed pamphlet, just published, "is the great means by which commerce may be carried on from the port of Bombay to Scinde, Bhawulpore, the Punjaub, and other extensive countries on its banks, or beyond them to all parts of Central Asia; countries, moreover, of unbounded fertility, promising, even in their present neglected state, a certain return trade; but capable, in process of time, were the demands only made, of producing, to an unlimited extent, many of those staple commodities which form the great return trade in our Indian commerce."

Before describing the subjects of the engravings, from sketches obligingly furnished by Captain Postans, it will be better to take a rapid review of the country of Scinde, a delta on the lower Indus (similar, though on a smaller scale, to that of Egypt), with a considerable extent of territory on either side. It extends north and south from the sea to the confines of the Bhawulpore territories at Subzulkote on the eastern, and meeting the Punjaub territories on the western bank, its greatest extent, in round numbers, being about 500 miles. The principal port is in Kurrachee, having a communication with Bombay during nearly nine months in the year, from which it is distant about 800 miles, occupying four days' steaming, except during the monsoon, when the communication is closed. Kurrachee is a very accessible harbour, and when the improvements contemplated by government are carried out (a lighthouse, pier, &c.), it will afford every facility for vessels of any tonnage loading and unloading. Kurrachee communicates to the westward with a high road and well-frequented route to Kelat and Candahar; but the great importance of this post is its communication with the Indus, of which it may be said to be the key, having about the same relative position and value to that river that Alexandria has to the Nile, with only a land-carriage of about twenty-five miles (and even this may be obviated by opening an old canal), which it commands at all times.

"The capital of Scinde," says Captain Postans, "is Hyderabad, situated about 150 miles from Kurrachee, immediately on the river. Intermediately we have the once important mart and manufacturing city of Tattah; but its glory is departed, and it is highly improbable it can ever be revived. It owed its principal importance to the production of its silk fabrics, particularly of that description called the loongie. But, rivalled in these by Mooltan and Bhawulpore, and no longer the only great port on the Indus, Tattah is of comparatively little moment as a place of trade or manufacture: it belongs to the British Government, however, and, in case of being used hereafter as an entrepôt, we could effectually protect the merchant. Its present distance from the river is about five miles, and opposite Tattah is the point of communication between Kurrachee and the Indus, where every facility is offered for shipping and landing goods. Hyderabad, the capital, has a population of about 50,000: it is noted for its manufactures of leather, which is far superior to any known in the East, and which is exported to the neighbouring countries. The great trading towns of Scinde, higher up the river, are, Sukkur (now Victoria on the Indus), Shikarpore, Khyrpore, Larkana, and Subzulkote. Of these the most important and influential has hitherto been Shikarpore; but it is highly probable the cession of Victoria on the Indus to the British Government will tend to move the trade to that place from Shikarpore, as we shall give it a protection which will be immediate and liberal. The two important trading points of the country of Scinde may thus be taken as at Kurrachee, its port, and Sukkur or Victoria at nearly its northern extremity, the latter being the point, moreover, of nearest communication to Affghanistan and Beloochistan, by the old route of the Bolan Pass; the distance is twenty days from Candahar, and this latter has been, from time immemorial, the great commercial road to Central Asia from the Lower Indus. Scinde is at present, comparatively, a thinly-populated country, its wants being few, owing to the hitherto extreme poverty of its people, consequent on a Government which has no parallel, even in the East, for avarice and despotism, its chief aim being to crush every spirit of enterprise in the merchant, devoting the whole of this wonderfully fine country to the selfish gratification of its rulers. But such portions of Scinde as are cultivated attest its amazing fertility, and prove that the produce may, with care, be increased to any extent, though at present the whole country is little more than a preserve for game. The staple articles for a return trade from Scinde may be considered as these:—Saltpetre, sulphur, alum, indigo, sugar, cotton, wool, leather, hemp, opium, and grains of every description. A very large proportion of its inhabitants are Hindoo traders, exceedingly energetic men, who will increase in number and in weight the longer we have a position in the country, and who only require our fostering policy, and the undeniable power which we now possess, to induce them to enlarge their mercantile transactions to any extent. The Hindoo merchants of Scinde are, perhaps, as active and energetic, of that class, as are to be met with in any country."

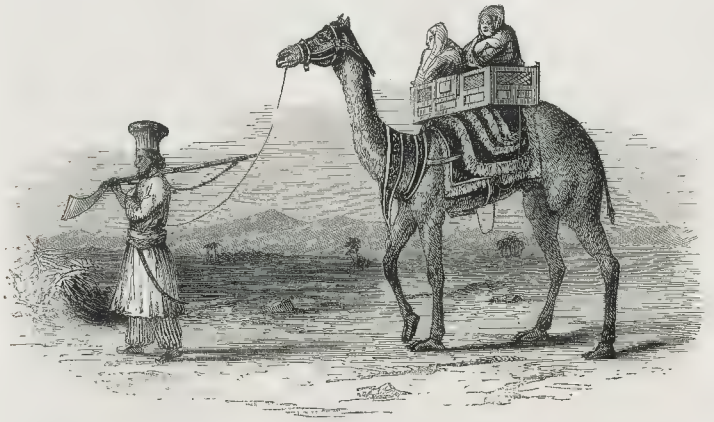
We now proceed to a few of the minor characteristics of this interesting country, and especially of those which illustrate the habits of its river population.



TAKHT 'ROWAN.

This cut illustrates the common mode of conveyance used by the women of the East when accompanying their families on long journeys, which would be too fatiguing if undertaken in any other way. The seat in which the women are placed is called a Takht 'Rowan, and consists of a large wooden frame or wicker pannier, fastened by strong ropes over the hump of the camel; a bed and pillows is placed within, on which the women sit or recline, while a servant leads the animal with a long rope attached to the peg, which passes through his nostril. Sometimes poles are attached to the corners, which support a canopy of crimson cloth, which either shelters the travellers from the sun or screens them from the eyes of men. In Egypt when the families of the pilgrims accompany their husbands to Mecca, they always use this canopy; but in Scinde the commoner classes travel in it open, trusting to their veils for the necessary concealment.

The habit of travelling thus on camels is a very ancient one among the women of the East, for, in the 1st book of Moses, at the 61st verse of the 24th chapter, when Abraham's servant is described as going to Mesopotamia to fetch a wife for Isaac, we are told, "that Rebekah arose, and her damsels, and they rode upon the camels and followed the man." Women sometimes, it is true, sit on the common camel saddle, with a quilted coverlet thrown over it, and guide the animal, but in long journeys the Takht 'Rowan is preferred; and it is interesting so to trace habits in the East, precisely now seen to be the same as they were three thousand years ago, as described in the Bible history.

The inhabitants of Scinde who live on the banks of the Indus subsist solely on fish, of which the river is said to afford sixteen fine varieties; but of these the pullah, or sable fish, is considered the most delicious. Europeans are in the habit of boiling the pullah, in which case it is almost too rich to be agreeable to the palate; but the natives of Scinde broil it simply over a wood fire, which renders it excellent and wholesome. The poor people who gain their living as fishers live in grass huts on the banks of the Indus in great contentment, farming tracts of the river, looking to it as their means of subsistence, transit, and pleasure, and never so happy as when bathing in its waters, or floating on its bosom. The above cut represents a Scindian fisherman approaching the river bank, and bearing the net and vessel he uses in his vocation. This vessel is made of baked clay, capable of holding twenty gallons of water, and much flattened at the sides. The net is woven of large meshes, and fixed at the upper end of a bamboo twelve or thirteen feet long, with a fork-like termination. When the fisherman reaches the river, he places the vessel on the water, and throws himself on it in such a manner as to close the opening of the jar with the pit of his stomach; he then swims into mid-stream, holding his net in readiness, plunged vertically into the water. The fisher, thus floating on the stream, remains motionless until a fish is snared, when he closes the mouth of the net, takes carefully out the fish, stabs it with a knife carried in his girdle, drops it into the vessel, and commences anew. When the vessel is full enough, the fisher makes for the bank, disengages himself from his frail bark, utters a "Bismillah" (God be praised), and returns to his hut, contentedly, to broil his fish, and smoke a chillum with his family.

The women of Scinde are a strong, active, athletic race, who share equally with the men the labour and the toil of life. On the river Indus whole families live entirely in their boats, knowing no other home; and the wives and daughters of the fishermen, consequently, become as expert in the navigation of the river-craft as their husbands and fathers are, and are as frequently to be seen so engaged. The costume of these women is curious and not unpicturesque, although the materials are coarse and cleanliness unknown. The dress of the woman, as shown in the above cut, is that peculiar to Scinde, and consists of a chola or boddice, made of cotton of colours sewed together in horizontal stripes, which fastens behind, and is often ornamented with coarse embroidery and small pieces of looking-glass curiously let in; beneath this is a full petticoat of blue cotton, and over the head a handkerchief, which in some measure supplies the place of the saree worn by the women of India. The feet are usually decorated with silver toe-rings; and, from the extreme cheapness of small turquois in Scinde, women, even of the lowest ranks, have commonly nose and ear-rings decorated with them. The women of Scinde generally are considered handsome; but those who live entirely on the river and subsist on fish are a taller, stouter, and more masculine race than the women of the towns, whose principal occupations are to draw water and fulfil domestic and household duties.

PULLAH FISHERMAN.

SCINDIAN LETTER-CARRIER.

The above is a portrait of a cossid, the especial messenger or letter-carrier of Central Asia, who, useful at all times in effecting communication throughout countries in which there is no regular post-establishment, becomes incalculably so in times of war. He is a native of Candahar, who, with others of his class, was entrusted with the conveyance of letters between Cabul and the Indus, on matters of the utmost importance to the interests of the British Government, and the safety of its troops, during periods when the occupation of the Bolan Pass by the Beloochee tribes, with the country between Candahar and Quettah by Uktar Khan, the chief of the Allizhie and other powerful tribes of Affghans, rendered the plunder of the Dâk (Post) so common as to stop all regular communication. These messengers are all sturdy, strong-built men, trained to undergo extraordinary fatigue, and to subsist on the most simple and scanty food. Their garments are poor, travel-stained, and ragged, and a strong staff supports them on their way. The cossid travels onwards day and night towards his destination, heeding neither the heat of noon nor the dews of evening—over burning sands, through mountain passes, stemming the swollen torrents, and climbing the most difficult paths, he steadily performs his duty, snatching food as he may from his ragged wallet, and resting beneath a bush or rock to recruit the strength which permits him to make journeys of many days, compassing some sixty miles in the four-and-twenty hours. During times of rebellion and war these poor fellows are often robbed, and sometimes murdered, in the discharge of their dangerous duty; but, usually, their knowledge of the country enables them to escape well by unfrequented paths leading across the mountains. In the late campaign in Affghanistan one of these messengers succeeded in conveying safely to its destination a scrap of paper which he had concealed in the "taweed," or talisman, commonly worn round the neck. He had been seized by the enemy, wounded, and stripped of all his clothing, but the talisman failed to attract attention, and with this the faithful servant escaped, travelled on, and from it drew the object of his trust. During the occupation of Jellalabad by Sir R. Sale, and the besieged state of Ali Musjid, all means of communication depended on the cossids, who were, however, so closely watched, that many could only be trusted with quills filled with iodine, by means of which the safety of isolated parties was learned and secret answers given. In short, among all our many faithful servants in the East, none is more valuable than these cossids, of one of whom the above cut is a faithful representation.

BOAT UNDER SAIL.

The Indus boat is a heavy rude-looking craft, by no means so beautiful as those of Egypt seen on the Nile, and are never particularly safe. The Indus boats are formed of three pieces of country wood, two forming the sides and one the bottom, secured together by crooked spars, the stern and bow being strained upwards in the required angles, by the application of heat and force; they are without beams, and cannot stand gales of wind, short chopping seas, or rough weather. Storms of wind, particularly in the spring months, are very common on the Indus, and when coming against the stream are almost always fatal to the craft which may be caught in an unsheltered position. Wrecks are frequent consequently, and a boat in such cases goes down with a suddenness which forbids all hope of saving any portion of her cargo. The sand-banks which abound are also dangerous, while below the banks a strong deep current is frequently found flowing in a contrary direction to the main stream, and a boat caught in the gyrations so caused is generally wrecked; fortunately, however, the boatmen are tolerably certain of a favourable breeze when ascending the river from April to September, or in descending it from November to March.

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.—We have received accounts of the riots at Dantzic, but we are glad to hear the effervescence is not connected with the spruce, which, considering how long it has been bottled up, might have led to a frightful explosion. Akbar Khan is still at loggerheads with the Imaum of Muscat. The former, it is said, will ultimately prevail. If this be true, Akbar Kan and the Imaum can't. In Spain, matters are looking black, particularly liquorice. Espartero appeared at the windows of the palace; there was a crowd beneath, but he did not seem disposed to throw himself upon the people.—Punch.

THE BRITISH LEGION.—It is satisfactory to find that the poor fellows who composed this ill-requited, though brave body of men, are at length about to have justice done them. All the arrangements are nearly completed, and the claims are not only to be paid up in full, but the Government, to mark their high opinion of the bravery of the men, are to add to each man's share a liberal gratuity.

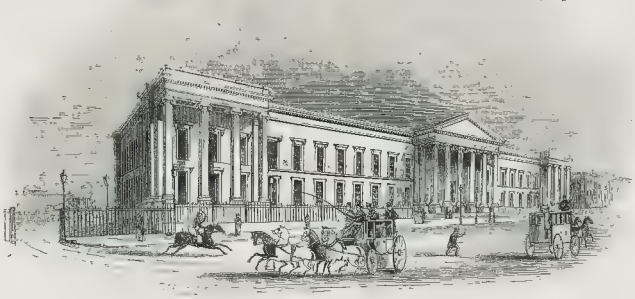
TRAINING HORSES.

Exercise, as it is commonly understood, is but a mild preparation for hard work. In the early stage of training many hours are daily taken up with walking only, and gentle canters not exceeding half-speed. It is begun early in the morning, continuing for many hours, and again in the afternoon. Every day the same routine is continued, until, by a nice calculation made upon the time the animal is to be called upon to meet his opponents, it is deemed necessary to be put into training, or hard work. Strength of constitution, goodness of legs and feet, must, or ought, to guide the trainer as to the quantity of work necessary to prepare the animal for the conflict. From walking exercise with a gentle canter to stretch their legs after water they progress into work; and for that purpose they usually get an old horse, who has pace enough left, as a schoolmaster to lead in the gallop. From him they learn pace; and occasionally an opinion is formed of one or two in the string by getting a brush alongside of him. By exercise the animal is made hardy. This education begins early; for at two year's old they begin their career on the turf; and, from the severity of treatment when once began, they seldom last beyond five or six years. The whole system of training is severe—keeping this maxim in view, that it is better to break down in training than in running. In fact, the conflict, or race, is nothing compared to the preparation necessary to give him a fair chance with his opponents. Some horses are by nature more able to bear hard work than others, and so long as they can feed and their legs will stand hard work, the more they have of it the better; without this they will lay on too much flesh: this must be got off, or they will want wind. Exercise is, therefore, the mild preparation to training.



GENERAL POST-OFFICE, ST. MARTIN-LE-GRAND.

In catering for the information of our readers, we are quite sure that authentic details, connected with the history and present mode of transacting the business of the Post-office, will prove not merely interesting but curiously valuable. An establishment of so much social, commercial, and even fiscal importance, cannot fail to be regarded by every admirer of the institutions of his native land with national pride; while its progress in usefulness since its first rude attempt to distribute "written ideas" to all parts of the world singularly shows the gradual growth of great principles. By this happy combination of social and fiscal advantages, the national resources have been from time to time improved; and while the Post-office has contributed its quota to the exigences of the state, it has proved signally subsidiary in accelerating the march of mind, and hastening the ultimate benefits connected with, and arising out of civilized freedom.

It is to the Parliament of 1643 that we are indebted for the origination of the Post-office. The first mention of "chief postmaster of England," however, occurs in 1581. But the business of such postmaster was confined to furnishing post-horses for the transmission of mails on special occasions. In 1632, the control of the office was confided to Thomas Witherings, who was instructed to settle certain rates of postage. The mails were conveyed on saddle-horses, and the post-masters on each road were required to furnish them at the rate of twopence halfpenny per mile. In 1640, Witherings was superseded on account of abuses in the conduct of his offices, both of which were sequestered into the hands of Philip Burmachy, with this proviso, that he should exercise the privilege "under the care and oversight of the King's principal secretary of state." During the civil war, considerable interruption took place in the regularity of the system; and consequently it was thought advisable to make some important alterations with the view of placing the entire establishment upon a footing of a still more systematic character. Mr. Edmond Prideaux, attorney-general to the Commonwealth, having devised a more extended and much more suitable plan, it was accepted; and he was chosen chairman of a committee, in 1642, for considering what rates should be set upon inland letters. Two years afterward he was appointed postmaster, by an ordinance of both houses. Very valuable results were the fruit of this appointment. He not only established a regular conveyance of letters weekly, but he also extended the post by branches and cross rides to all parts of the nation. The services of local postmasters, or persons letting horses for hire for this purpose, were thus dispensed with, and seven thousand pounds per annum saved by the adoption of the improvement. There can be no doubt but that the emolument arising from working the Post-office was considerable, for we find that the Common-Council of the city of London attempted to erect another office in opposition to his; but a resolution of the House of Commons checked the civic functionaries, by declaring that "the office of postmaster is, and ought to be, in the sole power and disposal of Parliament." The office continued to be "farmed" until 1657, in which year a post-office was erected and its machinery controlled, by the Protector and his parliament. The preamble to this measure is curious; it ran in the following words:—"Whereas, it is expecient to establish one general post-office for the transmission and receipt of letters; for, besides being a benefit to commerce and convenient in conveying public despatches, it will be the best means of discovering and preventing many dangerous and wicked designs against the Commonwealth." No doubt can possibly be entertained, but that in those days the letters were frequently opened, and their contents subjected to strict scrutiny. Indeed, this power is still preserved by the Government, for we find it enacted (9th Anne, cap. 10, sec. 40.) that, "by a warrant from one of the principal Secretaries of State, letters may be detained and opened." Fortunately, in the present day, the exercise of this power is rarely ever requisite.

By an act passed on the 1st of June, 1711, we find a provision for the erection of one general letter-office in the City of London, another in Edinburgh, and a third in Dublin. Provision is also therein made for the appointment of a Postmaster-General, in whom power and patronage should be vested: power, with the sanction of the Lords of the Treasury, to make and alter rates of postage; and the privilege of appointing all the officers who might be required for the complete working of the establishment. Upon this model the present post-office is founded, and the rates then arranged continued, with some few alterations, until the introduction of the uniform rate in 1839. The mail was first conveyed by stage coaches on the 2nd of August, 1785; and although the project was scouted by the comptrollers of the post-office as wild, visionary, and certain to produce ruinous consequences, in less than four years no less than £30,000 were added to the revenue by the adoption of the plan! Nothing, indeed, can be more gratifying than the fact, that in every case where reduction of postage has taken place, or additional facilities have been afforded, a proportionate increase of income has been realised, and that, too, in the face of the most decided opinions unhesitatingly avowed by the functionaries of the Post-office. The knowledge of this simple fact alone is sufficient to lead us to the conclusion that if an equal chance is given to the uniform rate now in existence, the time will eventually arrive when the revenue, which is quarterly improving, will reach its former gross amount even at the present reasonable rate of charge.

The magnificent building, situate in St. Martin-le-grand, near to the junction of Cheapside and Newgate-street, is erected on the spot formerly occupied by the college and sanctuary of St. Martin.

It was built by Mr. Smirke, and opened for business on Wednesday, September, 23rd, 1829.

It is one of the largest public edifices now existing in the city of London. In its construction the order of the Grecian Ionic is followed. The principal front is four hundred feet in length, and has an imposing effect, arising from the continuity and simplicity of its elevation and the solidity and magnificence of its proportions. The portico, which projects, with two inter-columns at the sides, and is also intercessed, has an air of space and a depth of shadow that contribute materially to enhance its effect. Its breadth is seventy, and its depth twenty feet. Over the door is placed a clock, with an exterior and an interior face, and on each side are two strong reflecting lamps: it is also powerfully illuminated. In this front there are forty-four windows.

The back of the building, or east front, in Foster-lane, has about one hundred and eighty windows. This view of the edifice presents all the advantages arising from simplicity and due proportion.

The vestibule, or great hall occupies the centre, and is a thoroughfare for the public from one street to another. It is about eighty feet in length; in breadth sixty feet; and at the apex it is fifty-three feet high. It is supported by two lines of six columns, similar to those of the portico, and formed of Portland stone upon pedestals of granite.

The several rooms for receiving newspapers, inland, ship, and foreign letters, are on the north side of the vestibule. Further north are the inland letter-sorters' and letter-carriers' rooms. These offices extend the whole length of the front, from the portico to the north wing, and are tastefully finished. The latter is thirty-five feet high, and the fittings are well arranged for the despatch of the duty. The mails are received at the doorway in the Foster-lane front, and are taken into a room called the "tick-room," where the receipt of them is checked. In this part of the building is also a spacious office, which, by very recent alterations, has been made to open into the sorting-room, appropriated to the correspondence of the West Indies: also the comptroller's and mail-coach offices.

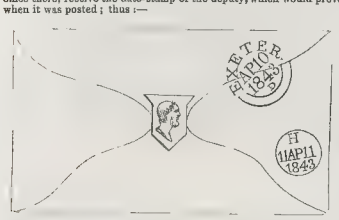
On the south side of the vestibule are the money-order, receiver-general, and accountant-general's offices; and at the eastern end of the money-order office is the London-district post-office, comprising the receiving, and sorters' rooms. Underneath the flooring of the vestibule is a tunnel, through which letters and papers are conveyed in small waggons to and from the inland to the district offices, invented by Mr. Barron.

On the first floor are the board-room, secretary's office, his clerk's office, and the solicitor's office at the eastern end, on the north side is a staircase leading to the letter-bill, dead, miss-sent, and returned-letter offices. The whole of the floors are of American oak.

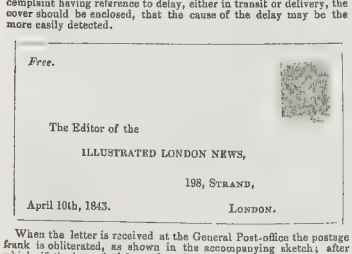
At the northern end are the inquiry-office, for letters not come to hand; the inland-office, for overcharges, and complaints relative to the delivery; and the newspaper-office, from which, alone, not less than three hundred and fifty thousand newspapers are despatched weekly! In the basement are rooms for the custody of the mail-bags, guards' rooms, an armoury, and servants' offices. Altogether the building is furnished with every requisite for such an office, including ingenious machinery for conveying coals from the cellars to every story in the building; two powerful steam-engines for the purposes of ventilation; and a simple but effective means of obtaining a copious supply of water in case of fire.

Relative to the mode by which the internal duty, both morning and evening, is conducted, we regret that we have not space fully to detail the mode adopted in each department. If want of room, however, prevents us from doing this, it is nevertheless our intention to furnish an accurate notice of the manner in which a letter is treated from its reception at the office in St. Martin's-le-Grand, to its despatch thence to its destination, either in town or country.

Suppose a letter was directed from our agent at Exeter for delivery at our office in London. It would, upon being put into the post-office there, receive the date-stamp of the deputy, which would prove when it was posted; thus:—



The under stamp with the single rim is the London date-stamp, and shows when the letter ought to be delivered. In all cases of complaint having reference to delay, either in transit or delivery, the cover should be enclosed, that the cause of the delay may be the more easily detected.



When the letter is received at the General Post-office the postage frank is obliterated, as shown in the accompanying sketch; after which, if the letter is delivered as dated in the metropolitan stamp, the Post-office has done its duty, the service being complete.

When a letter is dropped into the box at the General Post-office for delivery in the country it falls into a large drawer, which is cleared, if necessary, every few minutes. The letters are then thrown upon a large table and "faced." This process consists in causing all the addresses to face the party so employed. It is then stamped with the evening stamp, the initial letter of which is altered daily. Then it is sorted to the "road," where the bags are "made up," for the mail in which it is to be sent. This process continues until the last letter appears—generally about fifteen minutes before eight; sometimes it is five minutes later, according to the pressure of the duty. As the letters are received from the men who "collect" them from the parties who "assort" them, they are tied in bundles, and put into pigeon-holes representing the towns to which they are to be despatched. At a quarter to eight every man is at his post. All around the vast parallelogram of the inland office may be seen, each engaged, but not one interfering with the duty of the other, about three hundred men; clerks, letter-carriers, and messengers. There stands the mail-guard ready to put into his road-sack the bags as they are tied and sealed, precisely in the order the towns fall, as he takes his nightly journey. Simultaneously the bags are sealed, deposited, and tied; at once the whole of the ponderous sacks are shouldered by the attendants; and the messengers of hope, and fear, and joy, and love are on their way, by the time St. Paul's bell has tolled eight of the clock, to impart their varied tidings to the thousands of expectant mortals who form the letter-writing portion of the family of man.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON, SATURDAY, MAY 13, 1843.

It is with unfeigned pleasure that we have encountered the following paragraph in the columns of the daily press:—

ANTI-DUELLING ASSOCIATION.—An association has been just formed for the suppression of duelling. It consists of 326 members, including 21 noblemen, 13 sons of noblemen, 15 members of parliament, 12 baronets, 30 admirals and generals, 44 captains R.N., 23 colonels and lieutenant-colonels, 17 majors, 26 captains in the army, 20 lieutenants R.N., and 26 barristers. They denounce duelling as sinful, irrational, and contrary to the laws of God and man. They also pledge themselves to discountenance by influence and example a practice which so greatly dishonours God. Captain Hope, R.N., and Mr. W. Dunmore, have become hon. secretaries to the association.

We may now hope that the disgraceful practice of duelling may, by the well-directed energies of good men, be speedily exploded, and become a dead letter upon our social code. When men, to whom honour is ever dearer than life—who would part with it for no worldly ambition—who have maintained it upon the field of battle and at the cannon's mouth—who have made it the inseparable accompaniment of their rank and station—who have won esteem for it upon the bench, in the senate, and at the bar—have the moral courage to proclaim their repugnance to the principles of the duel — to declare it criminal, unchristian, and in defiance of God, then society will hardly consent to be shamed into its practice by the denunciation of the mere bully, or to admit that there can be either moral or physical cowardice in resolutely refraining from the commission of an acknowledged crime. Here are untainted nobles, gallant officers of both services, revered civilians, men learned in the law (and we need not add how this will be strengthened by the enthusiastic co-operation of the clergy), bonded together in a firm phalanx of opposition to one of the most barbarous recourses of vengeance and anomalies of civilization, and most assuredly this will put it down. Happy shall we be to regard the auspicious hour of its fall—to know that duelling is not only forbidden in practice but detested in spirit—and that society shall have become too chivalrously jealous of real honour to sacrifice one iota of its virtue to the sophistry and cruelty of that which is abominably false.

How seldom does it fall to the lot of the public journalist to address his readers in unqualified terms of congratulation on the aspect of public affairs, or be able to console the nation for its sacrifice of blood and treasure with a positive assurance that even the most glorious and decided conquests will bring peace and all its concomitant blessings in its train, for hardly does war begin ——— to grow dull in the East

Ere it orders its wings and flies off to the West.

Hardly has the Governor-General of India received the submission of the Ameers of Scinde, and concluded his address of peaceful exultation to his victorious generals—hardly has the ink with which the Chinese treaty of peace and commerce has been written dried—hardly have the intrigues of incendiary diplomatists to disturb our peaceful relations abroad been foiled and exposed, ere our ears are assailed and our worst feelings excited, not by a shout of defiance from our "natural enemies," but by the barbarous and inhuman cry of CIVIL WAR. We have no sympathy with those who, whatever be their creed or colour, could attempt to achieve a political object, however great, by means of human bloodshed, however trifling; and we are often inclined to regard with distrust (for who can "stay the whirlwind") the motives of those who incessantly ring in our ears the delusive jargon of "moral force" and "peaceful agitation." Whatever may be the motives of the parties engaged in agitating for a repeal of the legislative union between England and Ireland (and we do not mean to say that they are not perfectly sincere and patriotic), one thing is certain, that the state of the question has begun to assume a most alarming and dangerous complexion, and it behoves the friends of peace and social order on both sides of the Channel to exert their influence to assuage the bitter feelings which the taunting asperities of party will inevitably excite in the course of its discussion. Already, we regret to say, have parties begun to calculate the chances which Ireland would have in a struggle with this country; and whilst some insane persons in Ireland have not hesitated to avow their reliance on America and France, we speak it to our shame that parties have been found in this country assuming to themselves the direction of public opinion who have been foolish and wicked enough to follow their example, and, in a spirit which is disgraceful to a Christian land, have retaliated with the feelings of a Cherokee, that "the two Protestant counties of Down and Antrim are fully adequate to the conquest of the rest of Ireland in a fair field." This is not the way in which this question should be treated. The time has gone past when these barbarous appeals to "cold iron" were regarded as a sufficient proof of the truth and justice of a cause. The Irish, though irritable, and, on national grounds, easily provoked, are shrewd and quick-witted, and no man can long continue to delude them—not even Mr. O'Connell—when once their better judgment is aroused. This, we repeat, therefore, is not the way to deal with the question. The absurdities of repeal will be better enforced by argument than at the point of the bayonet, and by the Government endeavouring to alleviate the just grievances which exist, and the perpetuation of which has caused greater dissatisfaction than the want of a resident Parliament. The Poor-law, we have no doubt, has made many converts to the repeal of the legislative union; but a repeal of that ill-judged and unwise measure will have great effect in allaying the ferment which now prevails. Mail-coach contracts and matters of that kind are, to be sure, but "straws upon the wind," but the sooner such indications are dispensed with, the better will it be for the peace and prosperity of the United Kingdom.

THE COURT AND HAUT TON.

LORD CHAMBERLAIN'S OFFICE, May 10, 1843.—Notice is hereby given, that his Royal Highness Prince Albert will, by the desire of her Majesty, hold a levee at St. James's Palace, on behalf of her Majesty, on Wednesday next, the 17th instant, at two o'clock.

His Royal Highness Prince Albert, the ladies and gentlemen of the royal suite, and the household, attended Divine Service, on Sunday morning, in the Chapel-royal, Buckingham Palace. The Rev. Mr. Vane, deputy-clerk of the closet in waiting, officiated, and preached the sermon, taking his text from Job, chap. xxvii. verse 28. Her Majesty the Queen Dowager and her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent attended Divine Service in the Chapel-royal, St. James's. The sermon was preached by the Rev. Cholmeley Dering, who took his text from Psalm cxi. verse 26. The prayers were read by the Rev. Mr. Barham, and the lessons and communion-service by the Rev. Mr. Haden. Handel's funeral anthem, "His body is buried in peace"—Chorus, "But his name liveth evermore," was performed. Mr. Cooper presided at the organ.

On Monday her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent went to Buckingham Palace. The unfavourable state of the weather throughout the day prevented the Prince of Wales and the Princess Royal being taken their usual airings. A Cabinet Council was held at the Foreign office. The ministers present were—Sir Robert Peel, the Duke of Wellington, Lord Wharncliffe, the Duke of Buccleuch, Earl of Aberdeen, Sir James Graham, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, Earl of Haddington, Earl of Ripon, Sir Henry Hardinge, and Sir Edward Knatchbull. Lord Fitzgerald, continuing ill, was unable to attend the council. The council sat two hours.

On Tuesday her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent and the Duchess of Gloucester arrived at Buckingham Palace in the afternoon. His Royal Highness Prince Albert left Buckingham Palace in a carriage and four at half-past eight o'clock in the morning for the terminus of the Great Western Railway, at Paddington. His Royal Highness and suite left by a special train for Slough, and went from that station to Windsor Castle. His Royal Highness inspected the alterations in progress, and afterwards returned by a special train to town, arriving at Buckingham Palace with his suite twenty minutes before two o'clock.

On Wednesday, her Majesty the Queen Dowager, attended by Countess Brownlow, Lady in Waiting, visited the Queen at Buckingham Palace. His Royal Highness Prince Albert, attended by Colonel Wylde, Equerry in Waiting, rode out on horseback. Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent visited her Majesty in the afternoon.

The Duke of Wellington gave a sumptuous entertainment, on Wednesday evening, at Apsley House, to a high y distinguished circle, including his Royal Highness Prince George of Cambridge. The party afterwards went to the Ancient Concert, of which performance the noble and gallant duke was director for the evening.

THE KING OF HANOVER.—The King's journey to London is decided on. We cannot exactly state the time when this will take place; but we can positively announce that part of the King's effects, for instance, the silver plate, had been sent to London by the monthly courier, and also that some of his Majesty's horses were on the way, and some of the servants are already gone to England. This and the preparations which have been ordered in London give reason to suppose that his Majesty means to make a long stay in the British capital. Nothing is yet known respecting the conduct of his affairs of government during his absence.

The Courrier Français announces that the Duke and Duchess of Nemours would shortly leave for England, on a visit to Queen Victoria and Prince Albert.

It is currently reported in the court circles that it is her Majesty's intention to gave two state balls in the ensuing month at Buckingham Palace; and, in addition to the levee on Wednesday next, to be holden by Prince Albert, as locum tenens for the Queen, there are to be two levees more, at which her Majesty intends to be present.

DEATH OF LORD FITZGERALD AND VESEY.—We regret to have the painful task of communicating to our readers the intelligence of the death of this distinguished nobleman, President of the Board of Control, which took place on Thursday morning, at his residence in Belgrave-square.

POSTSCRIPT.

Saturday Morning.

We are happy to state that her Majesty continues to progress daily in health and strength.

There will be a grand dinner given to the noble directors of the Concerts of Ancient Music at Buckingham Palace on Wednesday next, on which day Highness Prince Albert being the President instead of Vice-president, of the Board of Trade. This change will not cause a new election. Mr. Gladstone will, of course, have a seat in the Cabinet.

Two unfortunate labourers, named Buckley and Holland, were drowned off Alderman's Stairs on Thursday last, whilst coming ashore from the Dublin Steam-Packet Company's boat, on board of which they were employed. The accident was caused by a fellow named Hoskins jumping suddenly into the boat from an adjoining barge and thus swamping it. Nine others narrowly escaped sharing a similar fate.

METROPOLITAN NEWS.

IMPORTANT TO THE WINE TRADE.—The following circular has been received by a commercial house in Dublin:—"London, May 4. Sir,—We were present at an interview yesterday with Sir Robert Peel and Mr. Goulburn, from which we can inform you that Government intends to put a modified excise system upon wines, with the view of enabling foreign wines to lay in stock, upon which the difference will be allowed in the event of any future reduction of duty. We are truly, Sir, your most obedient servants, SANDEMAN, ENGLISH AND CO."

FAILURE OF MESSRS. ACKERMANN AND CO.—The well known firm of Ackermann and Co., printsellers and engravers, in the Strand, suspended payment on Friday week, when they issued the following circular to their creditors:—"96, Strand, May 5, 1843. It is our painful duty to inform you, that after eleven years' struggle to surmount the difficulties under which we took the business of our predecessor, and also on account of the heavy losses sustained by our foreign connexions, we find ourselves compelled to suspend our payments. We are now making up our books and valuing the stock, with a view, at the shortest possible period, to submit a statement of our affairs to the consideration of the creditors. We are your very obedient servants, ACKERMANN AND CO.—P.S. We must trouble you to send us a statement of your account immediately."

THE LITERARY FUND SOCIETY.—This distinguished society held its anniversary festival at the Freemasons'-hall on Wednesday last, the convivialities being presided over by his Grace the Duke of Sutherland. At the close of the evening the secretary announced that the total subscriptions received during the evening amounted to more than £800.

At the adjourned meeting of factory masters and members for the northern boroughs and counties held on Wednesday, upon the Factories Bill, at the British Hotel, Cockspur-street, the hon. Stuart Wortley in the chair, the following resolutions were carried:—"That the Factory Bill, now before the house of Commons, proposes for all children from 8 to 13 years of age enactments which have a direct tendency to prevent them obtaining employment." "That no valuable moral or educational benefit, or domestic duties properly performed, where the labour in factories extends to twelve hours daily exclusive of meals." "That the labour in factories be uniform, and reduced to within reasonable limits, so as to accomplish this desirable object."

ELECTION OF CHAMBERLAIN.—On Tuesday last the nomination of candidates for the office of Chamberlain of the City of London, vacant by the retirement of Sir J. Shaw, took place at a common hall held at Guildhall for that purpose, when Sir J. Pirie was proposed by Mr. Alderman Thompson, seconded by Mr. Deputy Stevens; and Sir W. Heygate was proposed by Alderman Sir Matthew Wood, seconded by Mr. Heath. The show of hands was declared to be in favour of Sir J. Pirie, and a poll was then demanded, which is to keep open for eight days. At the close of the poll on Wednesday the numbers were—for Heygate, 1343; Pirie, 1291; majority, 52. On Thursday Sir W. Heygate's majority exceeded 400, when Sir J. Pirie retired from the contest.

THE RECTORSHIP OF ST. SAVIOUR'S, SOUTHWARK.—In consequence of the death of the Rev. William Mann, for many years rector of St. Saviour's, Southwark, a vacancy has occurred, which has given rise to a very strongly contested. The living is the right of the parishioners, and the value is supposed to be £600 or £700 a year, including the perquisites. At present the Rev. S. Benson, the evening preacher at that church, is the only candidate in the field, but it is thought at least eight or ten others will be put in nomination.

IRELAND.

REPEAL MEETING AT THE CURRAGH OF KILDARE.—On Sunday last this meeting, which has been regarded with some anxiety, on account of the rumours that the Government intended to prevent it, was held on the vast plain called the Curragh of Kildare, so famous as the chief racing ground for the sporting gentry of the country. From an early hour in the morning Dublin—the distance is nearly forty-five Irish miles—was lined with vehicles of various kinds, conveying parties to the meeting. From the different towns and villages adjacent to the Curragh great numbers of the peasantry flocked in. Various estimates have been made of the numbers assembled on this occasion, the most moderate of which is that they amounted to about seventy or eighty thousand persons. Tents were erected on the ground, in which coffee, and other refreshments were sold to the peasantry, but there seemed to be no appearance of whisky. A strong force of military was stationed at the barracks of Newbridge, four miles from the place of meeting. Mr. O'Connell arrived on the ground shortly after two o'clock, and addressed the meeting in a speech which occupied nearly two hours in the delivery. After the usual resolutions had been adopted a vote of confidence was passed by acclamation to Mr. O'Connell, expressing their hope that he would never cease his exertions until he restored to Ireland her domestic Legislature.

On Monday there was an extremely crowded meeting at the Corn Exchange, for the same object. The streets and passages, as well as the large room and gallery, were thronged, and the heat was quite oppressive. The sum of £100 was announced as the result of the meeting at the Curragh on the previous day. The meeting was occupied with the receipt of money from various parts of the country. Nearly £500 of "Repeal rent" had been handed in.

NATIONAL SPORTS.

THE APPROACHING DERBY.

In the absence of any race meeting of mark during the present week a consequent increase of spirit has been infused into the approaching great events to come. These are the two great issues to be decided so soon on Banstead downs—the Derby and Oaks. We will confine our present notice to the former, merely hinting that, for the small adventurer, the Oaks seem to promise the least risk, with the best return, to the enterprising.

The result of the spring racing at Newmarket has been to make of one of the worst of last year's debutants a worthy candidate for the honours of the Country Three-year-old Stakes. Against a field that will certainly consist of more than twenty Cotherstone has been backed outright, as the public pose is to enable the sunniest speculator—he who lays his £50 or £100 with a friend to judge for himself how it may best be invested; always begging he will inform himself who may be the proprietor of a horse before he backs him for the smallest coin current in the realm.

The best public horse out last year was A British Yeoman, subsequently backed by the public for a sum that must insure his defeat—should he be the best on the day, and brought to the post up to the mark—unless a miracle be wrought in his favour. Pienipo, backed by honest men on honest grounds, to win in the Leger, and to Epsom Derby, which have proven that reasty, beaten like a lame donkey. To say nothing disparaging of Robert Johnson, his trainer, we should hardly think him fit to put the muffles on with such men as those who have laid against the Yeoman to win a fortune.

Cotherstone, so recently elected to the premiership, has run a good winner this year, and he is in good hands. It is true he has not been "Cherished" lot against the rest of the stable" is a bet we would recommend to a friend.

Windsor and Blackdrop—the latter only just creeping into the market—are in one of the good running stables on the season. Meantime, however, to our notion, brings out with more stock better than new. He can train for a distance and for general running better than for a short course and a particular occasion.

Amorino, a great fine horse, who among his own people is booked as sure, will cut up badly if it be a true run race, if it comes off "flatteringly" he will be a dangerous customer. Sir Gilbert will not allow his horses to do work enough for modern racing and modern distances, in which there is no chance unless the lungs have been made as pliant as Indian-rubber by constant and severe exertion.

Gasper is a cripple, and when sound was none of the best; he is as sure to run as to lose, unless he should happen to be another Theodore or Phosphorus.

Aristides is one of the outside division that will, from present indications, be a good favourite before the day; back him at his present price, you can't lose much, and may hedge handsomely.

Newcourt, a very promising two year old, will be made the most of, so far as integrity goes—we don't fancy his bringing up. He ran a good second to Mameluke, the crack of her year, and ought to show forward.

General Pollock, twice a winner at Chester the week before last, though a big lazy colt, has the gift of going faster the farther the distance, and will beat more than beat him at Tottenham-corner.

For the others now in the market we have no word of experience or hope deserving of strength or force to offer. The field is to be preferred as an investment, nobody knows what, beyond the present favourites, so long as the following prices shall be current.

ACCIDENTS AND OFFENCES.

EXTRAORDINARY SUICIDE BY A YOUNG FEMALE.—A most singular case of suicide has been committed by a respectable young female, named Isabella Jarvis, sixteen years of age, whose parents reside at No. 12, Bath-street, Tabernacle-square, Finsbury. It appears that the deceased was a remarkably handsome young woman, who had, about seven weeks ago, gone to reside in the family of Mr. Jones, a pastry-cook and confectioner, in Norton-folgate. On Thursday week she went to a chymist's shop in the neighbourhood, and stated she had come from Mr. Jones for some arsenic to kill the rats, which was readily supplied to her, as Mr. Jones was in the habit of having that article for the purpose she alleged. On her return home she mixed the poisonous ingredient in six or six rising rats. It was soon after ascertained that she had herself taken the poison. Medical assistance was immediately sent for, and the proper antidotes were administered, but, notwithstanding every effort, she sank under the effect of the poison, and died on Wednesday. At present there does not appear to be the slightest reason that could have induced her to destroy herself.

MELANCHOLY DEATH OF A MAGISTRATE.—On Sunday Mr. George Smith, a county magistrate, and previously to the formation of the Greenwich police court one of the presiding magistrates at the petty sessions, committed suicide by hanging himself at his residence in Park-place, Greenwich. The unfortunate gentleman was highly esteemed, and was said to be possessed of great wealth. Various rumours are in circulation as to the cause, as he had only a short time before returned home after attending divine service at Greenwich church, leaving Mrs. Smith behind to partake of the sacrament. An inquest was held on the body on Tuesday; the facts as to the suicide having been proved, Dr. Southey, of Charlotte-street, deposed that he had attended deceased, and recommended his removal for a change of air. He was aware that he ought to be under restraint. He did not consider that restraint should be violent or coercive except to a very moderate extent. A surgeon of Greenwich also deposed to his state of mind. Circumstances induced him to think he should be placed under restraint, but he was so tractable and amiable that it would have been cruelty to have prevented him walking alone. His (deceased's) impression appeared to be that he had made an incorrect return for the Income-tax. He was one of the commissioners, and that one idea had induced insanity. The jury returned a verdict of "Temporary insanity."

LAW INTELLIGENCE.

COURT OF QUEEN'S BENCH.

On Monday George White, one of the Chartists, who was convicted at the late assizes for Warwickshire of having used seditious language, and attempting to provoke a breach of the peace, was brought up to receive judgment. Justice Patteson pronounced the sentence, which was, that the defendant be imprisoned in the Queen's Bench prison for eight easendar months.

In the Court of Exchequer, on Wednesday, Lord Abinger gave judgment in the celebrated gambling case, Spencer v. Bond, in favour of the plaintiff—thus discharging the rule obtained by the defendant for a new trial.

WESTMINSTER GENERAL SESSIONS

(Before Mr. Serjeant Adams and a full Bench of Magistrates.)

On Wednesday Mary Rees, a lady of independant fortune and highly respectable connexions, being related to some of the first families in Wales, and who resided near Cardiff, and was formerly a milliner, was indicted for feloniously stealing on the 20th of April last, a pair of white silk stockings, value 8s., the property of Nathaniel Hil, hosier, of Regent-street. The prisoner was dressed in mourning, and wore a handsome black lace veil, so that her features might not be recognised. The only witness for the prosecution was the shopman, who deposed to finding the stockings under the prisoner's shawl. Mr. Chambers for the prisoner, said he hoped to show that the articles were taken by mistake, and the jury, after four hour's consultation, returned a verdict of "Not Guilty." It was stated by one of the witnesses that Rees was not the lady's real name.

CENTRAL CRIMINAL COURT.

The seventh session of the present mayoralty commenced on Monday morning last, before the Right Honourable the Lord Mayor, the Recorder, the Sheriffs, the Under-Sheriffs, Aldermen Farncomb and John Johnson, and other civic functionaries.

The calendar contains a list of 286 prisoners, of whom there stand charged with bigamy, 1; burglary, 8; uttering and having in possession counterfeit coin, 7; cutting and wounding, 4; embezzlement, 9; forgery and uttering forged instruments, 3; housebreaking and larceny, 9; larceny, 145; larceny and receiving stolen goods, 16; larceny from the person, 40; larceny by servants, 18; stealing post-letters, 3; misdemeanor, 9; murder, 1; rape, 3; receiving stolen goods, &c., 6; robbery, 1; shooting with intent to murder, 1. The committals are—from London, 93; Middlesex, 202; Essex, 2; Kent, 36; and Surrey, 24. Total, 286.

ROBBERY AT GREENWICH FAIR.—On Tuesday Robert Wilson, aged 27 upholsterer, was placed at the bar, charged with stealing two gold pins and chain, value 16s., the property of Frederick Shemeld, from his person.—The prisoner was defended by Mr. Huddleston.—It appeared from the evidence that the prosecutor and some friends had been diverting themselves at Greenwich fair on Tuesday, the 18th April, and on coming out of a public-house, about half-past ten o'clock in the evening, the prisoner, who was with a number of other persons, struck at him, and in the scuffle managed to abstract the pins from his stock. Favoured by the crowd and confusion, the prisoner made his escape. On Wednesday week, however, he was apprehended near the Elephant and Castle public-house, and at once gave him into custody. The prosecutor and his friend swore positively to his identity.—The jury returned a verdict of "Guilty." Sentence—Transportation for ten years.

Several pickpocket and other cases of minor importance were disposed of during the day. None of them, however, possessed any feature of public interest.

On Wednesday Mr. Justice Coltman took his seat upon the bench at ten o'clock.—John William White, 33, the captain of a schooner called the Native, and Joseph Youngbusband, 40, the mate of the same vessel, were indicted for feloniously casting away and destroying her. The facts of this case have already appeared.—Both prisoners pleaded guilty to the offence of which they were accused.—Mr. Justice Coltman took time to consider the sentence.

Several letter-carriers and clerks employed in the Post-office were convicted of stealing letters containing money. Sentence deferred.

POLICE.

LAMBETH-STREET.—SINGULAR CASE.—Mrs. Ann Flemming, a respectable-looking female, applied to Mr. Henry for his advice and assistance, under the following somewhat singular and extraordinary circumstances:—From the statement of the applicant, who it appears is connected with several highly respectable families, it appeared that some years ago, contrary to the wishes of her family, she married a linen-draper's assistant, named John Flemming, and by her property they were enabled to open a large establishment in the drapery and haberdashery way, in Sydney-place, Commercial-road-east; but, by the extravagance of her husband, they ultimately failed there, and the business, as well as the freehold which belonged to her, had been disposed of. Her husband after this had left her, and lived with a Miss Taylor, whom he had taken from her friends at Croydon. Some time after he had left her her husband had obtained a situation as assistant to Mr. Howell, a linen-draper, in Oxford-street, but had not been long in his place when he was taken into custody on a charge of plundering his employer to a considerable extent, and was committed to the Old Bailey on the charge. In June, 1841, he was tried at the Old Bailey, found guilty of the offence, and sentenced to six months' hard labour in the House of Correction, a sentence which, under the circumstances, was considered exceedingly lenient. What became of him after this the applicant was unable to state with any accuracy, but in the month of November last both he and her sister had attended at Shoreditch workhouse and identified the body of a female that had been picked out of the Regent's-canal a day or two before as hers, and wrote the name "Ann Flemming" on the lid of the shell in which the body was placed. An inquest was subsequently held before Mr. Baker, the coroner, when the body was spoken of and treated as hers (applicant's), when a verdict of "Found drowned" was returned, and the body was left to be buried at the expense of the parish.—Mr. Henry. How long is it since these circumstances came to your knowledge?—Mrs. Flemming: About three months ago, sir.—Mr. Henry: How did you become acquainted with them?—Mrs. Flemming: My own sister acknowledged the fact to me. On my calling on her about three months ago she, on seeing me, seemed dreadfully agitated, and nearly fainted; and she then told me that she and my husband had been to Kingsland-road, and identified a body in the workhouse there as mine. She said it was very much decomposed from being in the water so long, and she was sure it was mine.—Mr. Henry: Then do you think they had made a mistake in supposing the body to have been yours?—Mrs. Flemming: Not at all, sir. It was a wilful mistake, to obtain possession of my property. The fact, your worship, is, that I am entitled to a freehold property in Ashford, in Kent, of the value of £800, at the death of an aged aunt; and I have found that my husband has obtained £400 or £500 upon it from Mr. Jemmett, the banker in the town, and intended, upon a representation that I had been found drowned as before stated.—Mr. Henry: Well, what is your object in applying to me; what do you want me to do in the matter?—Mrs. Flemming: Since my husband left me, sir, I have been employed in the establishment of Mr. Vyse, of Ludgate-hill, and earn a competence for my support: but that gentleman, as well as many friends of mine, have advised me to apply to your worship, as I reside in the parish of Whitechapel, in the hope that you will recommend the parish to take up my case, so that my husband may be prevented from squandering away my property under the false pretence of his having died, and that I may obtain a proper settlement of my affairs.—Mr. Hughes, the relieving officer of Whitechapel, having entered the court upon other business, Mr. Henry explained to him the nature of the application, and said he thought it was a case in which the parish ought to interfere.—Mr. Hughes undertook to do what was necessary, and the applicant, after thanking Mr. Henry for his courtesy and kindness, left the court with him.

THE CONFIRMATION AT ST. ANDREW'S, HOLBORN

[The Bishop of London has been holding confirmations in several of the metropolitan churches—one of the more recent of which was given this present week, at St. Andrew's, Holborn, and is here represented by our artist.]

It is a holy sight!—fair spirits now
Put on new wings for Heaven's eternal throne;
And YOUTH, with pure resolve on heart and brow,
And soul hope-lighted, walks with God alone!
Responsible, and with fresh life imbued,
It takes the higher calling of the mind,
With self-reliance, faith, and fortitude,
Within its bounding bosom fair enshrined,
Confirm'd into the bright and blessed creed
Which sheds its halo round the Christian's shrine;
Exhorted on to holy thought and deed,
To win on earth from Heaven its crown divine:
And, while the storm-paths of the world are trod,
To keep the eye of hope and trust on God!

THE GIRAFFES, AND THEIR NUBIAN ATTENDANTS, AT THE SURREY ZOOLOGICAL GARDENS.

The above is a faithful and spirited representation of the curiosities whose recent arrival at the Surrey Gardens we noticed last week. They are now regularly domiciled in their new abode, and appear to enjoy the comparative freedom which their commodious dwelling affords. All are in the finest possible health and condition, capering about in the wildest glee, and indulging in the most amusing antics in their rough play with their keepers and with each other. Three of the fine giraffes are males, and the females indicate a probability that this extraordinary animal will ultimately become a completely domesticated inhabitant of our northern clime. The antelopes are of those extremely rare and beautiful species the Addax (Lichtenstein) and Leucoryx (Pallas). The Addax, of which these two specimens are the first that have been seen alive in England, was well known to the ancients under the name of Strepsiceros, given to them by Pliny, but had been overlooked by all subsequent naturalists until lately rediscovered by Rüppell and Ehrenberg. When full grown, it is a very large and powerful animal, measuring six or seven feet from the muzzle to the tip of the tail, and three feet in height over the shoulder, with horns of three feet in length measured along the curves. The horns are slender in proportion to their length, annulated to within five or six inches of the points, and have a most remarkable twist, describing two turns of a wide spiral. The colour is a greyish white, except the head and neck, which are of a deep reddish brown, with a transverse mark of pure white across the face. Its hoofs are broad to enable it to run swiftly in the deep sands of its native deserts.

The "Abou-Harb" derives the name of Leucoryx from its milk-white colour. It is as large as the Addax, but differs in the colour and markings, and in the form of the horns, which rise from the plane of the forehead in a single curve, forming a large segment of a circle over the back. In this singular arrangement is inferred to have originated the fable of the unicorn, as the Leucoryx is frequently seen sculptured on the ancient monuments of Egypt, and being generally in profile, only one horn is represented, which gives it something like the appearance of the heraldic supporter of our royal arms. This is particularly conspicuous in the great pyramid at Memphis, where a group of them is figured, some being dragged along by cords as though they formed a part of a triumphant procession to some distant country. Both these species of antelopes live in the sandy deserts of Central Africa.

The two native attendants who accompany the animals seem to divide the attention of the visitors with their quadruped companions, and although perhaps not so extraordinary in their appearance, are more rarely seen here, as they belong to tribes that hardly ever wander away from their own homes on the shores of the White Nile. They are both portions of the great Barâtra family, but differ exceedingly in their characteristics. One is a boy of the true Nouba race, from Kordofan in Upper Abyssinia. He has the short curled hair, thick lips, and intensely black complexion, which peculiarly characterise his people. The other is a noble fellow, of fine proportions, with the beautifully curved nose, perfectly intellectual countenance, and well-shaped head of the genuine Dongolawi. He is a native of Dar Dongola.

They are clothed in rich Oriental costume, and their strikingly graceful attitudes add a wild and picturesque effect to the whole group. They appear to be much attached to their charge, addressing the giraffes affectionately by their Arabic names, which are very fanciful and poetical, as "Ou-Doom," the strong horse; "Sitt-el-Vënat," the beautiful young maiden; 'Karr-koor,' the great mountain; "S'Ahbeeb-Effendi," the noble magistrate, &c.

ROWLAND HILL.

Having devoted a considerable portion of our space this week to a sketch of the Post-office, and a detail of the manner in which the multifarious duties of that establishment are performed, we think that the portrait of one who has done so much as Mr. Rowland Hill has to make that institution a truly national one, will form a most suitable accompaniment.

If the gratitude of a nation is due to those brave men who stand up in defence of our liberties and rights when foreign foes have attempted to trample upon them, and if such men are considered, by virtue of such services, worthy of civil distinction and national regard, how much more so is he worthy of both who, by his ingenuity, perseverance, and patriotism, has contributed to advance the sacred cause of civilization and freedom both at home and abroad! Eminently distinguished in this respect is the subject of our present sketch. It is to Rowland Hill that we are indebted for the incalculable benefits of the penny postage upon all inland correspondence; for the introduction of an uniform charge regulated not by distance but by weight, and for many other reductions in the rates of foreign and colonial postage.

PORTRAIT OF ROWLAND HILL.

Early in the year 1837 Mr. Hill published a pamphlet recommending that inland postage rates should be reduced to an uniform charge of one penny per half-ounce; and developing a plan by which, in his opinion, so great an improvement might be effected without causing eventually any very serious loss to the revenue. In the latter part of the same year the House of Commons appointed a committee to inquire into the subject. After a most laborious and thorough investigation, extending over the whole of the session of 1837—8, the said committee reported favourably of Mr. Hill's plan, and strongly recommended its partial adoption immediately, and its complete introduction, "as soon as the state of the public revenue would admit of the risking a large temporary reduction;" at the same time expressing an opinion "that the evidence established," among other facts, that "very injurious effects resulted from the old state of things to the commerce and industry of the country, and to the social habits and moral condition of the people."

In the succeeding session more than two thousand petitions from all parties were presented to the Legislature, praying for the immediate introduction of Mr. Hill's plan. More than three hundred of these petitions were from town councils and other public bodies; the greater part of them had but a single signature each, notwithstanding which the total number of signatures exceeded two hundred and sixty thousand.

Upon the 12th July, 1839, by a resolution of the House of Commons, it was considered expedient to reduce the postage to the uniform penny rate, to abolish the franking privilege, and strictly to regulate official franking. Subsequently a bill was founded upon this resolution, and shortly afterwards its provisions became the law of the land.

On the 14th of September, 1839, Mr. Hill was appointed to assist, under the direction of the Treasury Board, "in carrying into effect the penny postage." In January, 1840, the reduced rate was in operation; and before the close of the session in that year permanence was given to the above arrangements. Notwithstanding these circumstances, in September last Mr. Hill was discharged from his duties by the present Government, not because of any want of ability or zeal on his part, but because the minister of the crown was apprehensive that his continuance in office would bring about a collision between himself and the executive officers of the General Post-office! Of the injustice of this step it is but natural that Mr. Hill should complain. The substance of that complaint he has embodied in a petition to the House of Commons, which has been presented by the Right Hon. Francis Thornhill Baring, M.P., and to which, we understand, Sir Thomas Wilde has given notice that he shall call the attention of the house after the Easter holidays. To deprive a faithful public servant of a fair opportunity of earning the reward to which he is so justly entitled, in seeing his plan carried out without mutilation by those who are in office, and in reaping the satisfaction resulting from its success, is to commit an act of injustice to which we hope the present Government will be no party; and which, we are sure, if they are, the people of England will correct their error in language of remonstrance neither to be slighted nor mistaken.

THE MAY MEETINGS.

If some men were asked to designate the glory of England they would point to her victorious armies, her vast and still accumulating wealth, and the extent of her growing dominions; but others—the real benefactors of her immense family—would rather direct attention to her schools, her charities, and her missions. These confer on her a moral and enduring lustre, which neither martial prowess, nor mercantile enterprise, nor political empire, have ever been able to impart. It is desirable that causes so great and worthy in themselves, so salutary in their results, and so essential to the best interests of the nation, should receive the strongest support the British press can render them. We have therefore resolved on giving their proceedings a place in our columns, and to continue, as occasion may require, to give their sacred labours the publicity which their paramount importance demands.

PAH PAH-SE-HAY.

FESTIVAL OF THE SONS OF THE CLERGY—CHOIR OF ST. PAUL'S.

The May meetings may be considered in the light of a great Parliament of Benevolence sitting in committees for the amendment of the philanthropic constitution of the state, and the distribution of the million of money placed, for the most part by the poor of the land, at their disposal. These sittings are attended by such multitudes of persons from all parts of the country, that during their continuance the aspects of the streets of London lose much of their dingy metropolitan air, and assume the healthful jocund look of a provincial festival. They are held in various large chapels, the halls of the mission houses, Crosby Hall, the schools of various denominations, but chiefly in Exeter Hall, which was built a few years since expressly for their accommodation.

This year an unusual degree of excitement has prevailed amongst them in consequence of the danger to which the Protestant missions and schools in the Pacific are believed to be exposed by the Propagandism of Rome and the French occupancy of Tahite, and also, by the injury which it is supposed will be done to the Sunday-schools, and to the schools of Dissenters generally, by the operation of the proposed Factories Education Bill. On these topics we feel that the zeal of our friends has in some degree outrun their ordinary discretion, and that on both points their very commendable but ill-considered fears are destined to speedy disappointment.

The first meeting deserving general attention, and one which, considering the deplorable ignorance of Irish peasantry, we commend to the charitable sympathies of our readers, was that of the founded in 1813 by Ivimey, the historian of the Baptists, for "giving the people something better than political institutions"—to give them the power of reading the Bible by native teachers "who do not go with the aspect, and under the shield of coercive authority." It was held in Finsbury Chapel, April 25, D. W. Wire in the chair. The meeting was addressed by the Rev. Messrs. Davies, Mursell, Overbury, Webb, Mulhein, Pottinger, Trestrail, and Edwards. The Report stated that the society had continued such schools as the increasing care of the National Board of Education in Ireland had left it expedient for the committee to maintain, and that though the number had decreased, there was an increase of efficiency and usefulness. In twenty-four schools there were 2191 on the books, at the average age of ten years; more than 1720 were Roman Catholics, 697 had repeated considerable portions of the word of God, and most of them were situated where there were no other means of education within reach; the funds were reported to be in a depressed state, the liabilities exceeding £1500 over and above the ordinary expenditure of the society.

The speakers were enthusiastic in their testimony to the social and intellectual capacities of the poor people. "It is impossible," said Mr. Mursell, "to mingle with them without loving them. There is a vivacity about them that is perfectly enchanting. I feel that I am a great lump of lead when I get into the vicinity of Irishmen. No one can associate with them without catching something of their spirit, and wishing he resembled, more than he does, their hospitality. Their minds are preoccupied with ideas relating to Christianity and its duties, but all their ideas are distorted—their ideas are upside down. There is a confused conception of the importance of religion, but they have not the slightest idea of what is meant by it—of its principles, its spirit, its doctrines and precepts."

The business concluded by the expression of a hope that, if we would do good to Ireland with regard to her morals, we must have hearts to feel for her temporal interests; and not only raise our prayers for her mental emancipation, but stretch forth our hands for her political advancement.

BAPTIST MISSIONARY SOCIETY.

April 27, at Exeter-hall—J. L. Phillips, Esq., in the chair.

The meeting was addressed by the Revs. J. Edwards, Dr. Alder, Dr. Liefchild, C. M. Birrell, J. Clarke, J. P. Mursell, C. Elven, Dr. Murch, Dr. Steane, Henry Kensall, Esq., and W. B. Gurney, Esq.

The Rev. J. Angus read the report, which stated that the progress of the society had been uninterrupted in its position and prospects, and was never more calculated to encourage and stimulate the exertions of its friends. The total number of missionaries sent out by the society has been 169. There were in India 79 schools, containing 2789 children, being 4 schools more than last year. 173 members had been added to the churches, now numbering 1,350. Four missionaries and 8 teachers were to be employed, from Jamaica, at Fernando Po; and the committee had decided upon purchasing a vessel for the use of the mission in Western Africa. The West India missions were reported in a flourishing state; the total number of members was 33,658, being a clear increase of 1855, while the number of inquirers was 14,353. There were 6944 children in the mission schools, and 13,402 in the Sunday-schools, the expenses of the mission being now entirely borne by the native churches.

Reference was made to the missions at Trinidad, Hayti, South America, and Canada, all being in a flourishing condition. The total amount of the jubilee fund collected this year was reported as £32,500, and the receipts for the year at £21,196 3s. 10d. There had been added to the churches during the year 3569, making a total in all the churches of 36,622. There were 18,000 inquirers, 165 stations, 79 missionaries, 59 female missionaries, 137 day schools; 155 schoolmasters, 10,226 children in the day schools, and about 15,000 in the Sunday-schools; and 90,000 volumes of the Scriptures had been printed.

WESLEYAN MISSIONARY SOCIETY.

Monday, May 1.—J. P. Plumptre, Esq., M.P., in the chair.

The meeting, consisting of upwards of 3000 persons, was addressed by the Rev. Dr. Hannah, A. Campbell, Esq., M.P., Peter Jacobs, native Indian missionary, Rev. Thomas Mortimer, Rev. J. Smith of Greenock, Dr. Liefchild, and various other speakers. The gross income was stated to be £98,253 12s. 8d., being less than the preceding year by £3434 9s. 8d.; but as in that year there was a surplus of income over expenditure to the amount of £2900, a part of this yet remains towards the expenditure of 1843, amounting to £523 13s. 6d. The report detailed at great length the state and prospects of the society's missions throughout the world. It commenced as usual with Ireland. Whilst various efforts had been made during the past year to impede their operations, it stated, that the agents of the society had steadily, and, to some extent successfully, prosecuted their important work. The 52 schools under the care of the society contained more than 4000 scholars, half of whom were now able to read the sacred Scriptures. The report went on to state, that on the Continent, at Winnenden, the mission was extending the influence of evangelical and experimental Christianity in the kingdom of Wurtemberg. The mission in France also presented an encouraging aspect. The prospects of the mission at Gibraltar were hopeful, but at Malta difficulties of a very discouraging character presented themselves. In Ceylon and India a large measure of success had attended the diligent and praiseworthy labours of the provisional committee formed in London, for the purpose of effecting the withdrawal of Government patronage from the idolatry of India. In Australia and Van Diemen's Land the missions were generally in a very prosperous state. In New Holland the want of additional labourers was greatly felt, and pressing applications made to the committee to send out four more missionaries. From other parts of Australia there were also calls for a greater number of missionaries.

In Vavan, Tahiti, and Feejee the missionaries continued to prosecute their arduous work with zeal and encouraging measure of success. The members had recently increased to 837, while there were upwards of 1100 adults and children in the schools. In Southern Africa the circumstances in which several of the missions had been placed formed the source of much solicitude and care. At the Cape of Good Hope additional missionaries had been imperatively needed; but, in consequence of the want of adequate funds, the committee were unable to increase the existing mission establishments. In the Albany and Caffraria districts the missions had been for several years steadily rising in importance. Upwards of 30,000 natives, of both sexes, were under instruction in Caffraria, and had the word of life preached to them in the vernacular tongue. In Sierra Leone the mission was in a prosperous state. The establishment for the instruction of the sons of the native kings and chiefs and of the native traders, which had been opened recently at Macarthy's Island, on the river Gambia, was calculated to exert an important influence on missionary operations in that part of Africa. The Gold Coast mission was also full of promise. The favourable commencement of the missions in Ashantee should be regarded as a most important event. After adverting to the destruction of Cape Haytian the report stated that the missionary cause in the West Indies was prosperous—in Jamaica, especially, a marked improvement appeared. In British North America, throughout the districts of Canada, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, and Newfoundland, the missionary labours were generally crowned with success, as also in the territories of the Hudson's Bay Company.

In the course of the meeting Pah-tah-se-gay, of whom we have given an original portrait, was introduced to the British public. He is a fine specimen of a North American Indian, and appeared to great advantage in the Chippewa costume. He entered into a very interesting description of his own conversion, and the unenlightened, barbarous condition of his fellow-countrymen previous to the introduction of Christianity amongst them. "He might say the tomahawk and the scalping-knife were now no longer used by them. They who had formerly used those weapons with barbarous cruelty had now adopted the Bible for their tomahawk, and the hymn-book for their scalping-knife."

HOME AND COLONIAL INFANT SCHOOL SOCIETY.

Monday, May 1.—Earl of Chichester in the chair,

The friends of this admirable institution assembled in their schoolhouse in Gray's-inn-lane, and associated with the business of the day, an examination of the pupils and teachers, and an inspection of the domestic economy of the establishment. It was stated by the secretary that the society, which had only been established seven years, was instituted for the double purpose of training children to become teachers in schools, and for educating teachers themselves in the true principles of their "high vocation;" and that it is now the only one in England training masters and mistresses for infant schools. That about fifty teachers and three hundred children are at present under its charge, and that it proposes to extend its operations by the establishment or assistance of auxiliary institutions, and by the appointment of travelling inspectors to further the development of their principles in general schools. The Bishop of Norwich, in a short but able speech, commended the society to the patronage of the Government and the favour of the public, and very happily ridiculed the notion, that education apart from religion could be considered the education fitted for a moral being. An interesting Hindoo girl, named Rabee, was examined by the meeting, and exhibited great proficency in various branches of knowledge. This child, on the completion of her education, is to be sent back to India, to become a teacher of religion and civilization to her benighted caste. At the conclusion of the meeting the children were admitted to the gymnasia and play-ground, and in a very few minutes gave the spectators good evidence that their physical education had not been neglected. The scene was altogether one of so cheering a character, that we have had it engraved as a model of good order and healthful recreation.

CHURCH MISSIONARY SOCIETY.

2nd May.—Exeter Hall.—Earl of Chichester in the chair.

The meeting was addressed by the Bishop of Winchester, the Archdeacon of Derby, Lord Sandon, and the Rev. Messrs. Hanson, Dean of St. Patrick's; J. J. Neithecht, F. Close, and J. C. Colquhoun, Esq., M.P.

The report stated that the income during the past year had exceeded £115,000; a sum unprecedented in the history of this or any other religious society. In New Zealand, Eastern and Western African, Greece, India, and elsewhere, the missions were encouraging, and the call for missionaries more urgent than ever. The society was about to turn its attention to China, towards which a mission in which country an individual, who wished to be unknown, had presented the munificent sum of £6000. His Majesty the King of Prussia had presented the society with £100, and become an annual subscriber of £25.

This was decidedly the grandest meeting of the season. We never saw so intelligent a multitude, or one more resolutely bent on doing good. Britain—the land of Bibles and the "fane of Charity"—has great reason to exult in such noble-minded gatherings.

CHRISTIAN INSTRUCTION SOCIETY.

2nd May.—Finsbury Chapel.—F. Challis, Esq., in the Chair.

The meeting was addressed by the Rev. Messrs. J. Burnet, Dr. Liefchild, Dr. Cox, J. Smith, Dr. Campbell, T. Smith, and J. Blackburn.

The report stated that the society had in connection with it 107 associations, 14 missionaries, 2411 visitors, 59,946 families, and 123 stations for preaching and prayer. During the year 1421 copies of the Scriptures were distributed, 2686 children directed to Sabbath or day schools, and 3635 cases of urgent distress were relieved by the agencies of the society. During the summer months five tents were employed for the public preaching of the Gospel in the neighbourhood round the City. It may be supposed that not less than 20,000 persons listened to the Gospel through this instrumentality alone.

The total receipts of the year were £1152 6s. 7d., and the expenditure £1192 5s. 6d., leaving the society in debt £39 18s. 11d.

BRITISH AND FOREIGN BIBLE SOCIETY.

May 3rd.—Exeter-hall.—Lord Bexley in the chair.

The meeting was addressed by the Bishop of Winchester, Lord Morpeth, the Rev. Professor Sark, of the University of Bonn, the Dean of Salisbury, the Rev. A. Tidman, Mr. Jacobs, F. Close, Dr. Hannah, A. Anson, J. Milsom, Esq., the Earl of Chichester, and Dr. Steinkopf.

The report stated that, during the year, 727,830 Bibles and Testaments had issued from the depository at home, and 254,230 from the depôts abroad, making together 982,060; and that the total issues since the commencement of the society in 1804 was 15,020,994; while the receipts for the year, from all sources, was stated to be £92,476 2s. 8d.

The number of languages and dialects in which this sacred institution now print and circulate the Scriptures is 137! No stronger fact can be urged on the public on behalf of the claims of the society on the enlarged support of every Christian.

THE RELIGIOUS TRACT SOCIETY.

May 5.—Exeter-hall.—John Labouchere, Esq., in the chair.

This important society was, as it deserves, most numerously attended, and the multitudinous details of its vast operations listened to with a patience which their grave importance deserved.

An abstract of the annual report of the society was read by Mr. Jones, the corresponding secretary and superintendent. It briefly referred to the operations of this society and its auxiliaries in China, Java, Burmah, Assam, India, Ceylon, Australasia, New Zealand, South Sea Islands, West and South Africa, Spanish America, West Indies, New Providence, the United States of America, British North America, Newfoundland, Labrador, France, Switzerland, Belgium, Spain, Portugal, Italy, Hungary, Carinthia, Lower Saxony, Wirtemberg, Iceland, Denmark, Russia, the Mediterranean and adjacent countries. In noticing the home proceedings the committee expressed their regret at the retirement of Mr. John Davis, the society's superintendent, the duties of which office he discharged for nearly twenty-four years in a faithful and conscientious manner. The following grants of publications were reported:—for Sabbath-day circulation, soldiers, sailors, and rivermen, Home Missionary, District Visiting, City and Town Missions, Christian Instruction, and other kindred Societies, British emigrants, prisoners, hospitals, workhouses, railway workmen, fairs, races, foreigners in England, special occasions at public executions, convict ships, and other important objects, amounting to 1,677,936; grants to Scotland, Wales, and Ireland, 302,557. The value of the foregoing grants is £2,668 18s. One hundred and six libraries have been granted during the year to schools, destitute districts, and union-houses; also a grant of books, value £60, at half-price, has been made to form libraries for the police. The report farther stated the proposals of the committee for the formation of factory libraries, and the issue of cheap books, and their efforts counteract those principles which are opposed to the Reformation. The new publications of the year were 218; publications circulated amount to 16,469,551, making the total circulation of the society, in nearly ninety languages, including the issues of foreign societies, assisted by the parent institution, to amount to nearly 377,000,000. The total benevolent income of the year amounts to £4980 15s. 10d.; special donations received for China to 31st of March, £1747 4s. 4d.; proceeds of sales, £43,064 14s 9d.; gratuitous issues amount to £6649 7s. 1d., being £1668 11s. 3d. beyond the amount of the benevolent contributions, without any charge or expense whatever thereon; legacies, £999 19s. Total receipts, £52,605 7s. 9d.

BRITISH AND FOREIGN SCHOOL SOCIETY.

May 8th.—Lord John Russell in the chair.

The meeting was addressed by Earl Fitzwilliam, Rev. Dr. Reed, Hon. and Rev. Baptist Noel, Rev. Dr. Alder, John Barton, Esq., Rev. Samuel Green, ——Cheatham, Esq., Lord Monteagle, Rev. John Burnet, and Colonel Fox, M.P.

The report stated that the financial affairs were far from discouraging, and that the appearance of the schools throughout the country indicated improvement, and that the practicability and usefulness of the system on which they were founded were fully proved by continued experience. It also adverted to the educational measure introduced into Parliament by Sir James Graham, the spirit and tendency of which it condemned: the society had watched with anxiety the movements of Government with respect to education, and whatever might ultimately be the nature of those movements, the committee wished that no amount of aid which Government might grant would ever induce the society to compromise in the smallest degree the great principles which had regulated it from its institution.

We shall continue these reports in our future numbers, and shall, for the present, conclude the subject with the

of which we have given an accurate picture.

On Tuesday, May 9th, the rehearsal of the music took place in the Cathedral Church of St. Paul, at which about 2000 persons were present. The choir was conducted by Sir George Smart; the vocal and instrumental performers were numerous and efficient, belonging to the Royal Society of Musicians, and led by Mr. Cramer; the choruses were assisted by the young gentlemen of her Majesty's Chapel Royal St. Paul's, and Westminster Abbey; the pieces rehearsed were Handel's "Dettingen Te Deum," Atwood's "Cantate Domine," the grand chaunt "Deus misereatur," the "Gloria Patria," followed by Handel's sublime "Hallelujah chorus," the whole concluding with the "Coronation Anthem," the congregation all standing.

On Thursday, May 11th, the grand performance took place in the presence of Prince George of Cambridge, who acted as the representative of the King of Hanover, who had promised to preside, the Archbishop of Canterbury, the Bishops of Chester, Norwich, and Llandaff, the Lord Mayor, Alderman Brown, and an audience less numerous than usual. The performers exerted themselves to give due effect to the glorious tasks assigned them, but, owing to the confined nature of the choir, and the open arcades by which it is surrounded, with less apparent power and precision than their actual execution of the music might have entitled them to expect. The echoing vaults of St. Paul's will, in like manner, continue to present impediments to the exact distribution of musical sounds. The collections, although liberally supported by the distinguished visitors, were, we fear, but small in amount.

THE FASHIONS.

Paris, Rue Chaussée, d'Antin, May 5, 1843.

Mon cher Monsieur,—Although the month of April has been generally very cold, yet, nevertheless, the few fine days we have lately had will, enable me to complete my observations, and to give you, if not all the summer fashions, at least such as are generally prevalent at the present moment. In the first place I consider that the choice of materials generally worn is now so decidedly shown that I may speak of them with some degree of certainty. Of these Pekins and damasks may be said to occupy the first place. The former article is so divided and subdivided, and is seen under so many different forms, and the varieties are so extensive, that it is somewhat difficult to enumerate them. I may, however, state that those most sought for and preferred are the agate Pekin, dark, aérial, colibri, Cashmere, zebra, and cross striped Pekins; the Bengal, with stripes worked upon shaded ground; the crystal Pekin, of a soft and vapoury blue colour like that of a summer sky: and the cameleon Pekin, with a triple shoot, with little flowers worked in different shades distributed all over its surface. Of the damask the most beautiful is in my opinion are the damasks in the style of Louis XIII. and Louis XV., with designs worked in white silk upon silver-shot grounds, and different sorts of dark taffeties. As yet the few fine days we have had are permitted no exhibition of light fancy stuffs in any great quantity and variety; the best of these, however, may be said to be the barèges with slight stripes of satin printed in colours, and others having small squares embroidered in poncean or blue silk upon a white ground. As regards the style of the dresses most worn it is difficult to speak decisively as, a though we meet with numerous narrow sleeves, we may the next moment see others half wide at top and bottom to allow the escape of a double bouillon of muslin terminated by a lace frill. So is it also with corsages, for, although low corsages are frequently to be met with, still, even in the best and most fashionable circles, we see high corsages worn gathered in at the slope der with a narrow waistband, or still higher a little gathered, with plain sleeves trimmed with rounded frills. Skirts are now worn with two deep plaits, with two long rucked flounces, or with a single flounce, but made in black lace. Some skirts I have seen are still covered with embroidery in spots or with passementerie ornaments; but it appears to me that this description of ornament is fast going out of fashion.

HENRIETTE DE B.

IMPERIAL PARLIAMENT.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—MONDAY.

The LORD CHANCELLOR took his seat on the Woolsack at five o'clock. The Exchequer Bills Bill was read a third time and passed.—The Marquis of CLANRICARDE moved for a select committee to consider of the operation of the Irish poor-law, stating a number of circumstances illustrative of the necessity of inquiring thoroughly into the system. He thought the poor-law relief could give satisfaction to the people of Ireland, and one should be adopted upon a wholly different principle. He did not wish to delay the bill which was now pressing in another place, but he thought the inquiry might be going on during the progress of the bill.—The Archbishop of DUBLIN seconded the motion. He had great attention to the working of the present poor-law in Ireland, and unless it were materially altered, the growing opinion in Ireland, that it could never be properly legislated for by the Imperial Parliament, would be much strengthened. He could say of his own knowledge that since the passing of the Irish poor-law the number of the poor had materially increased, and mendicancy had also very much increased, and there was the additional evil, that one effect of the law had been to dry up the sources of private charity. He thought it right that the Irish Poor-law Bill was an attempt to raise money on false pretences, but he would remind their lordships that it was brought in with a view to suppress mendicity. They had, however, rejected the clauses for the express purpose of putting a stop to mendicity, and passed the remainder of the bill.—The Duke of WELLINGTON opposed the motion. He admitted that there were many defects in the Irish poor-law, but the object of the noble marquis was to have the law altogether repealed. This he would not consent to, for he had the evidence of several of his noble friends near him that the law was upon the whole satisfactory, though it required alteration. The poor-law of this moment a bill in the other house to remedy its defects, and when it came before their lordships such alterations might be proposed in committee as would remedy the complained of. As to any want of attention on the part of their lordships to measures relating to Ireland, he must say there was no such intention. When the question of the poor-law was formerly under discussion, he remarked that such anxiety was evinced by their lordships on both sides respecting the bill, which then passed into law. The Earl of GLENGALL supported the motion, and considered the new municipal corporations as the greatest evil in Ireland, without even excepting the new Poor-law Bill. The Earl of WICKLOW denied that the opposition to the Poor-law was general throughout Ireland. On the contrary, he was of opinion that in many parts of the country it was working very well. He hoped that persons in Ireland would not be suffered to agitate the whole country with a view to a dissolution of the union with perfect impunity. The Earl of MOUNTCASHEL supported the motion with a view to satisfy the evils complained of by the people of Ireland.—The Marquis of DOWNSHIRE said there was a great deal of interested agitation in Ireland against the present law. Lord CLONCURRY supported the motion.—The Marquis of LANSDOWNE said a case of inquiry had certainly been made out if the Government had not undertaken to bring in a measure to remedy the evils complained of. He thought, however, that new bills ought to be introduced into their lordships on both sides respecting the bill which had passed into law. The Earl of GLENGALL supported the motion, and considered the new municipal corporations as the greatest evil in Ireland, without even excepting the new Poor-law Bill. The Earl of WICKLOW denied that the opposition to the Poor-law was general throughout Ireland. On the contrary, he was of opinion that in many parts of the country it was working very well. He hoped that persons in Ireland would not be suffered to agitate the whole country with a view to a dissolution of the union with perfect impunity. The Earl of MOUNTCASHEL supported the motion with a view to satisfy the evils complained of by the people of Ireland.—The Marquis of DOWNSHIRE said there was a great deal of interested agitation in Ireland against the present law.—

BROUGHAM-HALL.

As the title to this picturesquely-situated property, and the estates annexed to it, is about to become the subject of Litigation, the following details may be interesting to our readers:—

Brougham-hall is not far distant from the village of Brougham, at the northern extremity of the county of Westmoreland, on the military road to Carlisle. It stands upon a woody eminence on the east side of the river Lowther; and from the richness, variety, and extent of the prospect from its fine terraces, it is often styled "the Windsor of the North." It has a fine hall, lit by five pointed windows, filled with painted glass, ancient and modern. Nearly adjoining to it is the chapel of Brougham, dedicated to St. Wilfred, as appears by the rector of Brougham agreeing, in 1393, to find it in "two seargies afore St. Wilfrey, at his own proper cost," at whic time it was endowed with lands adjoining to it; but these have since been exchanged for others contiguous to the glebe of the church. In 1658 and 1659 the Countess of Pembroke rebuilt it; and some years since the rector of the parish performed evening service in it when the family were residing at Brougham-hall.

Northward of the hall are the venerable ruins of Brougham Castle, which, in Leland's time, the common people believed "did sink." Roman urns, coin, and other relics of our conquerors have been found in great abundance here. The greater part of the castle was built by Roger Lord Clifford, son of Isabella de Veteripont, who placed over its door this inscription—"This made Roger." An inquisition, in 1403, found it and its demesne worth nothing, "because it lieth altogether waste, by reason of the destruction of the country by the Scots." Yet, in 1617, King James was magnificently entertained here, on his return from his last journey out of Scotland. In 1651 and 1652 the castle was repaired by Anne, Countess of Pembroke; but after her death it appears to have been dismantled and neglected, and its stone, timber, and wainscoting sold. The centre of the building was a lofty square tower, with turrets at the angles; the outworks were very considerable.

The castle, or rather its ruins, is not now the property of Lord Brougham, nor has it been in his family since the reign of King John. It belongs to the Earl of Thanet, as representative of the Clifford family, to whom it descended from the Veteriponts. Before the Norman Conquest, the manor and lordship of Brougham (then called Burgham) were held by the Saxon family of De Burgham, from whom Lord Brougham is lineally descended. After the conquest, William the Norman granted to Robert de Veteripont, or Vipont, extensive rights and territories in Westmoreland; and, among others, some oppressive rights of seigniory over the manor of Brougham, then held by Walter de Burgham. To relieve the estate of such services, Gilbert de Burgham, in the reign of King John, agreed to give up absolutely one third part of his estate to Robert de Veteripont, and also the advowson of the rectory of Brougham. This third comprises the land upon which the castle is built, and the estate afterwards given by Anne Countess of Pembroke (heiress of Veteripont) to the Hospital for Poor Widows at Appleby. Brougham Castle, if not built, was much extended by Veteripont, and afterwards still more enlarged by Roger Clifford, who succeeded by marriage to the Veteripont possessions. The manor-house, or "Hall," about three quarters of a mile from the castle, continued in the Brougham family, and part of it, especially the gateway, is of early Norman architecture. The chapel is also ancient, except the roof, which was renewed in 1659. In 1607 Thomas Brougham, then lord of the manor of Brougham, died without issue male, and the estate was sold to one Bird, who was steward to the Clifford family; the heir male of the Brougham family then residing at Scales Hall, in Cumberland. About 1690 John Brougham, of Scales, repurchased the estate and manor of Brougham from Bird's grandson, and entailed it on his nephew, from whom it passed by succession to Lord Brougham.

RUINS OF BROUGHAM CASTLE.

In the Kendal Mercury it was recently stated that the Brougham estate, "until it came into the possession of the present noble occupant, was called Bird's Nest;" and we find it stated, in the "Beauties of England and Wales," "Birdnest, from its having belonged to the family of Bird." These statements are erroneous, although Bird certainly built a house upon that part of the property which he purchased; but this dwelling is clearly distinguished from Brougham-hall, as the following extract from Bishop Nicolson's manuscript, written about 1670, and now in the Dean and Chapter's library, at Carlisle, will show:—"The great Roman way brings you to the Roman camp, having on the left Browham and Browham-hall, the seat of the Browhams; from this you have the prospect of Lowther-hall, Clifton-hall, likewise of Penrith, Penrith Castle, and Carleton-hall; likewise of Browham-hall and chapel, and of Mr. Bird's house."

It appears that the Brougham estate is now claimed by one Thomas Bird, and other parties, who have distrained for rent upon one of Lord Brougham's tenants at Wethericks, in the parish of Brougham; but his lordship has brought an action of trespass against the claimant. Upon the above information it is clear that the claim now set up by Mr. Bird has no legal or equitable foundation, and that the adverse claim of the Birds, however it may have arisen, has originated in some mistake as to the nature of their ancestor's title.

THE GOVERNOR OF THE MARQUESAS ISLANDS, CAPTAIN BRUAT.

The subject of this memoir had recently been appointed by Louis Philippe to the government of the Marquesas Islands, of which new French conquest an illustrated description has already appeared in our journal.

Armand Bruat, a native of Alsace, is in his forty-fifth or forty-sixth year. He entered the service in 1811, at Brest, where he became remarkable for his hardiness and robust habit. In 1815 he embarked under Commander Bouvet, in the brig Hussard, for Copenhagen, Brazil, and the Antilles. Shortly after his return, in 1817, he embarked in the corvette L'Esperance, which was stationed for three years in the Levant; and from 1819 to 1824 he succeeded to Le Conquérant, Le Foudroyant, and the frigate Diane, where he remained three years as officier de manœuvre. In 1824 he filled a similar post in the corvette La Diligente, and embarked on a laborious voyage in the South Sea, where he distinguished himself in the taking of the pirate Le Quintanilla. On his return he was made lieutenant, and next embarked in Le Breslaw, in which vessel he was at Navarino, in 1827, where he fired L'Albion and sunk two frigates, for which bravery Bruat was decorated with orders. In the following year he obtained the command of the brig Silène, which, in cruising under the forts of Algiers, took several prizes, but was subsequently wrecked, with the brig Aventure, on the coast of Africa, when, of 200 men, forming the crews of the two vessels, 110 were massacred. The devotedness of the commanders of the two vessels was such that, having reached Algiers, after a thousand dangers, they refused to accept the accommodation offered them by the Dey, with the English and Sardinian consuls, and would not leave their men; and, by their energies, the crews escaped destruction by the Bedouins. During his captivity Captain Bruat contrived, by letter, to make Admiral Duperre acquainted with the resources of the place; and M. De Bourmont, to whom this note was transmitted, publicly congratulated the captain upon his patriotic bravery.

CAPTAIN BRUAT.

Since 1830 the military career of Captain Bruat has been one of great activity. In this year he succeeded to the command of the brig Ralmure, to the Grenadier in 1832, and in 1835 to the Duchesse, which accompanied in the Levant the frigate Iphigénie, commanded by the Prince de Joinville. In this passage, his vessel having lost her mainmast and fore-topsail during the night, the captain repaired this great damage under the ship's yards three times in four-and-twenty hours. He was next attached to the station at Lisbon; and in the Tagus, in 1838, he was nominated ship's captain, under the command of Admiral Lalande, on board L'Iéna, and became promoted to a flag. During two years he commanded this ship, of 92 guns, and, in her cruise in the Levant, in the most imposing squadron that France has displayed since the peace. After the recal of Admiral Lalande Captain Bruat succeeded to the Triton, and joined the squadron under Admiral Hugon, which becoming dispersed in a storm, the Triton, whose hull was very old, was nearly lost. At one period there were six feet of water in her hold, and the pumps could scarcely stop the leak; and it was not until after a struggle of several days that Captain Bruat, finding the ship had been much injured, decided to put into Cagliari, where the necessary repairs were promptly executed, and he returned to Toulon, in company with Le Neptune.

In July, 1841, Captain Bruat quitted his ship's command, and received the appointment of councillor of the works of the marine; and while he held this post he was called to the government of the Marquesas Islands and to the command of the naval department, taking with him a house built of wood, which the Minister of the Marine has had constructed by M. Potter. It is roofed with zinc, and consists of a ground and first floor; the entrance to the former is by a flight of six steps, leading to a vestibule, anti-chamber, office, study, salle à manger, reception-room, and billiard-room; and on the first floor are chambers for the accommodation of the governor and his family. The dimensions of this house are about sixty feet in length, fifty-eight in depth, and thirty-nine in height.

In concluding this brief sketch of the active services of Captain Bruat, we are happy to state that the report of his massacre in the Marquesas, published in the Sun of last Saturday week, is unfounded; the statement was that the governor and his suite, fourteen in number, on their return from a visit to the native sovereign, by whom they had been hospitably received, were waylaid and butchered by a party of the islanders.

Interrupted Affair of "Honour" at Munich.—Munich has long been the scene of rival contentions amongst the English residents respecting the church—one party supporting a minister who has done duty some time, but not of the Church of England, nor acknowledged by the Scottish Episcopalians, of which he calls himself a member—the other party wishing to have, as the society of Munich increases, a properly ordained and qualified clergyman, and who, it appears, has recently arrived. Certain expressions used in address at length have brought the matter to issue, and at this precise time the lady who brought the first candidate to Munich has made her professions, and gone over to the Roman Catholic Church. Two of the parties have been bound over in their own recognizances, but Lord Craven has since quitted Munich.

NOOKS AND CORNERS OF OLD ENGLAND.

WATER-EATON MANOR-HOUSE.

A pleasant walk of about three miles and a half, across the meadows, to the north of the city of Oxford, in the course of which several picturesque glimpses of the city and its numerous spires and towers present themselves, will bring the pedestrian to one of those "nooks" which, from their sequestered position, escape general observation, but which amply repay one for the trouble of seeking out. The spot to which we allude, and which forms the subject of our vignette, is the old Manor-House of Water-Eaton.

As a specimen of the domestic architecture of the early part of the 16th century it possesses interest to the antiquary and the lover of the picturesque; but there is an historical association connected with it which, though not generally known, invests it with a higher character, namely, that in this house King Charles I. resided as a guest of the chivalrous and devoted Lord Lovelace, prior to the assembly of his Parliament at Oxford, and from it the summonses calling that Parliament were issued. The house and manor of Water-Eaton were then the property of the Lord Lovelace. The mansion stands within an extensive court-yard, and is in the form of an oblong square. The porch, which is an addition, said to be from the design of Inigo Jones, is a good specimen of the style of his period; it consists of two three-quarter Doric columns resting upon pedestals, and surmounted by Ionic pillars, frieze, and entablature. Attached to the house is a very ancient chapel (one of the smallest in the kingdom), which is in good preservation, and is at present used as a chapel of ease to the parish church. Taken altogether, Water-Eaton is an interesting relic of days long gone by, which is well worthy of a visit. It is at present occupied as a farm-house; and we cannot conclude this brief notice without expressing our thanks to its present tenant for the obliging civility with which, when making our sketch, he entertained us.

THE PRINCESS'S THEATRE.

Donizetti's lively opera buffa "L'Elisir d'Amore" has been produced at this elegant house for the début of Mdlle. Albertazzi in her native language, as the fair representative of the coquettish Adina; a part which, although not exactly suited to her charming voice and style (that incline somewhat to the il penseroso), she sustained in a most delightful manner. Her voice is a mezzo soprano, more remarkable for sweet quality and vocal fluency than for extraordinary compass or power. Some of the music of Adine is a little too high for it, which occasions the semblance of exertion, but, au reste, nothing could have been more graceful or finished than its general delivery. The good-humoured Blasis was the first whom we heard in this delightful opera; her rich, full voice and cheerful manner charmed everybody. We have heard others since; but perhaps had she the opportunity of representing the character in its native idiom of "la lingua bellissima per la musica," our beautiful countrywoman Albertazzi would, in every respect, be entitled to be considered as the fairest representative of all that have performed the part. Would that the libretto were better rendered into English; it is most sorry stuff! The part of the nostrum-doctor (Dulcamara) was ably sustained by Bedford, who infused a vast deal of well-conceived and locally satirical fun into the professional nonchalance of the mountebank; wisely eschewing any imitation of Lablache, and by a dash or two here and there of his own peculiar broad colouring, making an excellent original picture, where an inferior artist would have been content with a servile copy. The performance was highly creditable to him, and indeed the ensemble of the "getting up" reflects the greatest praise on the liberal and indefatigable management. The partition of this Opera abounds with some of the most joyous as well as sentimental melodies that can be imagined, and would stamp, Donizetti, if he never had written another, as a first-rate maestro. Nothing can exceed the happy joyousness of the opening chorus; where can we find a more touching melody than "Una furtiva lagrima" (Alas! for poor Catome), or a more beautifully contrasted duo than "Obligato?" We are sick of the outcry against Donizetti—he is a great but perhaps too prolific a genius.

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.

FORNASARI AS DON GIOVANNI.

There is a popular fallacy amongst us that the chef-d'œuvre of Mozart, the opera of "Don Giovanni," is dreaded by all Italian artistes, and that they never will perform it but when they are managerially or otherwise influentially coerced to do so. The truth is, they full well know the magnitude of the undertaking, and consequently always approach it with a timidity, which perhaps, after all, is the best proof of their veneration for its mighty excellence. Accustomed as they are, in the works of more thoughtless composers, to obtain applause by the easy repetition of their academical exercises (of which nine tenths of the fioriture of modern music are composed), they naturally shrink from a task which entails upon them the enlistment of all their mental and physical powers in the most active service, and which, although it may "ask them tears in the true performance," will obtain in return but a scanty donation of smiles (even from "the discerning few!"), let them "charm never so wisely!" The consequence is that this splendid production is considered "un ingrat" for the pains bestowed upon its revival (two or three times a season), when it is hailed with more dutiful respect than affection, and then is laid by again for its next annual resuscitation. Let us not then blame the Italians—it is we who become satiated with the sweets of this grand work, and under the affected nausea of "toujours perdrix" descend for variety to hashes and entremets of doubtful ingredients. Performed and sung as this stupendous opera has been recently at her Majesty's Theatre, it ought to have had a run for the better part of the season: but probably we shall hear no more of it till next year.

The chief novelty in its cast of the present season was the personation of the libertine hero by the versatile Fornasari. We very well recollect the great Garcia, Ambrozetti, and, of later years, Tamburini, in this arduous part, and are confident that, with a little more acquaintance with it (for he is scarcely yet mellow in it), Fornasari will outstrip all his predecessors in the just delineation of the gay, the accomplished, the seducing but heartless Juan of the Spanish story. His reading of the character evinced great study and nice discrimination, and his singing was most consonant with the maestro's inspirations. His execution of "Fin che dal vino" was most deservedly honoured with an encore; "Deh vieni" was also beautifully given, and received a similar compliment. By the way, this otherwise beautiful serenade always leaves a something unsatisfactory on our ears at the termination of the second part, which has the effect of ending upon a dominant instead of a tonic harmony. His "La ci darem" was most irresistibly persuasive; and the terrific scorn which he exhibited in the finale of the first act, when he hears the accusing word "Traditore!" from the guests, was conceived and expressed in the highest perfection of artistical genius, as was also his subsequent scene with the statue, where he stood—

Hopeless, but not deject, and borrowing
A majesty from crime!

As to the other personations, the ladies were the realities of Mozart's divine dreamings, and, perhaps, Ottavio was never before so truly or purely represented as by Mario. His "Il mio tesoro" was most exquisite. As to the Leporello, we cannot do better than parody the concise inscription over Ben Jonson, and exclaim—

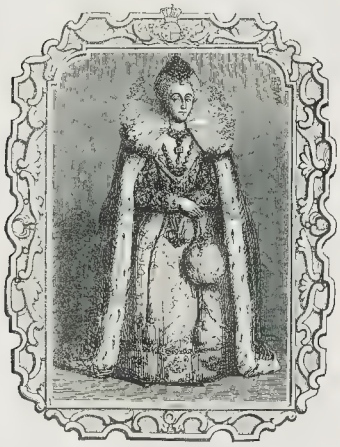
O rare Labache!

On Tuesday night Cerito, "the buoyant, the bounding, the free," with her whole soul in her beautiful art, appeared, for the first time this season, in Perrot's divertissement of "Les Houris." It would be invidious to attempt, perhaps impossible to achieve, any comparison between her and her bewitching predecessor in the same part: such attempts at contradistinction are apt to bewilder the judgment, and deprive us even of memory in the ecstasy of the present enjoyment.

ILLUSTRATED LITERATURE.

The ILLUMINATED MAGAZINE. Edited by DOUGLAS JERROLD. No. I.

A "new magazine" is an attraction even in the palmy days of periodical publications. "The Illuminated Magazine," however, comes with the promise (which we shall see how it will keep) of two-fold excellence—first-rate literature, revealing "new graces by the pure light of art." The premier pas is satisfactory, and auspicious of a healthy career. The editor takes the lead with a paper entitled "Elizabeth and Victoria," a contrast of the past and the present, worked out with some truth and humour. We quote a specimen of the spirit in which this paper is written.



ELIZABETH.

VICTORIA.

"Ha! those were the merry days—the golden times of England they were?" How often may this be heard from the tradesman, the mechanic, as he is borne past Tilbury Fort, and the thoughts of Queen Elizabeth, of her "golden days," ring in his brain; and, living only in the nineteenth century, he has some vague, perplexing notion that he has missed an Eden only by a hundred years or two. He thinks not—why should he?—of the luxury he now purchases for a shilling; a luxury not compassable to those golden days by all the power and wealth of all the combining sovereigns of the earth, for he is the passenger of a Gravesend steam-boat, the fare twelvepence.

* * * * * * *

So closed the golden days of Queen Elizabeth, leaving us, in all the virtues and comforts of the word, the bankrupt children of Queen Victoria! Unworthy is he of the balmy sweetness of this blessed May who can think so! A churlish, foolish, moody traitor to the spirit of goodness and beauty that, as with the bounty of the sun and air, calls up forms of loveliness in his path, and showers him with ten thousand household blessings! With active prescience, when the poet of Elizabeth, in even his large love for man, could scarce have dreamed of, or, dreaming, seen them as a part of fairy fantasy—a cloud-woven pageant! Let the man who lives by his daily sweat pause in his toil, and, with his foot upon his spade, watch the white smoke that floats in the distance; listen to the lessening thunder of the engine that, instinct with Vulcanian life, has rushed, devouring space, before it. That little curl of smoke hangs in the air a thing of blessed promise—that roar of the engine is the melody of hope to unborn generations. But now the dagger of the soil looks moodily at that vapour, and his heart is festering with the curse upon the devil Steam; that fiend that grinds his bones beneath the wheels of British Juggernaut. Poor creature! The seeming demon is a beneficent presence that, in the ripeness of time, will work regeneration of the hopes of men. Let the poor man—the mechanic of a town—look around him. Let him in his own house, humble though it be, acknowledge the presence of a thousand comforts which, had he lived two centuries ago, he could not with a baron's wealth have purchased. Not mere creature enjoyments: but humanity, refining pleasures, drawing man nearer to man, expanding the human heart, and imparting to humanity the truest greatness in the greatest gentleness.

Next is a well-timed paper, "Sindh and its Ameers," by Mrs. Postans. "International Copyright at the Old Bailey" is a piece of sly, but good-humoured, sarcasm upon our Copyright Act as regards America. Some pleasant lines to "Nell Gwynne's Looking-Glass," by Lunan Blanchard, are illustrated with an engraving of the precious relic in the possession of Sir Page Dicks, of Portshall. "Great Western Sketches," by Wildrake, are rich in the "twinkling eccentricities" of brother Jonathan. "Bonaparte at Miss Prounce's School," by G. A. A'Beckett, is a burlesque on the days when "Bony" was the English "bogie." "Mr. Grubbe's Night with Memnon," by Albert Smith, is a broad sketch of an antiquarian noodle. "The Doctor's Boy," by Mark Lemon, is a piece of banter. The long paper on the "Children's Employment Commission" has neither the merit of fitness nor novelty.

Here our enumeration must end; though it should be mentioned, as a feature of the plan of the magazine, that the number contains a review, "by way of extract," of Lady Sale's most interesting Journal. The "illuminations," some sixty in number, are designed by Leech, Sargent, Meadows, and other artists. The wrapper, printed in colours, is particularly beautiful.

ENGLAND AND FRANCE;
OR
THE SISTERS.
A ROMANCE OF REAL LIFE.

By HENRY COCKTON,

AUTHOR OF "VALENTINE VOX," "STANLEY THORN," ETC.

CHAPTER IX.
ON FASHION.

In the midst of this gaiety Sir Arthur's personal appearance underwent a very striking metamorphosis. He had been for years in the habit of wearing—except, indeed, when full dressed—top-boots, buckskin smalls, a buff waistcoat, and a blue coat, the back of which was covered with powder to the waist, while the collar was glazed by the friction of his queue. But all these things were queue à queue reformed:—First the thick and everlasting buckskins were discarded; then the eternal tops, which looked like the remains of a pair of antediluvian chimney-pots; then the buff waistcoat, and then the immortal blue coat of peculiar cut. All this was effected gradually, of course, and with unexampled tact on the part of Caroline, who found that by nothing short of actual fascination could the change upon which she had set her soul be accomplished.

At length, however, the queue itself was doomed; and as Caroline felt that, in seeking to effect the removal of that, she was treading upon dangerous ground, she proceeded with infinite caution.

"Darling," she observed, having resolutely made up her mind, "you are looking extremely well this morning. Really, I must, in order to compete with you, take a few lessons in the art of dressing to advantage."

"Well, it's a most delightful study, I must say," replied Sir Arthur. "When you have got as far into it as I have, you'll doubtless pursue it with zeal."

"Nay, study will be valueless in that case, my love, because then I shall be perfect."

"Lady Cleveland, your politeness is always conspicuous. However, I am happy to find that in your estimation I am perfect at last. Upon my honour, I began to think I never should be."

"Perfect? Did I say perfect? Well, you are—very nearly; if I could but prevail upon you to adopt one suggestion you would be quite."

"Is there another alteration contemplated then? I have heard of the transmigration of souls, and sometimes fancy myself one of the Metempsychi; I have also heard of the transmogrification of bodies, but I firmly believe that no body was so perfectly transmogrified as mine has been. No one knows me! I am passed in the streets by my oldest friends. They look, it is true, and then stop, and go on again, and then turn to have another look, in the perfect conviction that they have seen me somewhere, but utterly unable to recollect where. And upon my life I don't wonder at it, for really I sometimes hardly know myself."

"But of course you will admit that your appearance has been greatly improved by the change?"

"Why I don't know, my dear. I used to look a respectable old fellow enough, but now I scarcely know what I do look like! I seem to belong to no defined order of architecture unless it be the Composite—made up of all."

"But I would have you belong to the Corinthian order."

"Look at the apex, my love; that's the point: look at the apex! You have heard of its being absurd to expect to find an old head upon young shoulders of course?"

"That is the very anomaly, dear, to which I am now about to draw your attention."

"I perceive, I perceive; I knew it would come to that! You would have me dye my hair?"

"Oh no! Dye it, dear? Certainly not! But I'll tell you what I'd have; I'd have that little pigtail removed. It causes people to imagine that you are old; and it really is neither useful nor ornamental."

"In this particular instance I cannot admire your taste. But don't let us say another word about the matter; it is now the only emblem of ancient respectability I have about me."

"But why do you wish to have any such emblem? You have surely no desire to look ancient? Now do have it off, there's a darling; do to oblige me, and I'll give you I don't know how many kisses. You will oblige me, darling, will you not?"

"In anything but that."

"But what on earth is the use of it? What is there in it? Really I can see nothing at all in the nasty thing, and yet you pride yourself upon it."

"I certainly do; it's a fact; I admit it to be a fact."

"Then I'll have it preserved as a natural curiosity. I will, upon my honour. Let it be taken off, and I'll have it framed and glazed. I'll have it placed upon a book, surmounted by a tablet, whereon shall be inscribed—'Hereby hangs a tail.' It's a positive nuisance; I can't bear to see it!"

"Well then I'll tell you what I'll do; I'll make a compromise with you; I'll wear it inside. There. I'll wear it inside."

"Oh but it will tickle you then, dear; I know it will."

"Well, never mind, my love, let it tickle."

"No, no; have it taken off; do, there's a love!"

"But, my dear, I shall look so naked!"

"Oh, dear me, no. Not if you have a beautiful dark brown peruke."

"Oh, a wig! It is in that way you wish me to disguise myself then, is it? Lady Cleveland! Lady Cleveland?"

"Well, never mind, dear; then he shall not be teased. The darling shall still have his beautiful tail. It shan't be cut off at all, eh, sha'n't—as indeed in a fit of somnambulism I rise up some night and lay violent hands upon it while he is in a sound sweet sleep! All the little boys shall continue to laugh, and all the little girls shall continue to giggle, and all the old men shall continue to admire; the darling shall still be so conspicuous that in a crowd he shall be known by the length of his tail; and he shall have it curled too; he shall have a curly tail tied up with blue ribbon; he shall look ancient."

"You'll want me next to wear a pair of moustaches!"

"No, indeed, I will not, dear; I'll not, upon my honour! Do only get rid of that dirty little tail, and I'll promise to ask nothing more. It looks so tasteless—so excessively Gothic!"

"I do believe," said Sir Arthur, "that if you were to wish me to take off my head, I should do it."

"Nay, that, dear, I never should wish you to do, because a head is very necessary; but it is not necessary for a head to have a tail. But you will oblige me, darling? You will have it off, will you not?"

"Why, my love, I'll see about it; I don't like, you know, to be precipitate. I'll turn the thing over in my mind, and give you an answer in the morning."

"I know what that answer will be," said Caroline, with a smile which seemed to fire his soul, "I see it in your eyes! You are a darling, you are! and if you make your appearance as I wish you to-morrow, I shall be so happy! You can't conceive how many kisses I'll give you!"

"Now am I fool, or am I not?" said Sir Arthur, in the strictest possible confidence to himself, when alone. "Am I or am I not a fool? Just let me consider. For what purpose did I marry? Was it or was it not with a view to permanent happiness? Did I not make up my mind to do all in my power to ensure that happiness? Of course! And how can I be happy if Caroline is not, seeing that her happiness constitutes mine? But then is this yielding to her every wish indicative on my part of weakness or of strength?—Does it evince a strong mind or a weak one? That's the point—that's the point. And really I incline to the belief that that mind which prompts a man to soar above paltry considerations, and even to risk being sneered at by the world, with the view of securing domestic felicity, must be strong. I wish to make her happy; that is my object, and that object, if possible, shall be attained. This little alteration in my dress, it appears, will contribute to her happiness: am I not therefore bound to make that alteration? I flatter myself that I have a strong mind as any man; I have hitherto had the courage to brave the world's sneering remarks, and that courage shall not desert me now. But, after all, what is required? Merely that I should make myself appear as young as possible, and that is precisely what I am anxious to do. What sacrifice do I make then by thus yielding? Do I not yield to my own personal advantage? The tail shall come off, and I'll have a wig! She is all the world to me—she is my world—every hope I have is centred in her. I therefore will have a wig: I will look juvenile; I will make the difference between us appear to be as trifling as possible. Some may think me a fool—let them; I know, I suppose, whether I'm a fool or not to study my own comforts! It is natural—very natural for her to wish me to look young, and am I not therefore bound to yield to that wish? I will yield, and, by thus yielding, promote the great object in view."

Having arrived at this conclusion by virtue of taking into consideration immediate happiness only, he sent at once for a fashionable perruquier, and as it singularly enough happened that that individual had a brown wig by him which fitted to a hair, the queue was removed, and the whole thing arranged to the entire satisfaction of the interested parties.

"Now," thought Sir Arthur, on being summoned to dinner by the servant, who scarcely knew him, "Now, then, for a surprise. If this doesn't astonish her I don't know what will."

Lightly and gaily he accordingly proceeded to the room in which he knew she was waiting to be led down to dinner—for those little attentions, even when they were alone, were ever by him scrupulously observed—and he entered the very moment he entered with a loud exclamation of amazement, mingled with delight.

"Wel," said he, with delight, "what do you think of me now"

"Oh! I never saw such an improvement!—never! Why you really look twenty years younger!"

"I'm getting on, I think! I shall do by and bye! I shall be quite an exquisite shortly!"

"And did you give up the last sales of wool, at auction, were off freely at an advance of 1d per lb, the quantity offered was limited, and prices are barely maintained. The imports this week have comprised about 1200 packages.

"Why, it certainly is amazing!—at least it amazes me!—for I don't know myself! When I look in the glass I am really inclined to turn round and ask myself pointedly what business I have here?"

"Well, you do look charming! I positively never beheld so great a change. You are a good soul—a dear kind creature! I know that you did this to delight me. But how exactly it fits, dear—not a crease to be seen. How nice you tie it parted behind, and what an elegant style! It looks so excessively natural too!—I am certain that no one will ever imagine that it is not your own hair. Oh, it is so becoming, and makes you appear so young. Do you not think so yourself, dear?"

"Why, I shall be able to tell you more about it when I know myself better. I have scarcely had time to introduce myself to myself yet. I have become a little reconciled to my appearance, I shall be able to form, perhaps, a more correct judgment."

For several days Caroline could scarcely keep her eyes off Sir Arthur, and while he was happy to see her delighted, she became, when in society, almost as proud of his appearance as he was of hers. Unhappily, however, this did not last long; for as they were exceedingly gay, and kept it up with infinite spirit night after night, he caught such horrible colds that he was constantly coughing. This, of course, was excessively annoying to her, and more especially as it almost invariably happened that his most violent fits came on while they were at table. There would she sit on these occasions in agony, glancing round, in order to ascertain in what manner it was noticed, and experiencing the most acute pang when she fancied that the attention was ascribed to his age.

"For Heaven's sake, my dear," she at length exclaimed," get rid of that horrible cough! Do, my love, consult some one, send for some one else; send for all the physicians in London rather than be pestered perpetually in this way! Really it has become quite distressing to hear you."

"I must get rid of it, my dear," he replied, "I really must: but you know what Charles says: you know he assures me that all the physicians in the world can do me no good unless I make up my mind to keep quiet for a time."

"Then, for goodness sake, do keep quiet, for I really cannot bear to go out with you while you are thus: you make me feel dreadfully ill."

"These hours, dear," says these hours have done it, this practice, my love, of turning night into day has occasioned it all. I'm as strong now as ever I was in my life, but this cough, this nasty cough shakes me. If I could only get to bed a week—not lay up for a week, but live regular, as I used to live, and have my natural rest, I should be as well as ever."

"Then do lay up for a week; for it really is afflicting to see you in this state."

"Well, then, my love, we had better let them all know at once that our party originally fixed for Tuesday is postponed: had we not?"

"Postponed! Our grand party? Impossible! The party at which all the foreign ambassadors are to be present postponed! What on earth, my dear, are you dreaming about?"

"Did you not say that I had better lay up for a week?"

"Of course, I did; but not until after we have had our party."

"Well, my dear, then let it be after! I am not at all particular, you know. I'm anxious only to make things agreeable! But—" Here Sir Arthur was seized with a fit of coughing, which at once put an end to the colloquy, for Caroline immediately quitted the room.

On the Thursday evening they of course had their party, and an exceedingly brilliant affair it was. It was the only one of the kind they had ever had, that is to say the only one on a magnificent scale, a great proportion of the guests being "foreigners of distinction;" but everything passed off with infinite éclat, and Sir Arthur, whom the excitement completely knocked up, went into training on the following day.

This was of course under Charles, for Sir Arthur contended that no one knew the peculiar strength of his constitution so well, and having promised to adhere strictly to the regimen prescribed, he became like a child in his hands.

But even this received a most decided check in limine; and it may just as well be at once explained how.

On the Friday, Charles, after having given his uncle a respectable pill, drove him to the residence of a friend, who lived about seven miles from town, and who prided himself upon having the most valuable collection of aquatic birds in England.

"Do you call that instinct or reason?" inquired Charles, pointing to a number of ducks in the grass.

"Mean is too proud," returned Sir Arthur, "to admit that any other animal has reason."

"Yet it must," rejoined Charles, "be something approaching reason which prompts them immediately after rain, although they come from widely different countries,—for you perceive there are Australians, Poles, Muscovites, and Hollanders—to leave their natural element to feed upon worms!"

This observation, which Charles intended to apply only to ducks in general, was repeated by Sir Arthur to Caroline, who was, in consequence, exceedingly indignant.

"He alluded, I presume, to our party," she observed.

"Tut, nonsense, my dear," returned Sir Arthur, "What can our party have to do with it?"

"There were persons from those countries, you will remember! We had Russians, Poles, Dutchmen, and so on! They left their natural circle, in other words their natural element, to feed upon us—that is to say, of course, to feed upon worms! Upon my honour we ought to feel ourselves very highly flattered!"

"Ridiculous, my love; oh, absurd! The application was ingenious, I admit, but I am perfectly sure that Charles never meant anything of the kind."

Caroline, however, was not so sure; she had frequently suspected Charles of having made certain severe observations upon the style in which they lived, and therefore received it make a breach between him and his uncle; while Sir Arthur, who, apart from his matrimonial infatuation, was a man of sound sense and keen perception, thought it possible, very possible, that if they were not in reality worms, the foreign persons whom they had entertained held them to be very little better.

THE ROYAL ACADEMY.

The Royal Academy opened its doors to the public on Monday last, and some thousands of persons have ere this gratified their prestige for the pictorial by a ramble within its "walls of art." We have lounged our hour with the common crowd, and must confess that we make our report of that hour's impressions with very decided disappointment. The exhibition is hardly good—certainly not great. The pictures, with one or two very fair exceptions of new aspirants, are generally of a mediocre class, and the coup d'œil is anything but imposing. The gems of the Gallery are some of the best tributes of never-failing names; but these we go seeking out and dwelling over as it were episodically, as they are scattered like little islands of genius amid seas of common-place. There is no grand and imposing ensemble—the eye is not arrested here, dazzled there, fixed anywhere, by prominent indications of mind-mastery. In vain we look for the grandeur of history—the solemn beauty of Scripture—the fiery spirit of imagination—the glowing poetry of romance—dancing before the gaze, and making the walls oracular with the voice of Genius, crying "I am here!" Oh, but you have a wide ocean of portraiture! Yes, you may glance at one broad side of the great room, and glut your fancy with as much tailoring and millinery and as little flesh and blood as ever were gathered within gilt framing. You have a few rare exceptions of beauty creeping up into light, and these you catch eagerly, and thank their painters for arresting your attention from the crowd of chalk faces in the fashions of the day, which have fired your vision with the glare of a Barbadoes street. Alas! when will the patronage of the Academy be so industriously directed and so well bestowed that Art shall revel in the true freedom of greatness, and shine before us at these exhibitions in the many guises of genius, with the glory of truth and nature glowing in them all? When will the trade in Art be less evident, and its loftier spirit more developed before the world? When will imposing and undeviating beauty become—not its exception, but its rule?

Let us now glance at a few of the subjects which seemed most to attract the earlier notice of the public. Of course these are chiefly by Landseer, Stanfield, Roberts, Creswick, Etty, Eastlake, Howard, Martin, Turner, M'Clise, and a few more recorded favourites; some, however, only the favourites of cliques. From all these Landseer, Roberts, and Stanfield, in their several manners, bear away the palm. Landseer's pictures are indeed glorious copies from the natural world. Look at that child-portrait (100), the noble boy, with his sweet ingenuous face, mounted on that living pony, and as bright and animated as all the other forms of life around. Look at the dogs, the game, every object that has had blood within its veins, and outward deathenments of beauty and see how they are painted, how they speak! Or turn to those horses (313) brought to drink at that transparent water—that crystal, that seems to shine and move within its depths. There is genius, if you will!

Now run away to Turner—presto—from sober beauty to sparkling insanity. Here is a man who has a mania for painting atmospheres—who brings you before his canvass, and makes you sneeze with the dust of powdered rainbows—who thinks that, with coruscations of blue light and brimstone, he can make harmonies of sunbeams, and keep them floating in the air. It is pitiable to see art so deformed into madness. See those allegories—they are the painted fripperies of intellect in masquerade. And yet, glance at one or two efforts to represent the real, and see how much force of colour this artist can bring into sun and water; how he can rear temples in the gold that flambles within the sky, and make vessels sparkle with the ore on sail and prow as they career over the dancing wavelets. He is an inscrutable person that same erratic Mr. Turner.

How eloquent is Roberts this year! What calm, classic grandeur folds its chastened poetry around his pictures! How he revels in a fine noble simplicity of art! Behold his ruins—the falling column, the broken temple, the marble shining in decay. They talk to you with the voice of ages. Roberts is the greatest painter of his time.

What ho! a rush after the new wonder by M'Clise. The author in "Gil Blas" is presenting his manuscript to the cold and supercilious actress. Here is a blaze of costume. Here is the still life of the fine banquet and the elaborated ornament of the Old Curiosity Shop. Here is exquisite drawing with bad colouring and unrivalled minuteness of detail. A picture, in fact, with no ensemble; replete with separate effects, but without the compactness of subject and condensity of design. It is full of cleverness withal.

Etty, as usual, revels in nudity, and one may look in vain for a more graceful little picture than the "Bather." He only clothes his forms in beauty, and leaves them totally divested of garments which might fold modestly around them too. No doubt, however, that there is much poetry in this painter's art.

Howard with his Scripture pieces does not please us. Eastlake is felicitous with his fancy, and Martin pompous in his description. We do not like his mighty effort after sublimity—his large thoughts and little people his diminutive beings and his endless illimitability of space. More nature, more nature, cry we.

Stanfield must not be omitted from the list of those whom we love to praise. His pictures are delicious—their only fault a certain occasional chilliness which is one of the ingredients of his repose.

Most beautiful is Creswick—his fresh trees are green as memory—his sweet natural landscapes look as if they were brought bodily from their country homes, and registered "in fair epitome" upon "the painter's page." They have the breath of nature all about them.

There is one great effort of young aspiring genius in the exhibition, which we would not in justice pass—it is by P. F. Poole, and is entitled "Solomon Eagle exhorting the people to repentance in the plague of 1665." Although it wants ensemble, it is a splendid composition. Every figure is a study, and the grouping in many places most forcible and distinct. The work runs riot in a sort of feverish poetry akin to the wild misery of the subject, and quite abounding in eloquence and power. We shall hereafter notice this work separately in our general detail.

For the present let these general remarks introduce our criticism upon the Academy. They will serve to indicate to our readers where they may best go first in the exhibition—and they will pave the way for the reviews and illustrations which we have to produce.

THE MARKETS.

Corn Exchange.—Owing to the limited arrivals of wheat from our own coasts since our last statement, and to most of the dealers being short of stock the demand for that description of grain has ruled steady. The finest parcels have, in some few instances, sold at an advance on previous rates of 1s. per quarter, but the value of all other descriptions has remained almost unchanged. In foreign wheat a full amount of business has been passing, but no improvement whatever can be noticed in its value. Barley has been in limited supply and heavy demand at full rates of currency. The oat trade has ruled firm at full currencies. Beans, peas, and flour have gone off on late terms.

English. Wheat, Essex and Kent, red, 41s to 42s, ditto white, 46s to 52s; Norfolk and Suffolk, red, 39s to 41s, ditto, white, 42s to 46s; rye, 30s to 33s, grinding barley, 27s to 29s, malting ditto, 30s to 32s; Chevalier, 32s to 34s, Lincoln and Norfolk malt, 56s to 62s; brown ditto, 50s to 54s; Kingston and Ware, 56s to 58s; Chevalier, 60s to 62s; new and Lincolnshire feed oats, 17s to 21s, potato ditto, 19s to 23s, Youghal and Cork ditto, 17s to 18s, ditto white, 19s to 22s, tick beans, new, 34s to 36s; ditto, old, 34s to 36s, grey peas, 34s to 36s; maple, 35s to 36s; white, 33s to 35s; boilers, 29s to 37s per quarter. Town-made flour, 44s to 48s; Suffolk, 38s to 40s; Stockton and Yorkshire, 36s to 38s per 280 lbs. Foreign. In free wheat, 36s to 38s. In free barley, 27s; oats, new, 16s to 17s, ditto feed, 14s to 16s, beans, 29s to 30s; peas, 29s to 32s per quarter. Flour, American, 22s to 24s, Baltic, 23s per barrel.

The Seed Market.—The season for sowing most kinds of seeds being now nearly closed, our quotations may be considered almost nominal.

The following are the present rates:—Linseed, English, sowing, 48s to 52; Baltic, crushing, 42s to 43s, Mediterranean and Odessa, 43s to 46s, hempseed, 36s to 46s per quarter, coriander, 10s to 12s per cwt, brown mustard seed, 10s to 14s per bushel, white ditto, 10s to 10s 6d, tares 1s to 9d per bushel; English rapeseed, new, £30 to £33 per last of ten quarters, foreign, new, £24 to £26 per ton, English, £10 to £12 10s, ditto foreign, £7 to £7 10s per 1000, rapeseed cakes, £5 5 to £6 per ton.

Bread. The prices of wheaten bread are from 7d to 7½d; of household ditto, 5d to 6½d per 4-lb. loaf.

Imperial Weekly Average.—Wheat, 46s 4d; barley, 28s 2d; oats, 17s 2d; rye, 27s 7d; beans, 34s 4d; peas, 29s 1d.

Imperial Averages of Six Weeks which govern Duty.—Wheat, 46s 3d, barley, 28s 7d, oats, 17s 4d, rye, 28s 0d; beans, 34s 1d; peas, 28s 1d per quarter.

Duties on Foreign Corn.—Wheat, 20s; Barley, 9s; Oats, 8s; Rye, 11s 8d; Beans, 11s 6d; Peas, 11s 8d.

Sugar.—The market has ruled tolerably steady during the present week, and the prices have remained about stationary.

Coffee.—Although there have been some large sales effected since our last as most descriptions of sugar, previous quotations, arising from the large supplies on offer, are barely maintained.

Coffee.—In coffee, the quantity of which in warehouse is large, very little has been doing, and prices have still a downward tendency.

Metals.—The inquiry for all kinds of metals rules dull, and prices are again lower.

Oils.—There is rather more demand for olive oils, but in other kinds next to nothing is passing.

Tallow. The demand is good for P.T.C., and prices are firm at 43s 3d to 43s 6d on the spot, and 42s 6d for autumn delivery.

Hops. In consequence of the unfavourable accounts which have come to hand from the hop districts there is more business doing in this article, and prices have further advanced 10s per cwt.

Wool. Notwithstanding the last sales of wool, at auction, were off freely at an advance of ½d per lb, the quantity offered was limited, and prices are barely maintained. The imports this week have comprised about 1200 packages.

Provisions. About 3000 tons of potatoes have reached the pool during the last few days from various quarters, but the demand is heavy, at prices varying from 60s to 75s per ton.

Cork. Heston, 20s 3d; Lumbton, 20s 3d, Morrison, 17s 3d; New Tanfield, 14s 6d, Asharn, 13s 6d; Stewarts, 9s 6d; Hartley, 15s 6d per ton quarter.

Smithfield.—We have to report an unusually heavy demand for all kinds of stock in our market, to-day (Monday), from 2d to 4d per 8lbs. in the general quotations:—Beef, from 2s 6d to 3s 10d; mutton, 2s 4d to 3s 8d; lamb, 4s 6d to 5s 6d; veal, 3s 2d to 4s 8d; and pork, 2s 8d to 3s 8d per 8 lb. to sink the offal.

Newgate and Leadenhall.—Upwards of 4300 carcases of country-killed meat have arrived hither this week, which have produced considerable heaviness in the demand, and prices have again declined:—Beef, from 2s 6d to 3s 8d; mutton, 2s 8d to 3s 6d; lamb, 4s 6d to 5s 6d; veal, 3s 6d to 4s 6d; and pork, 2s 8d to 3s 10d per 8 lb. by the carcase.

COMMERCE AND MONEY.

The commercial letters by the April Mail Packets had arrived in London in the beginning of this week, and generally their contents may be considered satisfactory. Continental exchanges had even to a certain degree dullness in trade were disappearing, and the banks were increasing in confidence by increasing their liberality in the issue of money and by materially decreasing the previous high and ruinous rates of discount. The demand for British goods at Calcutta was slowly becoming larger, and a reduction in the quantities of goods on hand was gradually taking place. In the value of any article of manufacture, however, no great improvement had been secured, although when new parcels arrived, the advance to hand higher prices were considered as being the certain consequence of the then existing state of commercial affairs. To the Bombay merchants the opening of the river Indus was considered to be of much importance, for from that channel a new trade will be created with the various, and many of them wealthy, communities in central Asia, the extent of whom has been hitherto unknown by the formerly existing system of overland conveyance by camels. Water carriage hereafter, and the suppression entirely of the tolls heretofore charged by the various states through which the goods had previously been carried will speedily much lessen the expense of transit, and add materially to the future consumption of European goods in these quarters. We are again enabled to state that in the manufacturing districts nothing like activity or an increase, more particularly as woollens and in cotton goods. The information from Leeds, Manchester, and Glasgow, received during this week has been again most satisfactory, and all who were working short time are now working full time, and even reached their former high rates, but the expense of living is at present moderate, and consequently, consequently, is generally to be found in all the manufacturing communities, with the exception of Sheffield and Birmingham, where matters certainly are not so pressing. The influence of improvement, however, in the above departments of industry must extend itself to these places, and cause even there an alteration there likewise for the better in the circumstances of the people

Large business a good deal of business has been again done since our last publication in various descriptions of colonial produce. For sugars of all descriptions the demand has been extensive, and more than the usual weekly quantity has gone into consumption, at rather higher prices. The same remark applies to rum, pimento, and to various other descriptions of produce. The consumption of coffee also is rather increasing than the contrary, but still no adequate improvement takes place in its value.

On the English stock exchange less activity than usual has existed in the transactions of speculators, jobbers, and brokers, and a decline in the Consols of upwards of ¼ per cent has occurred since our last publication. Two good reasons may be given for this heaviness in the funds. The first is the unsatisfactory state of the public revenue, for, previous to the appearance of the Budget, on Monday last, very few indeed conceived it possible that the balance between the public income and expenditure could have been unfavourable to the country. The last reason for the depression of the Consol market is, however, a most satisfactory one, for the improvements which are in progress in manufactures and in commerce are daily opening to the moneyed interest more profitable channels for the employment of money than are to be found for it in investment in our national securities, and consequently the general prosperity must cause a further decline in the value of the British funded debt. On the foreign stock exchange, also, speculation has, for a time, nearly ceased to exist, and the value of all descriptions of foreign bonds has undergone very little alteration. The demand for Spanish bonds has been materially interrupted by the uncertain position of the Spanish administration, but we still think that under no circumstances can any permanent improvement in their value or confidence be looked for. Some money has been again invested in Dutch and Belgian bonds, and their value has been maintained. In the Russian market no change has taken place in the value of any of the securities in which the same are last week's prices.

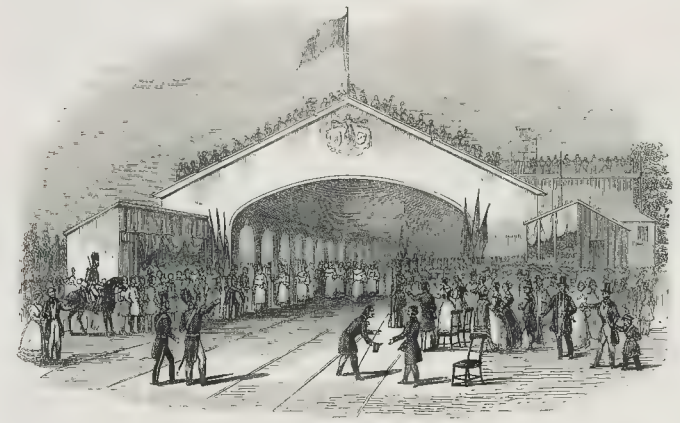
THE LANCASHIRE BELL-RINGERS, AT THE ADELPHI THEATRE.

The tintinnabulatory feats of these "Seven sons of Campanology" have excited considerable interest at the Adelphi theatre, on the same evenings with the performances of the great Wizard of the North. The ringers are stated to be natives of Lancashire, a county celebrated in the annals of Campanology. The precision with which each performer takes up the required note, and his management of the bells so as to give effect to the most delicate and piano passages, or to others as loud and martial as a military brass band, are truly surprising, as well as their general improvement, by incessant practice, since their last performance in the metropolis. Their bells, forty-two in number, form the chromatic scale in the compass of three octaves and a fourth, thus enabling them to perform the most difficult overtures, waltzes, quadrilles, &c.

It would be injustice not to mention with praise the conductor of the Campanologian band, Mr. H. Johnson, whose skill has mainly contributed to the perfection of their performances.

Ringing, by the way, is a practice which is said to be peculiar to England, which, for that reason, and the dexterity of its inhabitants in composing and ringing musical peals, wherein the sounds interchange in regular order, is called the Ringing Island. Formerly, too, men of rank practised bell-ringing as a pastime. The treatise on this subject at present in highest repute, is "Campanologia Improved," 1733, where the reader will find all the terms explained of single, plain bob, grandsire bob, single bob minor, grandsire treble, bob major, caters, ten-in, bob royal, cinque, and twelve-in or bob maximus, with all their regular permutations.



OPENING OF THE ROUEN AND PARIS RAILROAD.

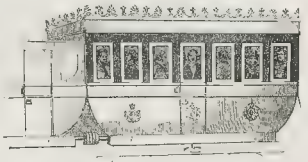
(From our own Correspondent.)

ROUEN, May 4.—Yesterday took place the ceremony of opening the first railroad which is to connect more closely England and France together. It is scarcely necessary to remind you that this extraordinary work has been the joint undertaking of French and English speculators, with the aid of the Government of France. The total distance is about 84 miles, or 436 French kilometres. There are five tunnels, viz., Rolleboise (the longest), 2525 metres; Villers, 1700; Tourville, 435; Batignolles, 329; and Versailles, 246. The metre is about two inches over the English yard. The works were commenced in July, 1841, and, in less than two years, the entire line has been finished. Mr. Locke is the engineer, and Messrs. Mackenzie and Brassie are the contractors. Mr. Reid has been the resident managing director for the English shareholders; and M. Charles Laffitte, the banker, has represented the French speculators. The utmost cordiality has reigned throughout the enterprise, not only between the French and English directorship, but also between the workmen on the line, the majority of whom have been British. The terminus in Paris is in the Rue St. Lazare, which is also that of the Versailles (right bank) and St. Germain. It is proposed to erect a terminus expressly for the Rouen line, at a future period. The train which brought down the first batch of visitors from Paris quitted that capital at 8 A.M.; it consisted of upwards of 500 persons. The royal train left an hour afterwards, bringing the Duc de Nemours, the future Regent of France; the Duc de Montpensier, youngest son of the King of the French; M. Duchatel, the Minister of the Interior; M. Lacave Laplagne, the Minister of the Interior; M. Teste, the Minister of Public Works; M. Cunin Gridaine, the Minister of Commerce and Agriculture; M. Sauzet, the President of the Chamber of Deputies; M. Rambuteau, the Prefect of the Seine; with many peers, deputies, &c. The royal train amounted to 200 persons; and the carriage in which their Royal Highnesses were seated, a sketch of which is supplied by our artist, was very splendid, being of a very large size, the interior fitted up like a salon, with elegant furniture complete and superb chairs for the Princes. On the outside panels were the arms of Paris and Rouen—the ship the former, and the lion the latter. On the whole line the population turned out to witness the passing of the royal train, which did not proceed at a very rapid rate owing to the praiseworthy precautions taken to prevent the festivities of the day being clouded by any untoward event. The fête was, however, on this side of the line and not at the capital; and never did the old town of Rouen present such an appearance as this day. This city was formerly the capital of Normandy; but is now called the best city of the department of the Seine, and is an archbishop's see. It is situated on the declivity of a hill, north of the river Seine, and if the suburbs be included it is about eight miles in circumference. There is not in Europe, perhaps, a more enchanting view than from the summit of the hill of St. Catherine. There are magnificent boulevards, bordered with noble trees, round the town, very requisite for the comfort of the population, exceeding 100,000, cooped up as it is in narrow streets. Rouen is the mart for Havre, and vessels of 200 tons burthen come up here. Those of larger burthen go to Quillebœuf. Rouen is essentially a manufacturing town, and is one of the largest trading towns in France. It is the potteries, as well as the hardware, cotton, and woollen factory, and it would be difficult to name any article of merchandise of consumption which is not to be found manufactured. The Gothic cathedral, originally built by William the Conqueror, still attracts visitors from all parts of the world. Here are inscriptions in memory of our Richard Cœur de Lion, Henry his nephew, and the Duke of Bedford, who was regent. The wooden roof of the Palace of Justice, resembling a ship keel upwards, is one of the "lions" of Rouen. The Cotton and Cloth Halls, and the Exchange, are curious buildings. Rouen was the birthplace of the great Corneille, of Fontanelle, of Blondel the mathematician, and Daniel the historian; of course it will be recollected that Joan of Arc was burnt in this town, in 1430, for witchcraft. At an early hour this morning the streets assumed a most animated appearance by the National Guards pouring in from all quarters, and the peasants with their peculiar costume. The Champ de Mars was the rendezvous for the troops. The tricoloured emblem, we noticed, was worn very generally by the people as well as the military. It was truly picturesque to gaze on the varied colours of the trades of Rouen, amongst which the printers were conspicuous; they had a banner, one side of which represented Guttemberg, and the other Senefelder. The flags had a very gay aspect, and it was gratifying to find the working classes thus associating themselves spontaneously with the most elevated classes of society, to render homage to the genius of man in bringing not merely provinces, but nations, closer together. At half-past ten the cortège moved from the Champ de Mars towards the Boulevards, and from thence to the Hôtel de Ville, traversing the quarters of the city inhabited by the operatives, who cheered loudly the bands representing their particular industry. At the Town-house the municipal authorities joined the procession, and at the Prefecture the departmental chiefs were included. As it traversed the quays the effect was enchanting. All the vessels were decorated with flags. Every balcony, window, and roof was occupied with a dense mass of spectators. On the arrival of the cortège at the station it divided itself—one part spreading itself into the lovely meadows, and the other occupying the road. A little before one the first convoy from Paris arrived amidst great cheering, and in about a quarter of an hour afterwards the enthusiasm was unbounded as the royal train came in. A superb breakfast, including the choicest wines, was given by the Company to about 700 persons, and the royal breakfast saloon was rendered remarkable by the conferring of the cross of the Legion of Honour on the engineer, Mr. Locke, and M. Taibandeau, the secretary. This was done by the Duke of Nemours, in a very complimentary address, in the King's name. The terminus was decorated with the arms of Paris and Rouen. All the deputies representing the latter town were present, including the venerable M. Lafitte. The breakfast over, the ceremony of the benediction took place. The Cardinal Archbishop of Paris, with an immense attendance of clergy, entered the saloon, where two locomotives were standing, on one of which was Mr. Locke. The prayer and blessing were then uttered. After that the royal dukes reviewed the troops. There were two passing showers during the ceremony, which caused great annoyance to the ladies, and much amusement to the gentlemen, as there was a general retreat. The Parisian visitors quitted by a train at 4 P.M. At the Champ de Mars there was a discharge of fireworks, and at the Hôtel de Ville the princes partook of a grand banquet. They return to Paris to-morrow morning.

Thus has terminated a very memorable ceremony. The importance of the railroad is not merely in reference to the advantages to be derived from Paris and Rouen communicating with each other in less than four hours and a half, but in the difference of time to be gained by the line between London and Paris. With the Brighton steamers to Dieppe, and the Southampton steamers to Havre, there will now be a passage varying from seventeen hours to twenty-four hours to start from London and to reach Paris. The transit between the two countries will now be increased immensely, and with the best results it is hoped for the preservation of peace and amity.

From another Correspondent.

ROUEN, Wednesday, May 3rd.—At eight this morning we started for the railway, at which time hundreds of persons were flocking from all parts to the station. In a short time the civic and law authorities in their splendid costumes, attended by the military and National Guards, began to assemble, as also the priests and artisans in procession, bearing banners, describing the craft to which each body belonged. So quickly did they collect, that two entrances were made, one on each side of the railway, the terminus of which is situate on the south of the river Seine, on the opposite side to the town. The edifice is large and commodious; it is yet unfinished. The front facing the rail was fitted up with good taste. On each side of the line were meadows of great extent, into which the military, National Guard, &c., and trade processions came in countless numbers, each company preceded by drums, and some with brass bands, adding much to enliven the already interesting scene. Some idea of the numbers may be formed, by the time it took them to collect. From eight in the morning two continuous streams of persons six and eight in rank, were pouring in till after 12 o'clock in the day. The fire-brigade with engines, and gas companies with banners, were most prominent with the military schools, and the collection of trades and National Guards from all the surrounding villages within the distance of twelve miles, some coming by steam-boats from Elleboeuf (eighteen miles). At half-past twelve the scene became exceedingly animated, companies of horse and foot forming over an immense tract as far as the eye could reach. Elegantly-dressed ladies filled the road-way immediately under the roof of the terminus, and on each hand outside the same were placed chairs for the accommodation of such as could obtain tickets; the roof also was occupied by the employers and their friends; the omnibusses also in the service of the railway were decorated with ribbons, the roofs covered with persons, and were drawn up in line. Anxiety for the arrival was now manifest, and at ten minutes before one a train of twelve carriages arrived from Paris, containing the directors and others; at ten minutes past one the train of thirteen carriages, containing the Duke d'Aumale and his attendants, came in. A short delay took place in consequence of some difficulty in removing the first train off the line previous to the last one coming up. The duke, who was looking well, was accommodated with a carriage of larger dimensions and more elegant construction than the rest, having velvet seats on all sides, with a chair for his highness, and enriched on the outside with or-moulu mouldings, and the arms of Rouen and Paris in or-moulu on the panels.



The tricoloured flag also decorated the front of the engine. The duke and suite, upon alighting, were met by the mayor and council, and ushered into the offices of the company, which had been prepared for the occasion, where the Archbishop of Rouen waited to receive them. The trains moved back on the rail, and after a short suspense, during which the company had refreshed themselves, the distinguished party took their seats in two booths which had been erected for the occasion, the bishop and priests on the right hand, the duke and suite on the left. The spectacle at this moment was imposing beyond description. Countless banners waving in the air, music playing on all sides, and guns firing. The front ranks of the reserved seats at the terminus and on each side of the line being also filled with ladies, among whom might be observed a predominance of the lofty Normandy cap, which, to our minds, considerably heightened the effect. The soldiery and townsfolk filled every place as far as the eye could reach; even the bridge and quay in the distance were literally crowded with persons who were unable to proceed further, because of the numbers before them, patiently waiting the return of the procession. The spot being surrounded by hills looked one vast arena, and took the reflection back to the days when Rome assembled its thousands for the fête. At two o'clock, however, to the mortification of the spectators, a smart rain fell, which lasted a quarter of an hour. The ladies, many of whom had no head covering, ran from place to place for shelter, but only to be disappointed. Such a dense mass was assembled outside as to defy all attempts to return to their homes; others seemed determined to brave the storm even in its worst mood, and endured the shower-bath with heroic patience. The rain having ceased, the drums again beat for the stragglers to return to their posts, and the duke and his suite, preceded by the cathedral boys, some in white surplices and black tunics, others with red skullcaps and pink sashes, proceeded up the line of rail, returning through the troops, to the door in his way to the Hotel de Ville, the whole company, &c., forming in procession, during which period the priests, under the conduct of the archbishop, went through a service intended as a blessing on the undertaking, nearly 200 chanters assisting in the ceremony. We now moved to catch a glimpse of apartments that had been fitted up to refresh the distinguished visitors, &c., which occupied the whole length of the building, being in three compartments, altogether occupying a space of about 260 feet by 80 feet in width. All seemed admirably arranged, a table being placed at the head (at which the duke sat) running the whole width of the building. Then followed four tables lengthways, leaving one table in the centre for the viands, &c. Large services of plate were sent from Paris for the occasion, which unfortunately we could not see to perfection.

THE FACTORY QUESTION.—A meeting of millowners and manufacturers was held, on Tuesday, at the British Coffee-house, Cockspur-street, for the purpose of offering their opinions and affording information upon the Factory Bill to the members of Parliament for the boroughs in and counties of Yorkshire, Lancashire, Chester, and Derby. A large number of influential millowners and manufacturers from the above counties was in attendance, and amongst the members of Parliament we observed the Hon. Mr. Stuart Wortley, Sir G. Strickland, Sir J. Johnson, Mr. Tollemache, Mr. Ferrand, Mr. Brocklehurst, Mr. T. Egerton, Mr. Wilbraham, Mr. Hardy, Mr. Grimsditch, Mr. Stansfield, Mr. Hindley, Mr. Walker, Mr. Fielden, Mr. Ainsworth, and Mr. Lascelles. The Hon. John Stuart Wortley was called to the chair, a series of resolutions were then proposed, but, after considerable discussion, their further consideration was postponed, and the meeting adjourned.

The recent regulation of the Post-office affecting letters posted in this country directed to places beyond the territories of the East India Company, has been cancelled by the authority of the Postmaster-General. Such letters and newspapers consequently need not now be addressed "to the care of correspondents in India," but may be sent in the usual way. The order was cancelled on Saturday last.

THE CONDITION OF IRELAND.

The condition of Ireland, of her Government, her Poor-laws, the suppression of her Agitation meetings, and the whole question of Repeal, are now deserving and obtaining the serious consideration of the Legislature and the country. Within a few days a number of emphatic declarations have emanated, not only from members of the Executive Government, but of both Houses of Parliament, and, out of doors, from politicians and the press; and few of them—no matter to what end directed—have been without a certain amount of significance and pith. All, however, have denoted a feverishness, typical of the pressing difficulties of legislation in reference to Irish affairs—a sense of dilemma and dissatisfaction, combined with a half acknowledgment of many grievances now inflicted upon the Irish people—and equally a sense of the impropriety of regarding those grievances less as evils to be redressed than as excuses for advocating the dismemberment of the Empire.

The question of Repeal of the Union—one of inconceivable mischief, if not of absolute danger—has been the war-shout of interested agitators; for what purpose it would be difficult to devise, if not for that of wringing tribute from a population in a state of almost declared pauperism, of inspiring and exciting the unselfishness of enthusiasm to give pittance from the hand of wretchedness, and to deprive the body of sustenance to feed hope. In some districts of misery it has cost an expenditure of thousands to collect the most pitiful instalments of poor-law rates, while the voluntary sacrifice to Repeal has swollen as rapidly and vehemently as the torrents of the Nile. This is a moral anomaly, the combined result of grievance, agitation, and distress. Let us hope that the visionary project of the Repeal of the Union may be abandoned more peaceably by the Irish people than the great collections of their violent leader in its behalf would at first glance lead us to expect; and on the other hand let the Government conciliate them away from that miserable scheme of ruin. The Ministerial leaders in both houses of Parliament have spoken out in the name of the country, and almost personally in the name of the Queen: they have declared Repeal to be but another name for dismemberment of the British empire, and have pronounced their emphatic determination to preserve the Union intact. This was no more than the voice of power giving utterance to the dictates of reason; and before its nervous eloquence and tone of truth the riot of agitation ought calmfully to subside. The sense of the Irish people should teach them to feel this not less for their own good than for the general good of the nation. On the other hand the Government should be chary of despotism, and keep the line between energy and tyranny most markedly drawn. There is a certain difficulty in the suppression of public meetings which should be met with ever-delicate caution and conciliation, for liberty frowns upon force, and peaceful demonstrations of public opinion have grown into the regard of the people, from the mighty moral results which they have never failed to achieve. Nor should the people be less tenacious of being tempted into the path of revolution, instead of into that of free and manly contention for legitimate political rights.

For ourselves, we will candidly admit our conviction that the true mode of disarming the repeal of hostility—of humbling and defeating O'Connell in that respect—of teaching the Irish not only that there is no right, but no reason, for separation—has not been adopted by the Government either in England or Ireland. Religious differences are not running high as of yore, and political conciliations ought to soften the temper of the times. But as yet, the only good that the present Government has done for Ireland has consisted in the exemption from the Income-tax. That dreadful and exasperating poor-law, which must prove the demoralising curse and ruin of every country in which its principles are suffered to obtain, has borne a bitterness into the bosoms of the Irish people which, heated by the flame of Repeal agitation, half threatens to pour out its agony in blood. Why not abrogate that bad law? See how the people dread, abhor, quail under it! See how they defy it, which is worse! And now we talk of erecting public works for its continuance—works which we must have bayonets to fortify and soldiers to defend. There can be no hope for the people, no policy for the nation, in such a course; and already the expense of the rate collection has proved one of the most formidable horrors of the law. A poor-law for Ireland—for any country—should be cast in the beautiful mould and spirit of the law of Elizabeth, to relieve and not to goad, brutalise, and oppress; and for the public works which are to benefit the poor in Ireland, they must not be works subservient to the operation of a poor-law, but works which, independent of any law, will, while they are working out purposes of general usefulness, give free, natural, and healthly employment to an industriously inclined and labour-courting population. Works to improve the mercantile aspect of the beautiful country, to encourage enterprise, promote trade, check the mischiefs of absenteeism, and induce the confidence of capitalists, and that security of feeling, also, which Repeal agitation, by the way, is, of all nostrums, most calculated to shake.

Let Government turn its attention, in the name of humanity, to these and other legislative measures with regard to Ireland (not only enacting good, but abrogating bad), which they have hitherto somewhat culpably neglected. Let them cheer the hearts and win the affections of the Irish into a love of order and a peaceful contemplation of the frightful dangers of Repeal. The one will lure them to peace, the other arrest them from revolution, and good government would so cement the union with earnest and enduring strength. The Queen, too, may step in to seal the compact, to see a benevolent Government and a conciliated people shake hands, and to feel in the bosom of Ireland how loudly the popular heart can glow and beat with a loyalty as warm as its patriotism, and a devotion as deep as its sense of wrong. The Queen's visit should now be the watchword in Ireland; her ministers should make it tenfold propitious by the preliminary enactment of measures of relief and hope; and the people should have a care lest a fierce and mad abandonment to the wicked delusion of Repeal should bring about a crisis of excitement so alarming as to deprive them of the happiness and value of their Sovereign's presence, at a moment when her smile would sooth, revive, and exhilarate the spirit of every human dweller upon the emerald soil.

PRINCE ALBERT PRESIDING AT A COURT OF THE DUCHY OF CORNWALL ON TUESDAY LAST.

Circumstances have of late combined to render this peculiar jurisdiction of considerable public interest. Thus, on her Majesty giving birth to a son, on November 9, 1841, the infant prince, as eldest son of the Sovereign, at once inherited the title and revenues of the Duchy of Cornwall, it requiring no investment or creation to obtain the right and title, whereas, the princedom of Wales requires a new creation for every succeeding prince. The appointment of Prince Albert to the head of the jurisdiction, and the regularity with which his Royal Highness performs his official duties, also contribute to this interest; and, by bringing "the duchy" frequently before the public, invest its history and constitution with an attractiveness akin to novelty, and induce us to bring them more immediately before our readers.

The Duchy of Cornwall was created in 1337, in favour of Edward the Black Prince, and settled by act of Parliament on the eldest son of the King of England: such being the first creation of a duke in England. The duke enjoyed large revenues, arising from the lordships of castles, boroughs, and manors granted to him in Cornwall and Devonshire, the profits arising from the coinage of tin, and various other sources. The annual revenue on the average of the three years subsequent to the death of the Black Prince was £2493 7s. 3¼d.; the clear revenue in 15 Henry VIII. amounted to £10 095 11s. 9½d.; in 44 Queen Elizabeth, in 1602, it had fallen to £4569 12s. 2½d.; and in 1814 the gross amount was estimated at £22,000, of which £8500 arose from the tin-duty in the county of Cornwall, and £3500 from the rents of manors, fines, &c., in the same county, besides other sources.

The officers of the duchy consist of a vice-admiral, lord-warden of the stannaries, and steward of the duchy; his secretary, two vice-wardens, one for Cornwall, the other for Devon; a receiver-general, and his deputy; an auditor and his deputy; a surveyor-general; and two deputies; an attorney-general; a constable of

DUCHY OF CORNWALL OFFICE, SOMERSET-HOUSE.

Launceston Castle; an assay master of tin; a comptroller of coinages; a deputy-steward of the stannary courts for each county; four supervisors of blowing and smelting houses: stewards of estates and revenues in Berks, Dorset, Surrey, and Somerset; seven deputy-stewards of Cornwall and Devon, and three clerks in the service of the surveyor and auditor-general; "quite enough" observes Mr. Bedding, in his valuable "Itinerary of Cornwall," it may be presumed, to take care of a revenue of £20,000. per annum. Many of these places, it is inferred, are sinecures; and more must have recently become so by the change which has been wisely effected in the abrogation of the old practice of coinage.

In the reign of Henry VIII. the property of the duchy consisted of ten castles, now in ruins, nine parks, one forest, fifty-three manors, thirteen boroughs or towns, nine hundreds, and extensive tracts of waste or moor-ground. A large part of these possessions were alienated by the Stuarts to favourites, frittered away by ill-management, or sold to raise money. The estates of the duchy are generally farmed on leases of lives, renewable some for a fine certain, others upon a calculation of value. The land revenue of the duchy is not now more than £5000 per annum, with the tin dues yielding about £15,000.

The original charter of the stannaries, granted by Edward I., and confirmed by Edward III., is said to have been lost or destroyed at Lostwithiel, in the wars of Charles I. The miners were, by this charter, exempt from all jurisdiction except that of the stannary courts, save in such cases as might affect land, life, or limb. The appeal from the lord warden or his courts lay to the duke or king in council. The vice-warden's court is now commonly held once a month, and decides all matters between miners relative to mining, and no writ of error lies from it to the courts at Westminster. The stannary laws are revised or new ones enacted by the duke and his council, with the consent of what is called the stannary parliament, consisting of twenty-four stannators, gentlemen of property in the mining districts, chosen six for each stannary. The last stannary parliament was held at Truro in 1752. The stannary laws have been repeatedly published. The stannary prison was at Lostwithiel, but, by the recent act (which we shall presently mention), is now at Bodmin. The ancient records of the stannaries were kept at Lostwithiel till they were burnt in the great civil war of Charles I., and in 1644 by the parliamentary army.

An act was passed in the 6th and 7th William IV., by which the equitable jurisdiction of the vice-warden is extended to all matters connected with the working of lead, copper, or other metallic minerals within the county of Cornwall. The stannary courts are also consolidated, and are to be held before the vice-warden, who is to have the same authority that the stewards had; he is authorised to make rules and orders for his court, which is made a court of record, and is held at Truro.

The offices of the Duchy of Cornwall, for greater convenience, are fixed in the metropolis, the centre of the eastern side of the quadrangle of Somerset-house being appropriated for that purpose. The officers of the duchy are as follow:—Commissioners, his Royal Highness Prince Albert, Lord Warden; the First Commissioner of Woods and Forests; the Keeper of Privy Purse, Thomas Pemberton, Esq.; Lord De L'Isle and Dudley, Lord Portman, and G. E. Anson, Esq. Lord Warden or the Stannaries and Chief Steward, Prince Albert. Attorney-General, Thomas Pemberton, Esq. Receiver-General, Sir H. Wheatley. Secretary, T. Abbot, Esq. Auditor, J. R. Gardiner, Esq. Surveyor General, Lord De L'Isle and Dudley. Clerks in the Office of the Surveyor-General and Auditor, B. Tucker, R. C. Abbot, G. Marrable, and Sept. Woodgate, Esqrs.

At Somerset-house his Royal Highness the Lord Warden presides in the form represented in the preceding engraving. The meetings are convened early in the morning. His Royal Highness wears a superb robe of green velvet and ermine, and is seated in a chair of state, attended by the commissioners, auditors, &c. At the meeting on Tuesday last the Prince was attended by his treasurer and secretary, Mr. G. E. Anson, and Colonel Wylde, one of his Royal Highness's equerries.

THE GOLD MEDAL PRESENTED TO THE PASHA OF EGYPT.

This splendid medal has been presented to Mehemet Ali Pasha, by a body of British noblemen, merchants, and men of talent, as a token of gratitude for his Highness's generosity in keeping open the Indian overland route, in difficult and perplexing circumstances, in the year 1840, and affording them, as well as all other times, a ample protection to the persons of Englishmen. This conduct has not escaped the penetration of Sir Robert Peel; who in Parliament, on the 24th of April last, bore "this public testimony to the liberality with which the Pasha of Egypt has permitted the transit of intelligence through his territories. (Hear, hear.) Whatever complaints may have existed as to his conduct, he, at least, may naturally have felt the proceedings of this country towards himself as apparently harsh and provoking; but, with truly generous and enlightened feeling, he never allowed this to induce him to throw the slightest obstruction in the way of our communication with India. (Hear, hear.) There may be governments more enlightened and intelligent than his, but it is hardly possible there could have been manifested greater liberality. (Hear, hear.) I believe," said the right honourable baronet, "his conduct as much marked by wisdom (hear), and just as calculated to promote his advantage as to redound to his credit (hear); but it is not every government which takes so enlightened and liberal a course under such circumstances as those in which he was involved." (Hear, hear.)

The proposal for striking this medal will be found noticed in the third number of our journal, which also contains a fine portrait of Mehemet Ali. The medal has been executed by Mr. A. J. Stothard, medal engraver to the Queen. It has been forwarded, with an address, to the Pasha; and the following has just been received by the honorary secretaries to the subscriptions, Lieutenant Waghorn and Mr. C. Roach Smith, F.S.A.:—

Alexandria, April 3rd, 1843.

Gentlemen,—I am happy to be able to inform you that the Viceroy, my master, has received with the most lively satisfaction the medal and address which you have been requested to present to him in the name of many distinguished Englishmen.

His Highness could not fail to be extremely sensible of the expression of sentiments which assure him that, in the heart of the great British nation, the constant aim of his efforts is not misunderstood, and that there exists a proper appreciation of the difficulties he has overcome to give a new development to those commercial transactions of which Egypt is the object, to extend the channels of European trade, and to restore to it the important route of the Red Sea, which a long period of barbarism had closed. Among the encouragements which have supported him in an enterprize so laborious, the Viceroy feels flattered in reckoning the opinions of the influential Englishmen who have voted him this medal and address.

I am happy, gentlemen, on my part, that his Highness, in commanding me to be the interpreter to you and your honourable colleagues of his gratitude and goodwill, furnishes an opportunity for me to offer you the assurance of my high consideration.

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

FRANCE.—(From our own Correspondent.) PARIS, May 16, 1843.—A few days since we had a most interesting debate in the Chamber of Peers on that question of great importance, "religious toleration," resulting from several petitions presented by Protestant ministers and Protestant congregations. The petitioners complain that in several parts of France not only their houses of worship have been closed, but the pastors and members of the Reformed Church have been persecuted by the authorities. M. de Tascher, the chairman of the committee named to investigate the merits of the petitions, although he did not deny the statements contained in them, still reported that the committee recommended "the order of the day," that is to say, that they should be rejected. Several noble peers spoke for and against them, and it is a most singular fact that one of the most strenuous opponents was the celebrated M. Barthe, one of the promoters and pillars of the last revolution! M. Barthe has been a violent Republican, a Reformist, and is now an enemy to religious toleration! The speech of the Duc de Broglie, in favour of the petitions, was such as was expected from that enlightened statesman; his arguments were in good taste, logical, and ought to have carried conviction with them. The enlightened peers, the great part created since the glorious days of July, were of a different opinion, and the petitions were rejected! In the Chamber of Deputies petitions were presented, praying "the free liberty of education." The petitions were referred to the Minister, in whose portfolio they will, in all probability, repose in peace. Our Gallic neighbours, who claim to be the most civilised people in the world, have, in these instances, shown that at all events they are enemies to religious toleration. I will watch this subject closely, aware of the great interest felt in England on all religious questions.

The sugar bill is now before the Chamber of Deputies gives much uneasiness to the ministers, and the portefeuille intriguers are again at work; indeed I am most credibly informed that the Citizen is no stranger to a report industriously circulated, that a reconciliation had taken place between Count Montalivet, the most intimate friend of Louis Philippe, and M. Thiers, and that there is a great probability that ere long he will take office. On the other hand the friends of M. Guizot are far from being idle; they state that such is the close intimacy between France and Austria, that immediately after the session of Parliament Prince Metternich and M. Guizot are to have an interview on the banks of the Rhine. What truth there is in either of these reports it is difficult to say; but this much is certain, great uneasiness reigns in the different Ministerial bureaux. The Ministers are in a most unpleasant position with the sugar question; they cannot satisfy the merchants of Havre and Bordeaux, and the almost ruined manufacturers of beet-root sugar. Enemies, and powerful enemies, they must make. Do not for a moment imagine that political questions are carried on in France with the same spirit as in England. Here they are personal, and each individual studies his own interest, caring little either for his party or the general good. The result is, that neither the Minister nor the leader of the Opposition can calculate for a single day on the number of his friends. This, I am certain, is the cause for the continual changes of the Ministry, and the impossibility of undertaking any great work of public utility.

In my last I noticed the unfavourable state of our trade. I am this week confirmed in what I advanced by an influential journal, which observes—"Our merchants at the different ports complain of a dullness ever of the stagnation which reigns in all commercial transactions. Instead of our relations extending they diminish; our warehouses are choked with merchandize, and few sales can be effected. No speculations are undertaken, no employment for capital; in short, a complete stagnation."

To this distressing state of affairs must be added the inundations in different parts of the country. The overflowing of the Garonne, although of less importance than those in the months of January, February, and March last, has still, within the last fortnight, destroyed all the hay, and the corn under water, and very much injury to the hemp as may be very prejudicial to the plant. So that, what with the stagnation in trade, the inundations, the frost-bitten wines, and the sugar dispute, I am afraid 1843 will carry with it serious commotions in our commercial world.

Several new operas are in repetition at the Opera Comique, the music by Thomas, Boeldieu, Boisselot, de Flotow, Thys, and Vogel, but chiefly of one act; indeed no opera of any great merit has been produced this season, nor do I hear of any being on the tapis. In the Grand Opera the repetition runs changes with "La Juive," "Les Huguenots," "Charles VI.," and "Guillaume Tell." The Grand Opera is greatly fallen in public favor, the receipts of the last week have been bad, very bad—"La Juive" only produced £129; "Guillaume Tell" is the only opera which draws, and then only when Barriolet plays Guillaume Tell, and Duprez Arnold. Poor Duprez has lost his lawsuit with the director of the Opera, and is compelled to play the inferior character of the Dauphin in "Charles VI." Duprez is doomed to misfortune, and you will not have the pleasure of hearing him this season, he having received the following letter from Mr. Bunn (translated from the French):—

"Covent garden Theatre, May 1, 1843.

"My dear sir,—I have received your letter and hasten to reply to it. On all occasions you have acted so nobly towards me that I would state to you without any reserve my situation. Such clouds hang over our theatres, the general opinion was favourable.

If we are condemned in France to one act operas, in different parts of the Continent operas of great merit have been produced, and justly appreciated. At Palermo Maestro Pert's "Ester d' Engaddi," a serious opera, in three acts, obtained, in the Ducal Theatre, the most brilliant success. Pert was several times called before the audience. In a few days, to the Royal Theatre of Baden will be brought out the opera of "Medée d'Euripide," the music by Mendelssohn; the translation of the poem is by Kraft, and the scene part is confided to Louis Lenck, the artiste who so admirably brought out "Antigone," and other serious operas, last year, at Potsdam. In Madrid and Grenada "Marino Faliero" is the opera in vogue. The Spanish Paganini, Monasterio, is the delight and astonishment of all the most avant Castilian amateurs. In Vienna the two sisters Melanollo are creating a great sensation; they have already given three concerts, all bumpers; indeed, there is not in Vienna a room sufficiently large to hold all those who apply for tickets to hear those truly wonderful infantine prodigies. We have heard, within the last few days, of the success of a Miss Mabilde at Ghent. Miss Mabilde is in reality the same Miss Flamand, the pupil of Bandérali, who turned the heads of our Belgian neighbours last year.

The noble art of sculpture seems to be recovering in France, several large groups are being executed. Amongst others, Baron Bosio has nearly finished a most beautiful piece, representing "History presenting immortality to all the great men of all countries and all times." This group is intended to be placed on the grand staircase of the museum of Versailles.

The statue of Jeanne d'Arc, about to be placed at Domremy, near Orleans, the place of her birth, is spoken of as a chef d'œuvre. The Napoleon mansolemn, after much intrigue, &c., is at length ordered to be brought out as

THE CONSERVATORY AT CHISWICK GARDENS.

EXHIBITION OF THE HORTICULTURAL SOCIETY.

The first or spring show of fruits, flowers, &c. for the present year took place on Saturday, at the gardens of the Horticultural Society, at Chiswick. Throughout the day the avenue by which the gardens are approached from the high road at Turnham-green was crowded with carriages; and the effect on entering the gardens crowded as they were, was, too, very refreshing, the noiseless foot, falls being a welcome relief to the clatter of carriage wheels. Since last season the piece of water nearly facing the council-room has been filled in. Our first engraving has been sketched from the east end of the splendid conservatory, which is 184 feet long, 25 feet high, and about 30 feet wide: within is an atmosphere of delicious perfume, which attracted crowds of promenaders.

The third engraving shows the interior of the principal or iron tent, with the mode of exhibiting the flowers.

This tent, by the way, is of beautiful construction; the framework of the roof and the supporting columns are of metal-work; the covering is of fine canvass, prepared with Burnete's preservative, and the edges are scolloped and bound with bright red; and when crowded with company in elegant morning dress, the effect was truly delightful.

The exhibition was attended by several thousand people of rank and fashion, and by the admirers of horticultural produce. The arrangements for the fête were very good; the marquees and the stands for the flowers and plants placed beneath them were arranged in an improved manner. There was plenty of room for all the company, and no crowding of the specimens, so as to conceal or neutralize their beauties. The pelargoniums were very splendid, and so were the collections of Cape heaths and orchidaceous plants. The roses were not of the first class; indeed, it was not considered by the judges who awarded the prizes that any collection of roses was entitled to a gold medal. The fruits were very superb, more particularly the strawberries and grapes.

The general appearance of the gardens was very beautiful, and showed to what perfection horticulture has been brought in this country by the industry, enterprise, and scientific knowledge of late years applied to its pursuit. The trees were in the most healthy state of vegetation, and the turf was as fresh and green as the utmost efforts of art, combined with the benignity of nature, could produce. The promenade was, as on former occasions, rendered more agreeable by the music of the bands of the Grenadier and Coldstream Guards and the band of the Horse Guards (Blue). Some very delightful pieces of concerted music were executed. The Duchess of Gloucester was the only member of the royal family who honoured the gardens with her presence; there were, however, present a vast number of the nobility and aristocracy. The following is the award of the gold and larger silver medals: the smaller medals and the certificates were very numerous, but not of sufficient importance to be specifically set forth:—

THE HANWELL ASYLUM.

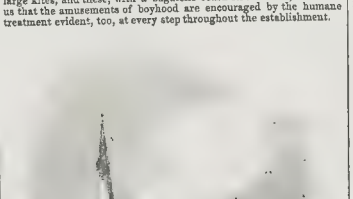
FANCY FAIR AT HANWELL LUNATIC ASYLUM.

A bazaar, or sale of fancy work manufactured by patients of the Hanwell Asylum, was held on Wednesday, within one of the wards of the hospital. Its projectors had a twofold object in view. The first was to afford the public an opportunity of seeing the asylum, and to impress upon them by the works exhibited, and the general arrangements of the place, how greatly the condition of the insane may be ameliorated, and their faculties rendered useful by kind care and judicious treatment. The second intention of the meeting was to obtain the aid of the visitors to the admirable charity for the relief of convalescent patients known as the "Queen Adelaide Fund." Unfortunately, the day turned out very wet, and the fête was shorn of many of its attractions. Notwithstanding, however, this circumstance, several hundred persons visited the asylum during the day. For a short period the sun shed its enlivening rays upon the asylum, and a number of elegantly-dressed ladies were seen promenading the grounds in various directions. The band of the 13th Light Dragoons was stationed on the lawn immediately facing the front entrance to the asylum, and during the day performed many select pieces of music. The wards of the institution, in which, owing to the wet weather, the bazaar was held, were festooned with wreaths of laurels intermingled with lilacs. With one or two exceptions, no patients were permitted to be seen within the wards. A number of male and female lunatics were, however, perambulating the most unfrequented parts of the ground under the surveillance of keepers. The bazaar during the greater portion of the day was crowded with visitors. The articles exhibited for sale were the bonâ fide productions of the patients, and appeared to give great satisfaction to the company. Mr. Serjeant Adams, the chairman of the visiting justices, and Mr. Pownall, were extremely kind and attentive to the visitors, pointing out to them everything that was worthy of observation. In the evening, after the stalls had been cleared, about two hundred of the female patients were regaled with tea and cake in the ornamented wards, and passed apparently a pleasant hour in singing and other recreations. It was anticipated that her Majesty the Queen Dowager, who is the patroness of the Adelaide Fund, would have paid the asylum a visit; but we learn that, being unable to do so, her Majesty, with that kind feeling by which she is ever actuated, forwarded the sum of £20 to the venerable widow of the founder of the fund, Mrs. Clitherow, of Boston House, New Brentford, by whom it was expended at the sales.

Judging this to be a fit occasion to introduce our readers to the internal economy of this establishment, we inspected the whole a few days previous to the above fête, as well as on that occasion; and we trust the result of our visit will be acceptable. For facility of access, and some interesting facts, we are indebted to the courtesy of Dr. Davy, one of the medical officers of the institution.

The asylum and its appurtenances occupy upwards of 53 acres, on the upper side of the picturesque valley of the Brent, immediately to the left of the Uxbridge-road, and within a short distance of the stupendous Wharncliffe viaduct and Hanwell station of the Great Western Railway. The entrance to the asylum premises is beneath a lofty archway, of bold design, flanked by a lodge, counting-house, &c. We proceeded through the shrubberies, nearly four acres in extent; to the left lies the large western, or female airing ground, with a summer-house; and to the right the large eastern, or male airing ground, with a bowling-green. In the former several patients were enjoying recreation and exercise; we learned that this salutary freedom is seldom abused, for it rarely happens that a plant or shrub is wilfully injured. This ground has lately been given up to the patients, and the levelling and laying out of the two divisions occupied many of the male patients for a considerable period; and the cheerful aspect of the front of the asylum has been very much increased by this alteration.

Our engraving, or bird's-eye view, conveys an accurate idea of the form and arrangement of nearly the entire buildings. They occupy three sides of a large space, nearly a quadrangle; and they have lately been enlarged by the addition of wings. The structure is of brick, and simple in plan; the only attempt at ornament being in three octagonal towers: the central tower is occupied by Dr. Connolly, the resident physician, and by the matron. It may be sufficient to state that the western wing is occupied by female, and the eastern wing by male patients, classified in wards, according to the extent of their affliction. In the centre tower ward is the bazaar-room, wherein articles of fancy work, made by the better class of female patients, are exposed for sale; the produce being expended in the purchase of small articles, contributing to the comfort of the female patients, but which are not strictly within the expences payable out of the county rate. In this wing, also, is the chapel, wherein morning and evening prayers are daily read; and on Sunday's Divine service is performed, the congregation usually amounting to upwards of 300 patients. The organ was purchased out of the proceeds of the sale of fancy work made by the patients; and on Thursday evenings a performance of sacred music takes place in the chapel, at which from 100 to 300 patients are present. In both wings we were much struck with the system of prevention carried out by means too numerous to detail; among them are the large mattresses and padded rooms used for epileptic patients who fall out of bed; these rooms are also used for the temporary seclusion of patients while labouring under maniacal paroxysms. We saw several of the female patients employed in the wash-house, drying-room, laundry, and store-room, with sane superintendents and assistants; and it was extremely difficult to distinguish the former from the latter: amongst all reigned the utmost order and quiet. It was a bright sunny morning, and few male patients were in the wards: they were amusing themselves after their own taste—some with newspapers and cheap periodical publications, others with draughts or cards, and a party were playing at cribbage with high proficiency. Another might be seen poring over minute calculations; and we were surprised to learn that the figures of more than one patient were invariably correct, though when he explained their import his statements were a strange jumble of fact and fiction. On the walls of the department wherein we saw this calculator hung two large kites, and these, with a bagatelle-board on the table, reminded us that the amusements of boyhood are encouraged by the humane treatment evident, too, at every step throughout the establishment.



HANWELL CHURCH.

Meanwhile the system of employment is not forgotten; in the kitchen and sculleries, all at work were patients, except the cook, two kitchen-maids, and a dairy-maid; and these offices were models of cleanliness and order, such as we rarely see equalled. The kitchen is lofty and large, and well appointed, and some patients were here making bread. In the courtyard patients were also employed in the coir and upholstery room, the steward's store-room, the brewhouse, and bakehouse; in two large rooms several tailors and shoemakers were busily at work, and their methodical industry was surprising, the only deviation being in one of the schneiders explaining with archness and wrath the origin of the saying, "nine tailors make a man," much to the edification of one of the visiting party. In the steward's store-room are shown the dresses and other contrivances which have been introduced into the asylum in lieu of mechanical restraint.

We likewise saw patients employed in the garden, the farm-yard, carpenters' and smiths' shops. The coal-wharf has a basin communicating with the Grand Junction Canal in the rear of the grounds—so that coal-barges are unloaded on the premises. From the canal the establishment is at present supplied with water at a heavy annual cost; but an Artesian well, 260 feet deep, has been just bored on the premises, at an expense of £8,000.

The arrangements of the airing courts will be best understood by reference to the engraving. One of these courts, on the male side, has been principally planted, and is entirely kept in order by a patient, who is a gardener, and its appearance is superior to that of the rest.

Those who have had the most frequent opportunities of seeing the insane in the barren and dismal courts and yards usually allotted to them for exercise in asylums, a few years ago, can best appreciate the advantage of the present arrangements. The inducement offered by them to the listless and melancholic, to walk out of doors, is found to be in itself a valuable effect of these changes. To some of them, the large rocking-horses, so constructed that five persons can ride safely on each at one time, and one or two of which are supplied to each airing court, offer the means of amusement, exercise, and, it may almost be said, of an alleviation of their malady; some of the patients evidently forgetting their troubles and irritations when taking this kind of exercise, and some being rocked thus to sleep. Under the large shades erected to screen them from the sun, some of the male patients are generally to be seen sitting, reading newspapers, or smoking and conversing. The female patients often take their needle-work out, and thus enjoy the open air and the shade without being unoccupied.

Far is it from our wish to indulge any morbid curiosity as to the habits of the inmates of this asylum; but we could not refrain copying the following lines from the wall of one of the patients' sleeping apartments:—

"Behold!
No gloomy cell, where sullen madness pines,
In chains and woe, where no glad sunlight shines;
But here kind sympathy for fallen reason reigns,
Our rule is gentleness, not force or galling chains."

These lines literally bespeak the excellent system pursued at the Hanwell Asylum. They were written by a patient of considerable intellectual attainments, but not the occupant of the sleeping-room, As is a pet lunatic, who attracted much attention at the fête on Wednesday: he was dressed in a mixed costume, crowned with a motley cap, bedizened with various-coloured ribands. This patient has been confined in the hospital for a period of twelve years. He is most loquacious and full of fun. He tells the story of his life with evident self-complacency. His name is William Rayner. For a number of years he was the harlequin, and his wife the columbine, at Covent-garden Theatre. He commenced his career in the character of Punch. After the death of his wife he, to use his own phraseology, "took to fretting," and was brought to Hanwell. His long residence within this establishment, and his constant association with lunatics, have not in the slightest degree affected his animal spirits. On the faintest hint he is prepared to cut his capers o'er again, and to show what he could do in early life to amuse the "quality" on the boards of Covent-garden Theatre. "Supposing," said he, addressing himself to the company who surrounded him, "this to be the green curtain; it rises. I advance to the footlights and make a bow to the quality. I then go so (cutting a most ludicrous caper), and then so" (attempting a most insane pirouette), at the conclusion of which he bursts out into a most immoderate fit of laughter, making the ward ring again with its merry peal.

His chamber is, as the Times states, a perfect bijou; the walls are nearly covered with coloured prints, and around, on shelves, are stuffed birds, shells, and nicnacs, set out with extraordinary regularity, the disturbance of which would greatly irritate the owner.

We had almost forgot to mention the burial-ground, on the south side of the garden, wherein all patients, not removed by their friends or parishes, are buried; and here lies the individual who planned the asylum, and eventually became one of its inmates!

The number of patients at present in the asylum is 566 females and 412 males; total, 978.

On the opposite side of the Wharncliffe Viaduct, and a short distance from it, the church represented in the annexed engraving has just been erected for the parish of Hanwell, from the designs of Messrs. Scott and Moffatt, of Spring Gardens. The old church was a plain brick building of the most ordinary character, erected about forty years since, and was very insufficient for the uses of the parish. The new structure is in the early English style, with a tower and spire; the material is chiefly flint and stone, which presents rather an agreeable variety of tints. It is hoped that a chancel will eventually be added, which will greatly add to the completeness and proportion of the building; but was omitted in the first instance on account of the funds being very limited, and the extent of the burial-ground being such as to render any considerable encroachment objectionable.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON, SATURDAY, MAY 20, 1843.

It is with sincere pleasure that we congratulate the country upon the defeat of Mr. Cumming Bruce, in his endeavour to render inefficient, and indeed to postpone entirely the benefit of, one of the best and most humane clauses of Lord Ashley's bill of last session, passed for the relief of the population in the colliery districts. It will be in the memory of our readers how terrible and revolting was the exposure of the mine and colliery slavery—how it was confined to no age or sex, or condition of weakness or infirmity—how it was visited upon debilitated men, enfeebled youth, delicate trailing women, and children of deformed bodies and stunted growth—how it cursed its victims with mental and bodily prostration, and demoralized in character while it decayed in strength—how, in a word, it fixed its loathesomeness upon the public mind and heart, until the sight of the monster was no longer endurable, until shuddering humanity raised its cry for pity, and an almost unanimous Legislature interfered to put it down. Lord Ashley's spirited conduct in originating the mitigation of that fearful slavery, and, indeed, the destruction of its most hideous forms, won for him—as did his endeavours in favour of the factory children—a dear and far-spread fame, and every charitable Christian soul the boon that was bestowed upon the long unhappy labourers with the purest satisfaction and delight. The better feelings of the heart were enlisted and warmed over the subject, and the glow of pleasureable feeling was unalloyed in the breast of every virtuous member of the great community. Nevertheless it was predicted that avaricious endeavour to step in with its corrupt influences to weaken the excellence of the measure, and to seek to maintain some of the worst abuses of the former cruel system; and the prophecy which thus foreboded has not proved false. Mr. Cumming Bruce, as the mouthpiece of one section of the owners and workers of mines, has this week attempted to mar one of the most natural and beautiful features of the Ashley Bill—that which enfranchised the female youth of the various districts for ever from their former horrid course of life—horrid as regarded its bodily endurance and its moral wretchedness alike—and forbade that unholy prostitution which so largely and lamentably prevailed—of youth and beauty to unnatural toil—of virtue to unnatural licentiousness. Mr. Cumming Bruce sought to virtually abrogate this protecting clause, by deferring its operation for a few years to come, and still permitting unmarried females to hire themselves to the same torturing and afflicting degradation which they were once forced to endure, and of which the exposure had so recently aroused the shame, repugnance, and anger of all professing Christians. It is to the honour of the British House of Commons that we have to record the signal defeat of Mr. Bruce, and the mercenaries and sophists who voted with him, by a majority of 137 to 89, a majority triumphant for the cause of morality and humanity alike.

One of the pet arguments of the "twenty-three" was the casuistical one that young women had a right to labour at that dreadful vocation—or, indeed, at any other—after they had attained the age when reason and reflection are supposed to endow the judgment with a responsibility of its own, and to make them free agents in the social world. So that, were this doctrine admitted, every means might be adopted to drive the poor wretches to follow a dreadful calling, and the words "voluntary engagement" be made available to cover all the sin and tyranny and misery endured under the self-responsibility which they would pre-suppose. As if, in truth and nature, young girls would ever choose of free will any such dreadful alternatives—as if any other plea than that of stern and starving necessity could excuse it, even to themselves. The Times has well treated this part of the subject in reference to its amelioration under the recent law:—

The present lack of employment was pressed as aggravating the cruelty of precluding females from their accustomed labour. It must be remembered however, that this fact may be placed in a very different aspect. No means of employment are excluded by the late bill. The same quantity of coal will still be used, and must be still dug out of the pit. But for this work men instead of women must now be employed, as they always ought to have been. What one set of labourers the other will not be put to the pit's mouth being only this, that the coalowner will have to pay higher wages for his labour. It suits the coal masters to parade the number of destitute women who are driven from their employment by the operation of the law; and their purpose to remember the destitute workmen who have now found a more congenial livelihood by taking their place, still less to recol ect that the superiority of male labour consists chiefly in its taxing the stronger sinews of their unhappy countrywomen doubly and trebly inexcusable.

So much for the differences of labour, and the variations of sympathy between those who care for the labourers and those who care for themselves. But even the heartless doctrines of political economy could not justify the arguments of Mr. Cumming Bruce in favour of delay in the operation of Lord Ashley's clause.

We have accomplished our object—the enfranchisement of Scotch and English females from the cruel bondage in which they were held. We have also incurred the dreaded evil—the distress resulting from the displacement of female labour. The females themselves must be, though perhaps slowly, finding for themselves fresh means of support. Their distress must be, to some considerable extent, already filled by male labourers. The shock to labour has been given, and matters are now in process of adjustment. We are called upon to advance our steps—again to disturb the course of labour which would otherwise be now determined—and all for the sake, or at least with the necessary result, of having, at the expiration of the "three, four, or five years'" respite, a second edition of the crisis (if crisis it is to be called) which we have now once gone through, and of enabling men who have shown themselves so disgracefully reckless of the well-being of their labourers to evade, almost as effectually, the provisions of the law which was passed to meet their negligence or selfishness. Nor is it consoling to observe, that one of the most obvious modes of such evasion will consist in the substitution of concubinage for marriage among the female labourers.

But, no: English feeling will not respond to such cold-blooded endeavours to mar the beauty of a benevolent act; English charity repudiates the heartlessness of such a proposition; and the Christian spirit of Parliament, exercising a fair and bright wisdom, has crushed the bad ambition of continuing young women in a wretched slavery with a virtuous determination which we are proud to applaud.

On Tuesday last Mr. Hugh Williams, brother of Sir John Kaye Williams, Bart., of South Wales, was married at St. Martin's Church to Miss Williams Wynn, only daughter of the late baronet of that name. The ceremony was performed by the Lord Bishop of Carlisle, and the bride was given away by her brother. A great number of the nobility were present at the ceremony. On leaving the church the party proceeded to Northington, land-house where a sumptuous déjeûner was set out in the principal dining room; and, half an hour after mid-day, the happy couple left town in a new travelling carriage and four, to proceed by railroad to Compton Verney, near Stratford-upon-Avon, in Warwickshire, to pass the honeymoon at the mansion of Lord Willoughby de Broke, their relative.

THE KING OF HANOVER.—We understand his Majesty, according to present arrangements, is expected to arrive at Kew Palace on the 27th inst. from Germany, and, in accordance with a wish expressed by the King, he will be received as Duke of Cumberland, and not as King of Hanover; and his Majesty will be, consequently, addressed as one of the royal dukes. The Duke of Cambridge will give up the King's mansion at Kew, which his Royal Highness has occupied since his Majesty's accession in 1837. The King, we understand, will give a series of sumptuous banquets during his stay in this country, having engaged the services of a celebrated chef de cuisine, lately belonging to the royal household; and it is expected that his Majesty will give away his illustrious niece the Princess Augusta, at her marriage with the Hereditary Grand Duke of Mecklenburgh-Strelitz. Some of his Majesty's domestics, and the service of massive silver plate, have already arrived, and a new town carriage is building for him. The King, who will complete his seventy-second year on the 5th of the ensuing month, is in good health.

POSTSCRIPT.

Friday Evening.

DEPARTURE OF THE COURT FOR CLAREMONT.—Her Majesty and Prince Albert, accompanied by their Royal Highnesses the Prince of Wales and the Princess Royal, leave Buckingham Palace to-morrow (Saturday) afternoon, for Claremont. It is expected that the Court will be absent about ten days, when her Majesty will return to Buckingham Palace, and remain till within a few days of Ascot Races.

ATTEMPT TO ASSASSINATE A CLERGYMAN.—A diabolical attempt to assassinate the Rev. Thomas Page, the officiating minister of Christchurch, close to Windsor Great Park, was made a few nights ago. The perpetrators of the outrage remain for the present undiscovered. A few nights ago, as the rev. gentleman and his wife were retiring to rest, and at the moment when Mr. Page had approached the writing-table, at the window of his bedroom, to extinguish the light, a loaded pistol was discharged at him from the garden, and (from the sound) evidently at but a short distance from the house. Upon examining the window, a large ball was discovered lodged in the woodwork which divided the sashes, and in the direction of the spot where the rev. gentleman was standing. A portion of the glass was broken, and the twisted fragments knocked inwards. A public meeting of the inhabitants of Reading (in which parish the new church is situated) was immediately afterwards convened, for the purpose of taking the circumstance into their serious consideration, and the necessary measures to lead to the discovery of the perpetrators of the outrage. At the meeting a large sum was subscribed as a reward for the discovery of the assassin.

For the first time since the equestrian statue was publicly celebrated in the town of Aylesbury on Sunday last.

Sir Robert and Lady Peel, the Bishop of Rochester, the Earl and Countess Grosvenor, the Duke and Duchess of Bedford, and Lord Brougham attended Divine service at the Temple Church, on Sunday morning, and heard an eloquent sermon from the master of the Temple.—Her Majesty, the Queen Dowager, had a private view of the Temple and church on Saturday.

The Marquis and Marchioness of Waterford are expected at the Clarendon Hotel, for the season, at the close of the ensuing week, from Curraghmore, as the noble marquis and all the leading sporting noblemen and gentlemen intend to be present at Epsom Races, which commence on Tuesday, the 30th inst.

THE AUSTRIAN EMBASSY.—We understand that his Excellency Baron Neumann, the Austrian Minister, has taken and will shortly remove to the Legation, will remove from Chandos House to a less spacious residence, early in the ensuing month, as the lease having expired it will be given up to the noble proprietor, the Duke of Buckingham, on Midsummer-day. Prince Esterhazy, the late ambassador, intends to fix his permanent residence at Vienna.

METROPOLITAN NEWS.

MASONIC ON DIT.—His Royal Highness the Prince Albert and his Royal Highness Prince George of Cambridge will be initiated into freemasonry on Saturday the 20th inst., in the Royal Alpha Lodge, Kensington Palace, at an especial meeting convened for the occasion.

CAMBRIDGE ELECTION COMMITTEE.—The members composing the committee assembled on Wednesday, consisting of the following gentlemen:—Sir. W. Heathcote, Chairman; J. Hardy, P. Scrope, T. W. Bramston, Lord Ingestre, Lord Howick, Sir. J. M'Taggart. Mr. Kingdake and Mr. Burdett appeared in support of the petition, complaining of the return of Mr. Kelly on the ground of bribery and of treating; and Mr. Austin, Mr. Cockburn, and Mr. Bidyard for the sitting member. After the preliminary matters had been disposed of, such as the adoption of a resolution relative to the names of the parties bribed, and the parties bribing them, being stated, and the necessity of witnesses being excluded during the investigation, except during their examination, Mr. Kingdake proceeded to open the case of the petitioners, and afterwards called the mayor and town-clerk of Cambridge, for the purpose of authenticating the poll-books, and other documents connected with the election. The Speaker having been announced to be at prayers, the committee adjourned on Thursday, the committee were occupied the entire day in hearing witnesses, no nothing of importance had transpired up until the hour of our journal out.

ROYAL COLLEGE OF SURGEONS IN LONDON.—At a general court of examiners held on Monday last, the following gentlemen obtained their diplomas:—Mr. F. Hetley, Mr. W. Hassell, Mr. Nash, Mr. S. Fenwick, Mr. J. Eddison, Mr. C. Brooking, Mr. W. Cayton, Mr. Barron, Mr. R. Bond, Mr. H. Watling, Mr. J. Sawyer, Mr. T. Fletcher, Mr. B. Pinchard, Mr. Hobbs, and Mr. F. Rose.

The closing meeting of the Anti-Corn-law conference took place at Herbert's Hotel, Palace-yard, on Tuesday last, when it was resolved to recommend to the League forthwith to commence a registration of the electors of the kingdom, in order to be prepared, at the earliest possible period, to call upon the Queen's advisers, through the constitutional means of a humble memorial to her Majesty, to dissolve the present Parliament, and thus afford to the constituency an opportunity of revising their late division upon the question of the Corn law. Several members of Parliament addressed the meeting, after which thanks were voted to Mr. Taylor, the chairman, and the conference was declared to be dissolved.

On Tuesday a numerous meeting of planters, merchants, and others interested in the British West India colonies was held at the Committee Room, St. James's-street, for the purpose of receiving certain resolutions recommended by the standing committee for the re-construction of the West India body. Alexander Grant, Esq., was called to the chair. George Samtsbury, Esq., read a series of resolutions, recommending the manner in which the society is to be re-formed, and providing for the election of the committee and other officers, the general meetings, and the rules of the society. On the motion of Charles Cave, Esq., seconded by W. Burge, Esq., the resolutions were unanimously adopted. Dr. Barnet remarked that he hoped the West India body would henceforth be more united. He could not forbear from assuring the meeting that the people of Jamaica had very little confidence in the society, arising from the want of unanimity. A committee of noblemen and gentlemen was elected for the ensuing year. A vote of thanks was passed to the chairman, and the meeting dispersed.

The general annual meeting of the National Society for promoting the education of the Poor in the Principles of the established Church was held on Wednesday in the central school-rooms, Sanctuary, Westminster. His Grace the Archbishop of Canterbury was in the chair, supported by a number of other dignitaries of the church and several noblemen. He could see the animation of the children, whose proficiency elicited the marked approbation of the meeting, and an expression of deep satisfaction on the part of his grace, the Rev. J. Sinclair read the annual report, which, on the motion of the Bishop of St. David's, seconded by Lord Radstock, was unanimously adopted.

Dog-stealing.—We are glad to perceive, by an advertisement which will be found in another column, that the nefarious traffic in dogs, which has been so long suffered to disgrace the metropolis, has at length attracted the attention of several benevolent individuals, who are about to bring the matter before the Legislature, with the view of procuring for the owners of these faithful domestic animals the same protection from stealing as is enjoyed by the proprietors of cows and horses, and every other description of valuable quadruped. The poor dog is frequently subjected to horrible privations by the thief who seeks to make a profit by his crime, either from the great value of the animal, or by working on those feelings which the attachment of man to a faithful companion has induced. It is well known that professional dog-stealers exist to an immense extent throughout the country, but chiefly in London; and we can see no reason why this description of felony should be treated with greater lenity than any other.

King's College Hospital.—The anniversary dinner, in aid of the funds of the hospital, took place yesterday at the Freemasons' Tavern, when upwards of 120 gentlemen assembled for the occasion. The chair was occupied by Alderman Copeland, who was supported by Vice-Chancellor Knight, Archdeacon Lonsdale, the Principal of King's College, and several other gentlemen who are connected with this charitable institution. After the customary toasts, the secretary read the report, which showed a liberal list of subscriptions, amounting to upwards of £1000.

Queen's Prison.—The recent introduction of the stringent regulations ordered by Sir James Graham for the government of the Queen's prison has already been productive of some effect. Within the last week or two several insolvents, who have been in prison for considerable periods, varying from fifteen years, have applied to the Insolvent Debtors' Court for relief, and it is expected that insolvents will not now remain in custody longer than necessary, there being a separate place of confinement to be allotted to prisoners who will not file schedule.

The Weather.—On Wednesday morning about nine o'clock the metropolis was visited by a fog of remarkable density, which was accompanied by a very heavy fall of rain. The streets in many parts were for a considerable time overflowing with water, while the darkness was so great that in several shops the gas was lighted. The wind was at the time about south east. The previous evening, shortly before dusk, there was also a very thick fog down the river.

Extensive Damage to the Stone Pier at Greenwich.—On Tuesday morning last the inhabitants in the vicinity of the stone pier at Greenwich were startled by a loud report like the explosion of a piece of artillery, succeeded, within a few seconds, by the announcement that the pier was falling. Several people were on the pier at the time it gave way, and others saw the large mass which is moored in front, who were in a state of great consternation. From the best examination that can be made, the damage has extended itself to at least three fifths of the entire length, which is 320 feet; and to the depth, from the bottom of the piles, 80 feet. The cause, which created the alarm occurred through the springing of one of the immense piles which are in front of the pier and support the brickwork and masonry, to which they are clasped by bars of iron, let into the stone-work. The heavy masses which are on the top of the brickwork, into which the massive iron railings and posts are sunk, have cracked, burst, and sunk in every direction, whilst the greater part of the granite presents large and deep rending fissures, the stone pavement, &c., having also sunk in curves. The cost of the erection of the pier was about £30,000, and it was only completed about three years ago. It is estimated that the repairs will cost at least half that sum.

NATIONAL SPORTS.

THE TURF.

The season in which our popular pastimes offer the greatest amount of attraction to the greatest number of persons has set in with a flood-tide, and yet, for the diversion in our eternal city and its vicinity (which means the circle of a hundred miles around it), there is but one all-engrossing object. Want the Olympic games were to the ancient Greeks Epsom races are to modern—that is, as to pre-eminence and universality of popular interest. For that reason we set ourselves especially to shadow their coming events—sailing, rowing, cricket, and pigeon-shooting (ignes plenis) notwithstanding. It must be confessed that, as the early heating of the spring has gone, it holds out little promise of any extraordinary performances for the remainder of the year, in reference to the three-year-old stock, always the stars of the season. Some amateurs, however, are disposed to take a hopeful view upon the principle which assumes "the more mischief the better sport.' That there will be mischief, and enough of it to gist the most greedy, one has no right to doubt. The last Epsom Spring Meeting was a complete jubilee of gentlemen sportsmen, and, coupled with the doses exhibited at Chester, if that to be decided on the last day of this current May don't clean out another considerable body, it will be because certain persons do intend their physic a luck. Reserving for our next number the programme of the four days' gaia to be held on the Surrey downs, we catch the present opportunity of counselling those who propose to take their pleasure thereat how such end may best be provided for.

Man is said to be a thinking animal—the Englishman belongs to that class of the genus of his evinces its instinct in speculation. We are all gamblers—that is the fact; whether politics or prick in the loop, we all play for pay or pastime. Therefore the Derby is a great Mercury-send, seeing it is a betting scramble, in which there is no distinction of persons or pursuits, the throne of every man being to enjoy himself, and ship his neighbour of his worldly goods (the common go ne of life, only it is played at Epsom without any pretence to the "Rules"). Let gentlemen-racers freebooters find honest men (or pillaged persons of substance, which is the same thing) there across a great outcry; and it was foretold, so nice would be precaution for the future, that the right hand would be chary how it booked bets with the left. This was the rumour—the truth is, that there never was such reckless speculation as there has been since the crash on the Derby of 1840! A British Parliament has been split upon an amount that the Chancellor of the Exchequer could not satisfy. Let him win, and if a thousand per cent. of the losses be paid, the age of miracles will have come again. Cotherstone must also be a winner. During a long period he was regularly backed at 40 to 1; and what sort of a predicament are they in who were compelled to hedge at 9 to 4? These two horses are the great guns of the lot, and should they "go off" and steadily, it will be a pretty scramble, if it be not a free straig .t, what lame legs there will be among the wounded! To those who desire to lay out a trifle on the Derby in the coming week, our advice would be, to back the odds against the field, fourth, fifth, sixth, and seventh, as they are given in the odds: let what may win, there will be profitable hedging to more than one of them. The field for the Oaks should not yet be backed, in the day there will be very short odds against one (query: the Day -Maria), and it is always good betting to lay a few pounds of odds on an Oaks field—that is beyond a question. The latest betting on the Derby we subjoin. There has been very little done on the Oaks since the commencement of the past week.

The Derby.—1100 to 500 agst Cotherstone, taken; 6 to 1 agst A British Yeoman; 7 to 1 agst Arastides, taken; 10 to 1 agst Gamecock; 30 to 1 agst Parthian; 25 to 1 agst Newcourt, taken; 35 to 1 agst Progress Colt, taken; 40 to 1 agst Dampling, taken; 50 to 1 agst Gorhambury, taken; 66 to 1 agst Locetta Colt, taken; 1000 to 15 agst Pickpocket, taken.

COUNTRY NEWS.

Liverpool.—Another Fire in Formby-street.—This street, it will be remembered, was the focus of the memorable fire which occurred in Liverpool last September. At one o'clock on Saturday morning last the policeman on duty in the neighbourhood discovered a fire on the premises belonging to Messrs. Aslbury and Gunn, packing-boxmakers, on the south side of Formby street, and adjoining the west wall of the fireproof warehouses that were preserved from destruction by the great fire in September last. The intelligence was quickly conveyed to the fire police station, to Mr. Maxwell, and other gentlemen whose presence was desirable; and Mr. Hewitt, Mr. Quirk, and other superintendents, with an adequate force of the fire-police, fire-engines, and water-carts were quickly on the spot. Mr Maxwell and several other gentlemen were also in attendance, and rendered all possible assistance. The greatest activity was displayed by all parties, and the utmost exertion employed; but, from the start the fire obtained, and from the nature of the premises, being the smithy, carpenters' shops, &c., surrounded by piles of dry planks, the fire had assumed an alarming appearance, and had nigh competed the destruction of the premises wherein it originated before the engines could be got effectually into play. The windows and doors were burnt out, the interior partly gutted, and a quantity of wood destroyed, before a sufficiency of water could be obtained. However, some hoses were passed through the dock wall, and planted in the dock with great alacrity, and in a few minutes after the engines got into full play on its fury was considerably abated; and by two o'clock there was no longer any fear that it would extend beyond the premises it had first taken possession of, and which were now nearly demolished. The engines, however, were kept vigorously at work for nearly an hour after words.

Liverpool.—John Leeming, a clerk in the Liverpool Post-office, remanded since Tuesday se'nnight, under a charge of having stolen letters in the Liverpool Post-office, was again placed at the bar at the public office on Tuesday last. It appears that the prisoner had been a clerk in the Post-office only nine months, and during the whole of that period he has been in the habit of purloining letters containing bills of exchange, jewellery, money, &c. He has taken accepted bills to a great amount, but it does not appear that he had ever negotiate one of them. The cases against the prisoner are numerous; but only four, which are very clear, will be selected as the grounds of indictment. The prisoner was committed for trial at the next assizes.

Macclesfield.—For some months back a great many of the poorer classes of the inhabitants of Macclesfield and its populous vicinity have been absolutely suffering for the want of the commonest necessaries of life, which recently discovered in that locality. Immense quantities of large oak trees are dug up daily; indeed the apparent quantity of timber already discovered is rather singular. A large piece of oak, squared, and otherwise bearing marks of human implements, excites intense curiosity.

Murderous Outrage at Manchester.—Several Persons Shot.—We regret to state that a most determined, bold, and fearful outrage took place in the neighbourhood of Manchester, on Tuesday night, at a brick croft belonging to Messrs. Pauling and Hendry, when upwards of 300 armed men—turn-outs—invaded the premises, when they were met by about a dozen watchmen, who were also armed. A deadly conflict ensued, which lasted for a quarter of an hour, the firing on both sides being conducted with the greatest rapidity and precision. Several of the assailing mob have been since arrested; but the dead, if any, were carried clear off.

The Potteries.—The colliers in the employ of Mr. Spatrow, of Longton, and who, it will be recollected, left their work in the latter part of January, have again, in consequence of a reduction in their wages of 3d. a day, ceased to work in the pits. A general meeting of the colliers of the neighbourhood was held in the Market-hall of Longton on the beginning of last week, and resolutions expressive of the determination of the men not to resume their employments, unless at the old prices, were unanimously adopted. An appeal was made to the colliers, the potters, and the inhabitants of the Pottery districts generally, for support in their resistance to the proposed reductions, and as far as can be judged from the apparent sympathy excited amongst the great body of the people, this appeal to their liberality will not be made in vain. At the first meeting the men assembled expressed their determination to maintain the public peace, and, as far as in them lay, prevent or suppress any violence being committed by the disaffected. The second meeting was characterised by a different feeling, many of the parties assembled exhibiting a disposition to carry their end by any means, however violent.

Stratford-upon Avon.—Visit of the Queen Dowager. On Monday afternoon the inhabitants of the ancient and pleasant little town of Stratford-upon-Avon were not a little surprised by the sudden arrival and hasty visit of the Queen Dowager and her royal suite. Her Majesty, Earl Howe, attendants, and domestics travelled in two carriages-and-four, and arrived at the Old Lion Inn, Stratford, from the Coventry station, shortly before three o'clock. So soon as the report spread through the town that the Queen Dowager was hourly expected the inhabitants, from the highest to the lowest rank, prepared to receive her Majesty with every mark of honour due to her exalted rank and individual worth. On her Majesty entering the town, innumerable flags floated from the most commanding eminences, the church bells rang merry peals, and many hundreds of persons assembled to give the widowed Queen a truly hearty English welcome. After the Queen Dowager had partaken of slight refreshment, her Majesty, accompanied by Earl Howe and other members of her suite, proceeded to view the venerable church, upon which £8000 has recently been expended in repairs, and which contains the remains and tomb of Shakspere, an engraving of which we gave in our 2nd volume. Her Majesty was politely conducted to the north door, where the company was assembled to receive the Queen in the interior of the church, and the organist, during her visit within the sacred edifice, performed several appropriate airs on the organ. The royal party afterwards paid a short visit to the Rev. Mr. Clayton, the rector, and then returned to the Lion Hotel, where they dined and slept. On Tuesday morning her Majesty and part of her suite left Stratford-upon-Avon about 9 o'clock for Eagley Hall, where they arrived shortly before 9. It appears that, for a year or two past, her Majesty, in consequence, it is said, of medical advice, has contemplated, for a short, if not a long period, the occupation of Eagley Hall, for a considerable period of his life the favourite seat of the late Marquis of Hertford, when Lord Yarmouth. Its central situation, magnificent house and grounds, and the luxuriant country by which it is surrounded, combined with its proximity to some of the most delightful summer retreats in the midland districts of England, render Eagley one of the most splendid residences in the country. The visit was most welcome to the inhabitants of Alcester, about a mile distant from the hall, and who, as may be reasonably expected, fondly hope her Majesty may at once determine to become their royal neighbour.

LAW INTELLIGENCE.

COURT OF EXCHEQUER.—Monday, May 15.

(Sittings at Nisi Prius, before Baron Rolfe and a special Jury.)

The Attorney General v. Charles Canty and Co.

The trial of the informations, at the suit of the Customs Department, in connection with the frauds lately discovered, and recorded on Saturday last. The Attorney-General, with Messrs. Jervis and Wilde, appeared for the crown, and Sir T. Wilde, with Messrs. Kelly, Theaiger, Joy, and Atherton, for the defendants. The informers, ought to be full of the case charged. The firm of Canty and Co., who are extensive silk importers, carrying on business in Watling-street, with receiving two cases of silk on the 3rd of July, 1846, and three other cases on the 14th of January, 1847, which, upon examination, fell short in the amount of duty. It clearly appeared, from the evidence of the witnesses produced on the part of the crown, that the cases in question were consigned to the defendants, and arrived by the French steamer Phœnix, from Havre. They were landed, in the first instance, at Galley Quay; and after being duly examined by one of the Custom-house officers, were carried to the defendants' premises. The defendants employed as their Custom-house agent a person named Lumley, who had under him a clerk named Hunt, who attended to the Custom-house business, and in whose presence the goods in question were measured, weighed, and valued. It seemed not a practice had for some time existed at the Custom-house of permitting the importers of silk goods to take them from the control of the customs' officers before the duty was actually paid. The goods in question were delivered to the defendants in this way before the amount of the duty was paid, but in a short time afterwards the amount of the estimated duty was actually paid by the defendants. The only question, therefore, was, whether the defendants, in paying the estimated duty, had paid that amount to which the crown was really entitled, or whether, by the connivance and neglect of the revenue officers, the duty had not been estimated at a much smaller sum than the defendants were really bound to pay. In order to explain to the jury the precise manner in which it was supposed the alleged fraud had been effected, several gentlemen, engaged in different departments of the Custom-house were called to prove the course of business in that establishment. Their evidence was generally to the same effect as that given by the following witnesses in the case of "The Attorney-General v. Hardy." It appeared that the landing waiter has a blue book entrusted to him, the threads of which are secured by a government seal, and each leaf stamped with a government stamp, and in this book, which will be a pretty good guide, it is his duty, in the presence of the agents for consigner and consignee, to take an account of the weight, value, and description of the goods so landed, and to return the book regularly to the inspector's desk. From the account thus entered in the duty afterwards ascertained, and a warrant made out for the delivery of the goods upon the payment of such duty. The blue books containing the landwaiter's entries, relating to the cases imported by the defendants in July and August, 1840, were produced, and evidence given to show that leaves were substituted for those which the books originally contained, and which original leaves, it was suggested, contained correct entries of the quantities of the goods imported by the defendants. Witnesses acquainted with the silk trade were also examined to prove that they had made experiments as to the quantity of manufactured silk which boxes of certain cubic dimensions contained, according to the usual mode of packing goods of this description.—The chief witness was a Custom-house officer named Burnley, who had turned approver. During his evidence the day became so far advanced that Baron Rolfe suggested the propriety of adjourning until next day. The case occupied also the entire of Tuesday, and did not conclude until eight o'clock. At that hour the jury returned. Sir Thomas Wilde having addressed the court for the defence), and, after an hour's deliberation, returned a verdict for the crown, estimating the value of the goods at £2000. The penalties to which the defendant is subject will therefore amount to £6000.

ACCIDENTS AND OFFENCES.

A youth, of frank and ingenuous appearance, slender make, dark hair and complexion, who is apparently about 17 years of age, has lately been pursuing an extensive course of deception, especially among clergymen, in London and its neighbourhood. He gives his name as R. M. Lowe, and professes to be the nephew of Mr. Foley, of Bristol, with the localities of which city he is evidently acquainted. He tells a plausible story of a quarrel with his uncle, which generally ends in the party applied to consenting to become a mediator; and in the meantime the imposter succeeds in obtaining a small supply of cash for present purposes.

It would appear from several reports of accidents which have reached us from various parts of the country during the past week that tandem-driving is again coming into vogue, and certainly a more dangerous amusement could hardly be revived. Inexperienced persons should be exceedingly cautious in the management of their horses.

THE GREAT ROOM OF THE ROYAL ACADEMY.

STAIRCASE TO THE EXHIBITION ROOMS.

No. 7. "Portrait of Lady Mary Viner and Son." J. Lucas. The grand deficiency of modern portraiture is found in a want of that vivid individuality which living originals always present. The picture before us is a partial exception to the remark; but not in a degree to command great praise. It is thinly but carefully painted; and the hands are drawn with more than usual accuracy.

8. "Portrait of H. R. H. the late Duke of Sussex." Schmidt. A hard and mean delineation of the most good-natured head in the world.

9. "Virgil's Bulls." J. Ward, R.A.

> The stooping warriors, aiming head to head,
> Engage their clashing horns with dreadful sound.

There is considerable vigour in the general conception and treatment of this picture, and it attracts a large measure of popular admiration. Its faults, however, are more than usually numerous: the drawing is bad, the texture of the bulls' hides more resembles the surface of an unwedgeable and gnarled oak than the soft and glossy skins of Juno's representatives; and the background is a reminiscence of the famous backgrounds of Ruben's Flemish landscapes. To see a Chillingham and Alderney bull in such a locality, is, to our minds, as offensive to good taste as it is opposed to geographical propriety.

11. "Study for a Head of Christ." M. Moore. A clever affectation of the old Italian masters. There are half a dozen similar heads dispersed through the rooms, and they evidence very considerable histrionic powers. But why should the artist waste his time on mere conceits?

14. "The Opening of the Wallhalla, 1842." J. M. W. Turner, R.A.

> The morning ray
> Beams on the Wallhalla, reared to science and the arts,
> And men renowned, of German fatherland.

This is a noble picture, full of the poetry of the art, and as light, as lustrous, as harmonious, as bright Italy itself. In the centre of the landscape stands the patriotic pile surrounded by glorious hills, and its foundations washed by a many-coloured flood. The foreground is occupied by a rejoicing multitude of peasants, who cheer the passing of a kingly boat, which is seen sweeping through the country, "stately and slow, and properly attended," on their way to "lift up the doors" of the peaceful temple. The spectacle is a sublime one, but it is not beyond our sympathies, for the poor of the people triumph in its presence. Mr. Turner, in dealing with this great subject, appears to have soared beyond his besetting sins, and for once to have kept within the limits of propriety. The melting of a morning mist in the rays of an unclouded sun, the dashing forth of a rapid stream from the smoothness of an even course, a foreground covered with pure white chalk, tinted with iron stains, are subjects which ordinarily tempt him to extravagance; and, as they all form principal elements in this picture, we feel that in holding them in due subserviency he has achieved a conquest over himself which it is very desirable for the credit of future works should be repeated.

While on the subject of this picture, we would recommend to the notice of artists—and especially young ones—the quality of Mr. Turner's colour, and the peculiar mode of applying them to the canvass. His pigments are generally very much diluted, and seem to be laid on the canvass, not in broad heavy flats of colour, but by a successive elaboration of touches, each one more delicate and slightly differing in tint from its predecessor. It is in this way, we believe, he has succeeded, beyond all other artists, in getting the atmosphere—the colour—the depth of nature itself into his pictures. Let any one compare the aerial tint in this picture with those of others in its immediate neighbourhood, and they will at once see and understand the difference.

15. "Her Majesty the Queen." Painted for the United Service Club. F. Grant, A. A portrait of our beloved Sovereign has yet to be painted. Notwithstanding the gracious opportunities she is known to afford to numerous artists, not only for the delineation of her features, but for the study of that habitual expression of confiding majesty by which they are so singularly characterized, no one has yet succeeded in making her the grateful return, or her people the acceptable present, of a faithful queen-like portrait. Mr. Grant's picture comes nearer the great desideratum than anything that has recently been attempted, and it bears internal evidence of capabilities which, had they been energetically used, would not have stopped short of its accomplishment. The great fault of the picture is a certain feebleness of drawing, colour, and expression, which seems to have arisen exclusively from a timid hand and a heart not quite in unison with the greatness of the occasion. It is a pleasing rather than impressive picture of the Queen. The original study, which we have seen, is of much higher character.

25. "Scenery on the river Teign, Devonshire." F. R. Lee, R.A. We fear that Mr. Lee is beginning to indulge himself in that fatal resting-place—the soft recumbency of a good name. He is getting careless and slovenly in his details and general treatment. The picture before us, although of a gallery size, is dashed off in the manner of the distemper-work of the stage; and, while it pleases as a masterly sketch of nature, leads us to regret that its author should have stopped short of its completion.

30. "The Graces: Psyche, and Cupid, as the personification of love, burning the arrows of destruction and trampling on the insignia of war. W. Etty, R.A. The painter of this picture has a genius of too high an order to admit of his works being passed over without especial notice; besides which, he is generally esteemed the only man of the present day who can paint the naked figure, and especially who can render with success the delicate beauty of the female form; he is, moreover, an academician; and, for all these reasons, we desire to see him produce works altogether worthy of his position, and which shall connect his name with future ages, and shed an additional lustre on this. To this end we would gladly commend to Mr. Etty's notice a picture of the same subject by Rubens, which is in the possession of E. Dennys, Esq., 87, Watling-street; a picture which is too little known, and which, if it were in a public collection, we could not too highly commend (especially as a piece of colouring) to the study of all artists who would attain to the highest excellence in that branch of the art of which this gem is so remarkable a specimen as an illustration of our remarks that we will venture to describe it.

SCULPTURE GALLERY.

Like Mr. Etty's "Graces," it is a cabinet picture, but so delicious in colour and execution that, acquainted as we are with it, we cannot help looking upon Mr. Etty's picture (which in many respects does not suffer by the comparison) as a mere sketch or memorandum of the artist's conception—a premier pensée—rather than a finished work. Rubens's picture is probably a finished sketch, painted after the life; and, perhaps, as regards form, with too much truthfulness to the models employed, which might, we think, have been with advantage of less unwieldy proportions, much as those proportions assist the beautiful swell of outline for which Rubens was so remarkable.

After the test of more than two centuries, the colours in this picture are as vivid as if just laid on; yet so delicate, so tender, so transparent, so harmonious, that the figures seem to live, and breathe, and have a being of their own. Each figure enjoys a separate existence, has its own peculiar character and individuality, and each (as should always be the case with a group of objects) gives and receives a value by contrast with the others: by these means a perfect and harmonious whole is produced. Nothing can be more simple than the composition of this picture. Three nude figures are standing on the clouds, with the sky for a background, and a little white drapery is used to give difference of texture and variety to the composition, and of these simple materials has Rubens produced a gem to which even "The Graces" of Raffaelle must yield the palm of superiority. The first impression made on the mind by this beautiful production is precisely similar to that which would be produced by looking on the same object in nature—the apparent absence of shadow, so little of strong darks are there in the picture, and so luminous and transparent are those which exist. The reflects, also, in this picture are wonderfully managed, whilst the difference of tint or constitutional complexion between the three figures is accomplished with such skill that one knows not whether to be more pleased with the art which dictated, or the delicacy of eye and hand which wrought, the miracle.

We could have wished that Rubens himself had painted more of his pictures in this manner, with this Correggio-like substantiality (for the colour is very thick) and attention to finish, which he for a short time only adopted after his visit to Italy. In this picture the presence everywhere of cool greys introduced with almost inimitable skill, is a remarkable characteristic, one in which, perhaps, more than in any other the English school is lamentably deficient. We have examined pictures of Mr. Etty's painted some years ago, which, like his pictures in the present exhibition, wanting these greys with the warmer tints, present to the eye an uniform, flat, leather-like appearance, than which nothing can be less natural, less pleasing, or less worthy of comparison with the great Fleming whose excellences we would fain see Mr. Etty rival.

There is also in this picture so much unaffected modesty, such a perfect unconsciousness of nudity, such a beauty of line, such a variety combined with simplicity in the composition, that it cannot be studied but with the utmost advantage by artists in general, nor could it be seen by a painter of Mr. Etty's great powers but with the happiest result; for it has excellences in which we are convinced Mr. Etty's otherwise delightful pieces are deficient, and in none more lamentably than in those of solidity of colour, delicacy of tint, luminosity of shadow, and attention to finish and detail, which, if Rubens and Raffaelle and Titian considered so essential to their fame, are surely circumstances which we think Mr. Etty cannot altogether afford to despise.

THE QUEEN.

31. "A Peasant Girl." C. U. Eddis. We have seen nothing since the works of Gainsborough which can at all compete with this beautiful picture for careful drawing, pure unexaggerated colouring, and exquisite delineation of character. It is the work, we believe, of a young man, who, two years ago, made some marvellous chalk drawings of the members of the Athenæum Club; and who, since that time, encouraged by their good opinion, has been sedulously engaged in works of the highest character.

37. "Mazorbo and Torcello, Gulf of Venice." C. Stanfield, R.A. In the composition of a picture, the art by which it is produced should be carefully concealed; but this principle, so necessary to the production of the simple, artless effects of nature, is too often disregarded by Mr. Stanfield; and his pictures, except those which are exclusively marine, are characterised by a cold but finished formality. The bay of Mazorbo, bounded by the distant mountains of Torcello, and enriched by the picturesque buildings of the commercial sovereigns of Venice, are here grouped together in what is in many respects a picture of the highest excellence. The objects are painted with wonderful clearness and precision; the drawing and perspective, while they evince almost mathematical accuracy, are nevertheless generalised and massed in the true spirit of a poetic painter—but still the breath of life is wanting: the threshold of supreme excellence is reached, and there the artist, like a wearied pilgrim, stops. Atmosphere, repose, and harmony are wanting. These capital deficiencies are very greatly heightened by a black boat, placed in the centre of the picture, for the purpose, apparently, of focalising the chiaroscuro of the picture, but which totally injures it as a piece of colour.

38. "Arabs seeking Treasure." W. Muller. There is a warmth and depth in this picture which give promise of future excellence. The repetitions—the pulsations—as it were of the torchlight, as it irradiates the "gloomy rendezvous" of buried Egypt, is very finely managed.

44. "The Bather." W. Etty, R.A. The remarks we have made on "The Graces" apply with equal force to this somewhat indelicate picture. The shadows are of a mighty genius; the subject must be eclipsed by the magnificence of its treatment before it can command the smallest admiration. And, as these great qualities have not been exerted by our painter, we feel deem such a performance from the gravest censure but the attributes to which they are wedded.

HAGAR AND ISHMAEL.

as these great qualities have not been exerted by our painter, we feel as these great qualities have not been exerted by our painter, we feel as though we strongly expressed our opinion of its demerits, we shall refrain from an analysis, and merely support our opinion, by referring to the disproportionate drawing of Aldobrandi, the principal figure, whose limbs belong in truth to a much more massive trunk than that

46. "Portrait of a Lady." G. Patten, A. The portraits of this gentleman exhibit a most commendable desire to attain an elevated style of art. Vandyke is evidently in his eye, and in nothing so much as the beautiful characteristic drawing of hands, which that great painter considered to be as essential to a good portrait as the face itself. Mr. Patten, however, will do well to avoid the greenish greys which he uses to melt his shadows into the general carnations.

53. "Ruins on the Island of Philoe, Nubia." D. Roberts, R.A. The grandeur of perpetual desolation is spread before us in this terrible landscape. "I will fill the valleys with thy height" was the awful doom pronounced by the tongue of prophecy against the "solemn temples" and the "gorgeous palaces" which once clustered the surface of this devoted island. Mr. Roberts has laboured in a kindred spirit with the sublime denunciations of Scripture, and has succeeded in producing a work which will confirm the faith of the Christian, as much as it will delight the taste of the connoisseur. Higher praise we cannot award.

54. "The Old Post-road." J. Creswick, A. A shaded, torrent-worn, lichen-covered nook, painted with a thorough knowledge of the subject, and a temperate use of its rich materials.

55. "Christ crowned with Thorns." W. E. Frost. An ill-assorted medley of heads and figures, extracted, without acknowledgment, from the best pictures of Raffaelle and Rubens. A head from Leonardo's "Last Supper," and a kneeling figure from Rubens's Antwerp "Ecce Homo," will be readily distinguished. Such a discreditable plagiarism should not have found place in the great room of the Academy.

60. "The Supposed Death of Imogen." W. J. Witherington, R.A.

Belarius. How found you him?

Arviragus. As you see:
Thus smiling, as some fly had tickled slumber.—Cymbeline.

Labour in vain—carefully, smoothly painted, but in its composition, telling too plainly of the lay figure, and the school of Westall, to please the artistic student of Shakspere.

61. "Portrait of the Countess Bective." H. W. Pickersgill, R.A. A picture of sterling excellence. The attitude is one of easy dignity, and strongly indicative of that graceful self-possession which, as a class, distinguishes the British aristocracy. Sir Joshua Reynolds was justly celebrated for the noble bearing of the many peerless dames he has given to posterity; and we rejoice to see that in Mr. Pickersgill he has an emulous if not an equal successor.

63. "Portrait of W. V. Langridge, Esq., of Lewes, Sussex." A. Rankley. A picture deserving a better place. There are, as all persons must be aware, great difficulties in the way of a just disposition of the vast number of portraits sent to the Academy for exhibition; the rooms are small, and the line, as it is called, is necessarily occupied by the "subject pictures," so that the academicians have little choice in determining their positions, and are often, we believe, compelled to place pictures out of sight which, had the Government provided them with suitable apartments, they would have been glad to have placed in more accessible situations. A series of chambers, of the size and length of Mr. Moxhay's Hall of Commerce, are required for the due exhibition of such pictures. Meantime a thousand paintings—the work of as many aching hearts—are annually rejected for want of room.

67. "Dante, accompanied by Virgil, in his descent to the Inferna, recognises his three countrymen Rustitucci, Aldobrandi, and Guido-guerri." G. Patten, A. A scene scarcely tolerable in written description, but almost impious in a picture. Nothing can re-

74. "The Queen receiving the Sacrament" (the concluding part of the ceremony of her Majesty's coronation). C. R. Leslie, R.A. The picture represents her Majesty habited in the Dalmatic mantle (the coronation robe), having taken off the crown on approaching the altar, and wearing no jewels. The choir is filled by the royal family, the ecclesiastical and noble attendants, &c. &c. It is one of great pretension and varied excellence. Many of the individual portraits are admirable, and the grouping of the host of lovely women who crowd the foreground has never been surpassed. But in spite of these captivating qualities, we cannot but regard the picture as an unsatisfactory representation of the greatest national solemnity of our venerable church. Where, we ask, is the grand religious sentiment, which bowed all hearts, as the sovereign, divested of her ornaments, knelt before the King of kings? It is not even attempted by the painter. On the contrary, the gay multitude are positively indifferent to the solemn sacrament, some are even turning their backs upon it, every one seems to be actuated by an idle curiosity, or a selfish contemplation of the dignity of their persons or the splendour of their attire. We hold this to be utterly wrong; we charge it upon the painter, as a fault, for which no minor excellencies can atone. The occasion as well as the costume of a ceremony should be considered; and as no man is better able than Mr. Leslie, to cope with the loftiest requirements of a state pageant, we have not hesitated to urge an objection, where we expected to have had the more agreeable task of expressing unqualified praise.

108. "Hagar and Ishmael." C. L. Eastlake, R.A. This is emphatically the great work of the exhibition—a picture which will live and rejoice the hearts of many generations. It is drawn with an ease and simplicity of line which powerfully reminds one of the grand style of Raffaelle; and in its colouring it is as firm and clear as the best works of Correggio. Moreover, it is an attempt to render Scripture in a truthful spirit, and, as far as it goes, is a highly successful one. The practice of the Italian painters, who frequently painted this subject, was to place the poor outcast woman and her famished boy in the midst of a luxuriant forest of chesnut trees; and in the immediate neighbourhood of various convents, churches and dwelling-houses of the period; or else, to represent them, dressed as gorgeously as Papal saints, seated on the banks of a stream of water "and then and there" most pathetically giving themselves up to the horrors of thirst and destitution. Instead of this, if we were to follow the images raised in the mind by the sacred narrative, we should picture to ourselves the forsaken bondwoman, oppressed by famine, and bewildered by despair, thrown prostrate on the fruitless earth, one hand grasping the spent bottle, and the other vainly buffeting the sands; while in the background, helpless and abandoned, we might imagine the dying boy, stretched beneath the meagre shadows of a tamarix. The sun, overhead, would burn with a consuming splendour, and all the accessories would betoken dearth and desolation. Mr. Eastlake, following the more tender bias of his refined imagination, has chosen the moment when Hagar, directed to a well of water, fills her bottle, and gives it "the lad" to drink. Without being unnecessarily literal in the details, he has contrived to impress his work with a genuine Oriental character, and to excite in the mind of the spectator a sympathy in unison with the touching character of the incidents; and in some hearts, we doubt not, he will even raise a feeling of thankfulness towards the "Father of Mercies," who "heard the voice of the lad" and delivered him. Such is the moral power of the painter.

We have already exceeded the limits assigned to this department of our paper, and must postpone further notices to our next and succeeding numbers. Before, however, we conclude, we have again to mention, as a matter of public congratulation, that the exhibition, this year, is distinguished by numerous works of young and hitherto unknown artists, who promise a sudden attainment of high rank in the profession. One of them we have here engraved. It is No. 125, by A. Solomon, a youth of some eighteen years of age. We consider it to be a remarkable example of sweet expression, and pure clear colouring. The lines which it illustrates are—

On widow fair and staid
He fixed his eye, but he was much afraid;
Yet wooed, while she his hair of silver hue
Demurely noticed, and her eye withdrew.

SHAKSPERE'S AUTOGRAPH.

On Wednesday there was an extraordinary sensation at Evans's book-auction in Pall Mall, in consequence of the sale, among other autographs, of that of Shakspere, "affixed to a deed of bargain and sale of a house in Blackfriars, purchased by him from Henry Walker, dated March 10th, 1612, with the seals attached." About two years ago it fetched £162. The deed is regularly enrolled in the chapel of the Rolls, and will be found in the index there under the name of W. Shakspere, the purchaser, instead of H. Walker, the vendor, contrary to the ordinary practice. On the back of the deed are the names of the attesting witnesses, "Sealed and delivered by the said William Shakspere, William Johnson, and John Jackson in the pnce. of Will. Atkinson, Ed. Ouery, Robert Andrewes, Scr. [Scrivener], Henry Lawrence, Servant to the same Scr.," whose seals it bears, with the initials H. L. upon them. The auctioneer introduced the lot with an eulogium on Shakspere that drew forth much applause. The first bidding was £10, the second £100, offered by Mr. Stainsbury, the proprietor of the Napoleon Museum; it was then run up to £145 (Mr. Stainsbury having bid £140), and finally knocked down to Mr. L. Jones, for, it was understood, the library of the city of London collected at Guildhall. The room was excessively crowded by gentlemen and book collectors to witness this extraordinary sale.

THE THEATRES.

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.

On Tuesday evening Bellini's opera of "La Sonnambula" was performed, the part of Amina by the miraculous Persiani, who, on this occasion, as much surpassed herself as her former representations of the same rôle did all other would-be rivalries. With a vivid recollection of the great Malibran's highly artistical treatment of this interesting subject, and also of this improved Grisi's, we have no hesitation in asserting that Persiani's Amina is (to parody Milton) a higher flight amongst the highest, and that she leaves all competitorship à la distance. The marvellous power which this lady possesses to embellish without obscuring her author's meaning—the rich floriture she uses, like a "graceful foliage" that permits the "pure gold of the melody" to shine through in undiminished lustre—the soul—the pathos—the truth—the nature with which she pourtrays the feelings of the innocent but suspected village girl, all constitute her as perhaps the most accomplished and versatile artiste that ever trod the stage. Whatever she does it were "vain to censure and useless to praise." The only drawback from the enjoyment of this truly sentimental opera was the vocal indisposition of Mario, which caused him to omit the beautiful "Tutto è sciolto," which he can, at times, sing so charmingly.

The ballet department has lost a star in Fanny Elssler, but

No sooner does a light decline
Than one as brilliant lights to shine!

Another Fanny (Cerito) has stepped into her most favourite pas, and delighted so as to make us lose our memory of the past in the enjoyment of the present. There is a mercurialism about Cerito that is the very reality of the—

Goddess fair and free
In Heav'n yclept Euphrosyne!

Guy Stephan, not content with being counted as a first-rate seems determined to be the first, and every night is approximating the attainment of her worthy ambition. St. Leon, who has proved that his head is not so light as his heels, and that his fingers are as agile as his legs, is nightly received with the most enthusiastic demonstrations of delight. Altogether there never has been such an opera season in this or any other country.

CAMILLO SIVORI.—M. PERROT'S BENEFIT.

Who says the age of song is o'er,
Or that the mantle finely wrought
Which hung upon the bards of yore
Has fall'n to earth and fall'n uncaught?

The dying bequest of Paganini, namely his favourite violin to his beloved and only pupil, has given birth to a belief in a novel kind of metempsychosis—that the genius or soul of the maestro was transferred to the elève by the gift: such superstitions are quite worthy of those who imagined that il diavolo Paganini had his violin manufactured from the wood of his father's coffin, with many other absurdities of a similar nature. Sivori is universally allowed on the Continent to be the first performer on his difficult instrument now living, and we are prepared to add to the opinion by saying that perhaps he can "enchant our ears" more deliciously still than the magician his master. The compositions which he played for Perrot's benefit at her Majesty's theatre on Thursday week were a concerto composed by himself and Paganini's "Carnivale de Venise," which he played so supernaturally that he left us "gaping with mute wonder and delight;" and, consequently, feeling the inadequacy of language to convey any idea of his miraculous powers, we must request our readers to forego any demand of detailed description on our parts, and advise them to hasten as soon as possible to hear, not an artiste, but an inspired genius, a personification in musical power of the angel Israfil himself, who (we almost fear to express it) is the greatest violinist that has yet appeared. Mr. Lumley you have conferred an eternal obligation on the musical world by engaging this living miracle!

In Bellini's exquisite "Puritani" Fornasari appeared as Ricciardo, and "fore Heaven it seem'd a more excellent song than his last." Nothing could have been more tender and pathetic. Versatile, as he undoubtedly is, his forte, we would say, is decidedly in characters of such range. The other personages of the opera were filled as usual, and the whole performance of the evening was, perhaps, never equalled, not to say excelled, by any convocation of talent that Europe has yet heard or seen.

NEW MUSIC.

THE CELEBRATED MUSIC IN SHAKSPERE'S TRAGEDY MACBETH, attributed to Matthew Locke, A.D. 1672, in complete Score, with an Accompaniment for the Pianoforte, by E. J. Loder. D'Almaine and Co.

To this new and excellent edition of one of the most beautiful relics of our former grandeur in the musical art there is prefixed an historical account of the various opinions held from time to time as to the composer of it. This has been written very dispassionately by Mr. Edward F. Rimbault, F.S.A., who produces some plausible reasons for assigning the authorship to Eccles, rather than to either Locke or Purcell, between whom it has hitherto generally been a question of antiquarian dispute. The pianoforte part by Mr. Loder is well compressed by Mr. E. Loder from the score; but it may be remarked here that we do not review our musical proofs in this country with the care of our Continental neighbours.

THE SONG OF THE WATER KING (Sung by Mr. Machin). No. I. of six bass Songs. The poetry by various Authors. The Music by E. J. Loder. D'Almaine and Co.

A very striking composition, dignified and solid in both melody and harmony in its principal movement, and particularly elegant and graceful in the andantino. It must prove very effective in Mr. Machin's hands.

THE MANIAC. Song No. 7, from "Songs of a Rambler." Composed by F. Crouch. D'Almaine and Co.

This song consists of four verses (very nearly the same) in the gloomy key of C minor, and will be acceptable to all who relish the serious or sombre in music. It is well written, though somewhat smacking of an imitation of Schubert.

AWAY TO THE SILVERY STREAM. Song from the Operetta, "The Queen of the Thames, or the Anglers." Composed by J. L. Hatton. D'Almaine and Co.

A very pleasing rondeau, with many passages of originality in that rare commodity—simplicity! The minor is particularly good.

THE SKYLARK. Song from Ditto. Composed by Ditto. D'Almaine and Co.

A canzina full of grace and beauty, especially in the second and third parts, which we prefer to the first or subject, although that is by no means a common or inelegant movement.

FOR THE VIOLIN. The whole of the Modern Art of Bowing, exemplified with Exercises in the Major and Minor Scales. By J. D. Loder, Professor of the Royal Academy. D'Almaine and Co.

A very masterly production; one better calculated to improve the student in all the varieties of modern bowing than any other we have seen. He that can correctly and neatly execute these exercises will have overcome nine tenths of the difficulties of the instrument, having little else but style to cultivate afterwards.

THE COLLEGIANS: a Set of Waltzes, dedicated to the Colleges of Stoneyhurst and St. Edmond's. By G. B. Hodges. D'Almaine and Co.

Without stopping to remark on a certain incongruity of the title-page, we turned overleaf, and were pleased to find a very graceful set of waltzes—elegant, if not the most original in the world, and correctly and tastefully harmonized.

THE OLD ENGLISH COUNTRY DANCES, as performed at the Court and Nobility's Balls, arranged for the Pianoforte. By J. Cronin. D'Almaine and Co.

An excellent collection of old airs that associate with "the days of our youth," before waltz and quadrille were introduced to almost exterminate more becoming, and certainly more graceful and hilarious, dancing.

LITERATURE.

MORMONISM IN ALL AGES; or, the Rise, Progress, and Causes of Mormonism, with the Biography of its Author and Founder, Joseph Smith, Junior. By Professor J. B. TURNER, Illinois College, Jacksonville, Illinois. Wiley and Putnam.

This is an American account of one of the most singular and revolting impostures of modern times. The so-called Church of the Mormons, or Latter Day Saints, took its rise in 1830, at Manchester, in the State of New York: it now numbers 100,000 members in the United States, and 10,000 in Britain, chiefly in the manufacturing districts of Lancashire. The doctrines of the Mormon prophet contain little that is new: they are made up of the usual staple tenets with which knavish fanatics have for centuries abused the minds of their deluded adherents. The means taken to propagate the deception have, however, something of novelty; and it is interesting to trace the history of frauds, never surpassed for their effrontery, shamelessness, and gross want of plausibility, in the heart of the nation which claims to be the most enlightened of the modern world. These frauds furnish irrefragable evidence that the mass of ignorance and credulity in America is not less, perhaps we might say greater, than is to be found among the most corrupt communities of the Old World. That a notorious swindler like Smith, a man destitute of pretensions, ignorant of common grammar, in short one of the lowest of the low, should have succeeded in deceiving so many citizens of the republic, and should have succeeded, as appears from this volume, in inducing the State Legislature of Illinois to incorporate in his behoof a standing army of guards, a university, a church, and public bodies and companies ad lib., is a problem only to be explained on the supposition that corruption, ignorance, and anti-social passions are as rife in the United States as in any European country. It is to be regretted that this book should throw so little light on the internal machinery which the impostor has employed for working out his ends, while it is diffuse on the general subject of the influences of fanaticism and credulity, which operate in all ages and lands. The information it affords is, nevertheless, of considerable value. Its literary merit is very low, and the Jacksonville professor evidently does not possess a mind disciplined by logic or accustomed to close reasoning. One of the most interesting portions is an account of the various religious sects and delusions which have prevailed since the general establishment of Christianity.

POPULAR CYCLOPÆDIA OF NATURAL SCIENCE, MECHANICAL PHILOSOPHY, AND ITS APPLICATION TO THE ARTS. By H B. CARPENTER, M.D. Orr and Co.

This is one of a series of volumes designed to supply instruction in natural and physical science to those who have not gone through the usual curriculum of scientific education. The various treatises are founded on such knowledge as every person of ordinary capacity possesses, and the attention of the reader is directed, in the first instance, to phenomena of constant occurrence around him; it being hoped that, by a judicious mode of treating the subject, "principles may be gradually developed in such a manner as to render them fully comprehensible." There is no doubt that much progress may be made in the study of science on this system; much may thus be taught which would else be wholly unintelligible to those who have not, like ourselves, had the misfortune of being obliged to sound the mysterious depths of the differential calculus. Dr. Arnot has given the weight of his example to the plan in his admirable "Treatise on Physics," and as a substitute for more recondite methods, or as a preparative for them, it is of extensive utility.

SIR ROBERT PEEL AND HIS ERA; being a synoptical view of the chief events and measures of his life and time. N. H. CORES.

The lives of our British Statesmen are landmarks in history. The ascent to the first honours of the state, and the helm of affairs, is a slow and difficult process; for the jealousy of a free people rightly refuses to entrust the conduct of its business to inexperienced hands, and scans with vigilance the conduct and pretensions of all candidates for political distinction. It is, therefore, not an easy matter to rise to power; but, when the painful and dangerous eminence is at length attained, the upright and conscientious politician is rewarded with no niggardly share of public confidence and support. The temper of the English people is averse to change, and the nature of the Government favourable to the long retention of power and influence, whether in office or opposition, by statesmen. Hence the public life of our Legislators and Ministers is frequently found to embrace half a century, and is inseparably mixed up with the general political transactions, and domestic and foreign occurrences, of the period. The view of a life is equivalent to that of an age, and biography is advanced to the dignity of history.

It is profitable to pause amidst the strife and jars of the politics of the day, and take a retrospect on the course of events and the march of public opinion during the past generation, in order to be able to clear our sight from the obscurity with which passion and prejudice invest the "ignorant present time," and to collect our energies for future usefulness. Such is, no doubt, the idea on which the present work is founded. Few periods of equal duration have been more fruitful in events of absorbing interest, both from their intrinsic importance and the consequences to which they are likely to lead in the distant future, than the last thirty years. During the first part of that time the world trembled with the shock of contending empires, and Europe echoed with the clash of hostile armies. Peace at length came, and

The idle spear and shield were high up hung;
The trumpet spake not to the armed throng.

But peace brought to England its difficulties and distresses, hardly less than those of war; and the attention of Government was occupied with the vast questions which had been agitated for years, and now pressed loudly for solution. Taxation and Currency, Catholic Emancipation, Parliamentary Reform, Slavery, and the grievances of the Dissenters, were all successively considered and brought to a temporary or permanent settlement. In all the discussions which ensued on these measures Sir Robert Peel took a leading part, and in many cases the chief part. If there have been statesmen of greater depth and originality of mind, and orators of more resistless power, there have been none who better reflected the character of their age, or whose intervention in the settlement of affairs was more frequently required.

We so lately entered into an examination of his character and career, that we shall not be expected here to repeat what we then advanced on the subject. We shall content ourselves with recommending this work to those who wish to attain a more full and satisfactory view of them than it was then in our power, with our limits, to afford. It is distinguished by much shrewdness and penetration, and presents a succinct and excellent view of the various mutations of public opinion, and the multiplied influences of all kinds which have contributed to the present position of affairs, and are even now at work for other, and perhaps greater, changes.

Countess W——, an English lady, of high birth, and married to a Bavarian nobleman of great wealth and rank, has caused a great sensation at Munich, by publicly abjuring Protestantism, and becoming a member of the Roman Church.

STATISTICS OF TRAVELLING.—The following appears in a provincial paper:—"Only eleven mail-coaches now start from London daily for the country. A few years since, before railways were formed, there were nearly eighty that used to leave the General Post office. The number of miles which the mail coaches going to and from London daily travel on turnpike roads is about 5000. The number of miles which the different railway companies convey mails daily is 4435. Cross-road mails in England, Scot and, and Wales run over nearly 12,000 miles of ground every day. Thus by principal conveyances the correspondence in this country is conveyed over more than 20,000 miles of ground every twenty-four hours. From these principal conveyances innumerable mail-carts and horse and foot letter-carriers branch off, and every road, lane, street, and court in the kingdom is traversed from sunrise to sunset."

CENTRAL CRIMINAL COURT.

(Before Mr. Justice Coltman.)

On his lordship taking his seat at ten o'clock the following prisoners, who were awaiting sentence, were called up to receive it:—John Williams White, captain, and Joseph Youngbusband, mate of the ship the Native, who had pleaded guilty to the charge of robbing and sinking her. Mr. Justice Coltman addressed the prisoners, and severely remarked upon the enormity of their crime, which, until lately, was punishable by death, sentenced them to be severally transported beyond the seas for the term of their natural lives.

Edward Heylin, a lad of 17 years of age, who had pleaded guilty to an indictment charging him with having stolen letters containing money from the Post-office, in which he was employed as a clerk. Several witnesses gave the prisoner an excellent character, and a memorial in his favour from the High Sheriff of the county of Cornwall was handed up to his lordship. Mr. Justice Coltman said that the prisoner had been entrusted with the distribution of letters, and he had grossly abused the confidence reposed in him. It was necessary for the protection of the public that such offences should be punished with the utmost severity. His case was a very bad one. The number of letters which he had purloined was very considerable; but, even if not so, the public must be protected. The sentence upon him was that he should be transported for life.

George Davies, the post-office carrier, who was convicted of stealing a letter containing a sovereign which had been prepared as a trap for him. The prisoner begged for his lordship's mercy, on account of his previously good character, and the number of years he had been in the Post-office. His lordship said that the latter point tended rather to aggravate than mitigate his offence, because length of service has generally the effect of increasing confidence. Fortunately for him, however, his case differed from the last inasmuch as the money or letter was not laid as belonging to the Postmaster-General. His was therefore a simple larceny, and the sentence was that he should be transported for seven years.

Thomas Cofford, who had pleaded guilty to an indictment charging him with feloniously uttering a forged £5 note, with intent to defraud the Governor and Company of the Bank of England. His lordship said that it appeared in this case there were several other similar charges against the prisoner which were not gone into, the first having produced a conviction. The sentence was that he should be transported for the term of his natural life.

CHARGE OF FORGING POST-OFFICE BILLS.—Joseph Bernardo Guedes Oliveira, aged 33, wine-merchant, was placed at the bar charged with feloniously forging and having in his possession without lawful excuse 900 pieces of paper, each of which part of a foreign bill, purporting to be a bill of exchange, in the Portuguese language, was printed.—Mr. Platt stated the case, but having already given the facts, it is unnecessary to repeat them here. The case for the prosecution having closed, Mr. Clarkson asked his lordship whether there was any offence at all committed.—Mr. Justice Coltman said this was clearly no more than a forgery of stamps, but that was not the charge.—Under his lordship's directions the jury returned a verdict of acquittal.—There were two other indictments against the prisoner, but as they only varied the charge, and depended upon the same evidence, they were abandoned, and verdicts of acquittal returned.—Mr. Justice Coltman said that the offence of forging the stamps could not be punished in this country.—The prisoner was then discharged.

Henry Rose, aged 23, was convicted of having endeavoured by means of letters, in which allusion was made to shameful propensities alleged against the prosecutor, Mr. E. Beck, to obtain money from the said E. Beck.—Mr. Justice Coltman said that the offence of which the prisoner had been convicted was one which called for the severest punishment of the law. To these many such charges against their character were more dreadful than the deprivation of their lives. The sentence of the court was, that he should be transported beyond the seas for the term of his natural life.

William Fuller, alias Taylor, aged 23, labourer, and Thomas Riley, 20, cork polisher, were indicted for a burglary in the dwelling-house of John Francombe, and stealing a cloak, a pair of boots, some copper coin, and other articles, his property.—The prisoners were defended by Mr. Payne.—It appeared from the evidence, that the prisoners were found in a state of "incapable drunkenness" in Rose-lane, Spitalfields, by a police constable early in the morning of the 3rd instant. Fuller was so full that he could not speak, and Taylor could only request that the constable would not make a prisoner of him. Seeing something sticking out of his pocket, the constable suspected they had been about something wrong, and he accordingly took them both to the station-house. On their persons were found a quantity of tobacco, some copper money, and a variety of articles, and round Riley's body a lady's cloak and a shawl were tied. On inquiry it was discovered that the articles had been all stolen from the prosecutor's house, the "George the Fourth," in Rosemary-lane. The house had been properly secured on the previous night, and there was every reason to suppose that the prisoners had secreted themselves during the evening on the prem ses, and so managed to get possession of the articles. Having so far triumphantly succeeded, they indulged in the good things which lay so temptingly at their mercy, until they became incapable of using the necessary precautions for their escape, and so fe l into the constable's hands.—Mr. Payne having addressed the jury, the Recorder summed up the evidence, and the jury returned a verdict of guilty.—Sentence, ten years' transportation each.

Peter Adamson, 33, who was convicted in December of defrauding a Scotchman, named Heron, of £200, by pretending that he was able to get him a Government appointment in one of the counties, was brought up to receive judgment, the case having stood over from that time in consequence of a point of law raised by the council of the defendant. The defendant was sentenced to be imprisoned for a year.

THE HIDDEN TREASURE IN TUFFNELL PARK.—John Thompson, a labourer, was indicted for stealing fifty-one sovereigns, being part of 300 sovereigns, the property of Joseph Frost. Other counts laid the property to belong to other persons, and one charged it as the property of T. Tuffnell, Esq., the lord of the manor from whence it was alleged to have been stolen. Charles Fisher deposed that he lives at the Castle in Kentish-town. On the 5th of April he was at work with four other labourers in Tuffnell Park. While they were digging they found a copper pot, about two inches below the surface, which was full of sovereigns. On further examination they found a gallipot under the copper, which was also full of sovereigns. The money was divided among them, and witness had returned his share to the solicitor. Mr. Joseph Frost, of St. John-square, Clerkenwell, deposed that some years ago he was in business as a brass-founder, in Islington. In consequence of a delusion under which he laboured, he drew £700 of his own money from the Bank, and buried it in Tuffnell Park. Has seen the spot where the money was found, and knows it to be one of his places of deposit. A large sum has been since found. Ann Cooper, the prisoner's landlady, stated that she connected him a very honest man. He was not "found" of money after "the find." The jury here interposed, and said they were quite satisfied, and returned a verdict of Acquittal.

On Wednesday Louisa Jones, a young woman, was indicted for a misdemeanour, in having unlawfully attempted to destroy her life. It will be recollected that the prisoner threw herself into the river, but the act was observed, and assistance being at hand, she was rescued in an almost unconscious state, and on her coming to her senses, she expressed her regret that her life had been saved, and asked why they did not allow her to die in peace. To the present charge the prisoner pleaded "Guilty." It was stated that the prisoner's husband had treated her very unkindly, and that in a moment of desperation she attempted the rash act. She now expressed regret for her conduct, and solemnly declared she would never repeat an attempt her life. The prisoner's sisters having undertaken to look after her, and take care of her, the Recorder ordered the prisoner to be confined in Newgate for ten days. As the sentence dates from the first day of the session, the period of imprisonment expired the moment it was pronounced, and the prisoner was consequently immediately delivered over to her friends.

During the session twenty-one prisoners were sentenced to imprisonment, sixty eight were acquitted, twelve pleaded guilty, fifteen were discharged by proclamation, the judgments upon several were respited, and others were discharged upon recognizance to appear; others traversed to their own accord, or were remanded by the Court unto the next session.

POLICE.

QUEEN-SQUARE.—DARING ROBBERY OF PLATE AT THE RESIDENCE OF THE LATE LORD FITZGERALD AND VESCI.—On Saturday afternoon so little sensation was occasioned in Belgrave-square, in consequence of a daring, extensive, and most odious robbery having been committed, in open daylight, at the residence of the late President of the Board of Trade, while the body of the deceased nobleman still remained on the premises. At twelve o'clock on that day the tailor and milliner to the establishment attended at the house to measure the servants for mourning. The latter were all ordered up into the drawing-room, and immediately afterwards a chaise-cart drove up to the door, two men descended from it into the area, proceeded to the butler's pantry, took up the plate-chest, carried it up the area steps, put it into the cart, and drove off. So coolly was the robbery perpetrated that two female servants, who met the men carrying the chest away, never imagined but that it was by order, and let them pass. The error was, however, soon discovered, and a pursuit, fruitless in its result, was made after the men. The value of the plate stolen is upwards of £300. Information was immediately forwarded to the police, and an inspector of the A and also one of the B division of police were employed in the case. That it is one of those "put up" robberies there can be but little doubt, for without information from a servant, and a subsequent connivance, it is scarcely possible such a robbery could be either planned or carried out. On Monday a carman named Fuller was apprehended, and brought before the magistrate at Queen-square, when he was identified by a female servant as one of the men whom she had met carrying the chest. The prisoner was remanded, and directions were given to the police to take Howse, the steward, into custody.

On Tuesday, George Howse, steward to the late Lord Fitzgerald and Vesci, was brought up in custody, charged with being concerned in the robbery of plate at the family mansion in George-street, and a subsequent connivance, it is scarcely possible such a robbery could be either planned or carried out. On Monday a carman named Fuller was apprehended, and brought before the magistrate at Queen-square, when he was identified by a female servant as one of the men whom she had met carrying the chest. The prisoner was remanded, and directions were given to the police to take Howse, the steward, into custody.

On Tuesday, George Howse, steward to the late Lord Fitzgerald and Vesci, was brought up in custody, charged with being concerned in the robbery of plate at the family mansion in George-street, a short distance from Belgrave-square. The accused has been upwards of thirty-five years in his lordship's service, and has borne, throughout that period, an irreproachable character. Several witnesses having been examined, the case was remanded until Monday next.

MARLBOROUGH-STREET.—Lord Leicester, the gentleman who lays claim to the Townshend peerage, was summoned before Mr. Maltby by a cabman, for paying less than the legal fare. The cabman proved that he took Lord Leicester from Palace yard to Grosvenor-street, and was paid only a shilling instead of sixteenpence. Lord Leicester said he had ridden the distance twenty times, and had never paid more than a shilling, except in very wet weather, or at unusually late hours. Lord Leicester having expressed a wish to have the ground measured, the cabman (who had no doubt made himself acquainted with the actual distance before coming into court) jumped at the proposal, and made the usual deposit. An officer was sent to measure the ground. He returned with the intelligence that the cabman was right; whereupon Lord Leicester was called upon to pay the balance of fare and all expenses.

BOYER EX-PRESIDENT OF HAYTI.

Some interest at present attaches to the subject of the accompanying portrait, General Jean Pierre Boyer, ex-President of the Republic of St. Domingo, or Hayti, as it is called by the natives. During the reign of King Christophe, from 1811 to 1820, he was constantly opposed by, and in a state of warfare with, the two native Chiefs, Petion (who died in 1918) and Boyer. The latter was unanimously chosen President, and the whole island erected into a republic, shortly after Christophe's committing suicide in 1820, in consequence of the revolt of his subjects, caused by his cruelty and tyrannical acts.

At present it does not very clearly appear what are the causes which have led to the deposition of Boyer, after he had held the Presidency for nearly twenty-three years. His expulsion, like his elevation, was brought about without the effusion of blood; he was suffered to embark, with some seventy or eighty adherents and followers, on board a British vessel of war, by which they were conveyed to Jamaica. It is said that the ex-President is shortly expected to arrive in Paris, and that he possesses considerable property invested in the French funds.

THE IRON TRADE.—The total number of blast furnaces in Great Britain, for the year ending January, 1843, was—in blast 339, and out of blast 189, whilst the annual produce, taken at fifty weeks, amounted to 1,210,000 tons of crude iron. There were made—8000 tons at the Forest of Dean; in South Wales, 487,350; in North Wales, 19,750; in Northumberland, 35,750; in Yorkshire, 42,000; in Derbyshire, 25,750; in North Staffordshire, 21,750; in South Staffordshire, 300,350; in Shropshire, 76,300; and in Scotland, 238,500.

READING.—A grand teetotal demonstration took place at Reading on Tuesday in a field contiguous to the town, where a spacious tent was erected for the year ending January, 1843, was—in blast 339, and out of blast 189, whilst the annual produce, taken at fifty weeks, amounted to 1,210,000 tons of crude iron. THE NEW CHAMBERLAIN.—SIR WILLIAM HEYGATE, BART.

The election of City Chamberlain formally closed on Thursday week: the numbers were—For Heygate, 2374; for Pirie, 1916. The new Chamberlain gave in the names of eight of the directors of the Union Bank as his sureties, in the sum of £5000 each.

Sir William Heygate is the son of James Heygate, Esq., banker, of London, and was born in 1792. He entered public life at an early age, for in his address to the Livery, on his nomination for Chamberlain, he stated that he had served his fellow-citizens for forty years. He was, until his recent election to the office of Chamberlain, alderman of the ward of Coleman-street. Having served the office of Sheriff, he was chosen Lord Mayor in 1822, and he received the unanimous vote of thanks from the Livery. His mayoralty was distinguished by the splendour and extent of its hospitalities; for Alderman Heygate invited the mayor of every corporation in England, and every man distinguished by science and literature in the country, to his table. In 1831 he was created a baronet.

Sir William Heygate is a deputy-lieutenant of Hertfordshire, in which county, at North Mimms, he has a seat, and another at Southend, Essex. Sir William married, in 1821, the fourth daughter of E. L. Macmurdo, Esq., of Upper Clapton, by whom he has a family.

The heir to the baronetcy being Frederick William, born 1822.

Sir William Heygate is a fluent speaker, and has, we believe, sat more than one Parliament. With the high qualities of a man of business he unites a temper of the most amiable kind, and these qualifications which pre-eminently fit Sir William for the duties of the office of Chamberlain. His warm friend, Sir Matthew Wood, that the late nomination observed:—"The conduct of Sir James Shaw in the office was worthy of being followed. It prevented the ruin of many an apprentice by the enlightened interposition between master and servant; and no man was better calculated by talents, abilities, and disposition to act upon the principle by which that most excellent man was influenced." (Loud cheers).

Mr. W. Hunter, of Finsbury-circus, has come forward as candidate for the aldermanic gown of Coleman-street ward, in the place of Sir William Heygate.

THE MAY MEETINGS.

These "feasts of reason" pursue their course with unabated, and in some cases, when the subject of general education comes under consideration, with increasing interest. None of them, however, seem to have excited a more extraordinary share of respect and attention than the celebrated meeting of the British and Foreign School Society, of which we last week gave a report. At that meeting, Lord John Russell, alluding to the Factories Bill, said, "With respect to the general principles of this society, I am sure I had better leave it to those who will presently address you, to enforce those principles, and to encourage all of us to future exertion. I am sure of this, that, after the lapse of time which has occurred since the commencement of this society, there never was a time at which it was more desirable to enforce its principle than at present. (Cheers.) Amid all the changes of opinion that have occurred, looking back to the time when many said that it was unadvisable and dangerous to educate the poor; looking again to another time when it was alleged, that although it might be right to extend education generally, and to promote the reading of the Scriptures by the young, yet, at the same time, it was indispensable that such reading should be accompanied by the catechism and the liturgy of the church (hear, hear); looking to a still more recent time, when some in the Church of England have said that it was right that the Bible should not be indiscriminately read, and that reserve should be used in the communication of a religious knowledge generally to the people (hear, hear); looking at all these phases and changes of opinion, I think that our own principle, that of the communication of the Bible, and the Bible alone (loud cheers)—leaving it to the ministers of the church, and to the ministers of various religious communities, to communicate each his own doctrine to the children of parents who belong to their communion, rises superior to all those that I have stated in truth and usefulness, and, above all, in applicability to the state of the people of this kingdom." (Cheers.) These are sentiments to which we very heartily respond, and which we consider to be those which will ultimately triumph in the settlement of the many vexed questions which at present deprive the poor man's child of the key of knowledge. Many of our correspondents have expressed themselves such warm supporters of the institution, that, for their gratification, as well as to bring it, at this very important crisis, more conspicuously into public notice, we have engraved a view of the schools; and we may, on a future occasion, enter at large on a view of the system pursued by their conductors.

SUNDAY-SCHOOL UNION.

4th May.—Exeter Hall.—Viscount Morpeth in the chair.

The meeting was addressed by the Rev. J. W. Richardson, Rev. J. Smith, Rev. G. Smith, of Poplar, Rev. T. Archer, Rev. Dr. Cox, Rev. Dr. Jenkyn, and Charles Hindley, Esq., M.P.

The hall was densely crowded, and hundreds were compelled to go away without being able to get near the doors.

W. H. Watson, Esq., one of the secretaries, read an abstract of the report, which was of the most cheering and animating character. Numerous applications for assistance had been received from Denmark, Belgium, France, Corfu, Van Diemen's Land, Antigua, Jamaica, the United States, Nova Scotia, and Canada. Cash grants had been made towards the erection of Sunday-schools amounting to £234, making a total sum allotted to that purpose of £5672. 103 Sunday-school libraries had also been granted during the year, making, in all, 966, at a pecuniary loss to the society of £299. The schools thus assisted contained 14,661 scholars, 8259 of whom could read the Scriptures. The report also stated that within a circle of five miles from the General Post-office there were 491 schools, containing 90,052 scholars and 9346 teachers. The sales of publications at the Depository had amounted to £8827, being a decrease of £727 on the sales of previous years, occasioned by the prevailing distress in those parts of the country where Sunday-schools are so generally established. The total receipts of the Benevolent Fund were £1474 10s. 7½d. The report also referred to the Factories Education

BRITISH AND FOREIGN SCHOOLS, BOROUGH ROAD.

Bill now before Parliament, and stated the proceedings of the Union with regard to the obnoxious clauses of that bill; which, upon being read, were received with general hisses, while the efforts of the committee to overthrow them were loudly cheered.

The proceedings of the evening generally demonstrated that the onward progress of the Sunday-school system was triumphantly successful. The Rev. J. Smith stated, "that the late Recorder of the City of London did not remember, during the whole time he held that important office, ever trying a person who had been educated in a Sunday-school; and that it was ascertained correctly some time ago that no person's name could be found in the books of Newgate for five successive years who had been trained in a Sunday-school; while among the convicts in Van Diemen's Land, amounting to 14,000 and upwards, very few could read at all; and during the year the country had expended £850,000 to punish crime in one form or other."

NAVAL AND MILITARY BIBLE SOCIETY.

May 9th.—Hanover-square Rooms.—Marquis of Cholmondeley in the chair.

The meeting was addressed by Capt. Sir Edward Parry, R.N., the Rev. E. Sidney, Capt. Jenkin Jones, R.N., the Rev. J. H. Davies, and Capt. Fishbourne, R.N. Lieut.-Col. Le Blanc, one of the secretaries, read the report, which, among other interesting circumstances, stated that the society had furnished 1757 Bibles to 41 regiments in the army, and 250 to the East India Company's troops; 150 copies had been sent for the use of the soldiers attending the Scotch church at Woolwich; 54 Bibles and Testaments for a regimental school at Plymouth, and 300 for the Royal Marines at Woolwich; 825 copies among 21 of her Majesty's ships, and 36 steam-packets had received 1437 copies, and 12 New York Packets 108 copies; to the Sailor's Home in London, and schools at various places, 178 copies; the issues to merchant seamen, &c., amounted to 4992 copies, and 2353 among the boatmen engaged in the inland navigation of our rivers and canals. The total distribution for the year has been 11,472 Bibles and Testaments. The receipts were stated to be £3251 6s., and the expenditure £3220 16s. 10d., which, with the last year's balance, left £52 18s. 9d. at the disposal of the Society.

LONDON MISSIONARY SOCIETY.

11th May.—Sir George Grey, Bart., in the chair.

The speakers were C. Hindley, Esq., M.P., Rev. E. Bickersteth, Rev. J. J. Freeman, Rev. W. Bunting, Rev. James Parsons, Rev. J. Angus, Rev. J. B. Condit, from Portland, United States, Rev. J. Sherman, Rev. A. F. Lacroix; and at the adjourned meeting at Finsbury Chapel, the chair was taken by F. Smith, Esq.; and the speakers were the Rev. S. Thodey, Rev. W. Stallybrass, Rev. J. Alexander, Rev. S. Hayward, Rev. J. J. Freeman, Rev. W. Buyers, Rev. J. Arundel, and Rev. G. Christie.

The Rev. A. Tidman read an abstract of the report, which commenced by noticing the proceedings in the South Sea Islands. After noticing the French aggression upon Tahiti, it stated that in the islands where the Gospel had been introduced in later years, and which had hitherto been preserved from the evils of Popery, the rich reward already realized had been abundant, and the prospects of extensive success were most cheering. In the island of Tanna, on which the enterprising Williams had planted the Christian standard the day before his martyrdom, two missionaries from England were now stationed. It had been decided to send to China as soon as possible ten or twelve additional labourers, and the best endeavours were now being made to engage men duly qualified for that important enterprise. Though still called to mourn over the obstacles to success in India by the debasing idolatries of the country, the directors were still permitted to rejoice in the progressive diminution of the difficulties with which they had to contend. In South Africa the desert had begun to blossom as the rose. Madagascar still remained under the cloud of that dark and mysterious dispensation which deprived the people of their teachers, and exposed them to the vengeance of their enemies. Five additional martyrdoms had taken place during the year. The directors had sent to various parts of the world missionaries with their families, amounting (exclusive of children) to twenty-three individuals. The total receipts for the year were £78,450 18s. 8d., and the expenditure £85,442 9s.

The Rev. J. J. Freeman gave a most interesting account of his late visit to the society's station in the West Indies, and described the zeal and perseverance manifested by the emancipated negroes to build their own places of worship, and render themselves free from the necessity of burdening the society for their maintenance, and stated that ere long they would be in a position to effect this great object, so that the resources hitherto expended on them will henceforth be available for other fields. He looked with admiration on the large amounts which these West India churches had so cheerfully contributed to the support of the institutions of religion, which, since the year 1834 alone, in connexion with the various missions of the different denominations in Jamaica and Guiana, could not be less than the magnificent sum of £250,000; and not only this, but they had also cheerfully paid, and more than paid, all the expenses of his (Mr. Freeman's) visit as a deputation, so that no portion of it should fall on the funds of the parent society.

The museum of this admirable society has latterly become an indispensable appendage to the great anniversary meeting. It is very rich in the natural history of the Polynesian Islands; and its Tahitian collection, rivals, in extent and usefulness, the collections of Captain Cook in the British Museum. Thither, after their meetings, the friends of mission are wont to repair, to revive their sympathies by an actual inspection of those idol gods which it is the first aim of the society "utterly to abolish." We give a perspective view of the principal room.

MISSIONARY MUSEUM.

HOME MISSIONARY SOCIETY.

May 16th.—Exeter Hall.—W. A. Hankey, Esq., in the chair.

Speakers, Dr. Liefchild, Dr. Morison, Rev. G. Smith, Rev. H. Richards. Dr. Matthewson read the report, which stated that during the past year three stations had ceased to be connected with the society and three new ones had been formed; ten grants of money had ceased and eight new ones allowed; four missionaries had withdrawn from the society and thirteen others engaged, making eighty in all, in addition to seventy itinerant preachers; ten students were at present in training; a systematic to the society had sprung up in various places. While the committee had great pleasure in recording that the number of Sunday-schools had increased to 310, the number of teachers to 1700, and the number of scholars to 17,000; 61 new chapels had been opened, and 655 towns, villages, and hamlets, were visited every Sunday by the society's agents. The income had exceeded that of any previous year, and amounted to £77780, while the expenditure had been £9334.

We regret to say that, notwithstanding the truly British character of this institution, and its peculiar claims upon the sympathy and support of the Christian Church, the body of the hall was not more than half full on this interesting anniversary.

THE FASHIONS.

Paris, Rue Chaussée, d'Antin May 1st, 1843.

Mon cher Monsieur,—Notwithstanding the inclemency of the weather for the last few days, the new fashions of every description have become generally known, and their appearance only serves to confirm the accuracy of our preceding statements. Nevertheless, there have been, during the last eight days, several coquettish prettinesses, which have still sufficient merit to deserve description. The first of these is a robe of shot taffety, with the skirt trimmed with two deep flounces festooned; the corsage is plain, and worn off the neck, with a little pelerine forming a berthe, trimmed with two little festooned frills, descending slightly to a point in front and upon the shoulder, and bordering the jockey, which is formed of two falls, in such a manner as to allow the four volants to be shown in the top of the sleeve: the waist is long in, and is formed of changeable taffety ribbon. The second was a taffety robe in blue squares, trimmed with two frills at about half the height, and surmounted with a corresponding piece of passementerie; corsage off the neck, plain, and brought to a rounded point, trimmed upon the front by a similar piece in passementerie placed on the three scallops, the sleeves were plain, with two deep frills edged with passementerie, forming a jockey sleeve, the one falling over the other, and descending as low as the bend of the arm. The third, which appeared to us to be in the best taste of all, was a robe of Italian taffety shot with green, and ornamented in compartments with a plaiting in similar material; the corsage high, with triple cutting, and with a small pelerine coming down to the point of the corsage, falling back upon the edge of the sleeve, and rounded in the back, and trimmed all round it with a plaiting of very narrow stuff to the point of the pelerine, and returning by degrees upon the shoulder, preserving the same dimensions as that upon the skirt; plain sleeves, trimmed upon the top by two ranks of plaits. Of female par dessus there are an immense variety worn; which, however, may be reduced into either of the three principal sorts, viz., the Pompadour mantle, the mantelletie bonne femme, and the Walter Scott's plaid. But we have had the good fortune to obtain a glance at a very pretty thing in the shape of a mantelet of embroidered tulle, with three pelerines trimmed with lace, the first of which is made very long and rounded at the back, gathered at the top of the arm, and falling in front in rounded ends, the second, falling a little lower than the waist, forms a facing upon the front, and the third, which comes no further than the shoulder, stops in front at the height of the waist; a piece of lace placed upon the top of the mantle descends in front winding round the ends. We may still mention, as worthy of distinction, a mantle in black tulle, lined with ye low taffety, descending somewhat lower than the bust, and fastened by several points on the top of the arm, and falling down in front in square ends, trimmed completely round them with lace, surmounted with a double puffing of yellow taffety; and also another mantle in India muslin, lined with rose-coloured taffety, rounded behind, gathered at the height of the arm, pleated in front of the waist of the robe, and falling back in square ends trimmed completely round it, with a lace frill gathered behind, but laid quite flat round the ends. The prettiest hats I have yet seen were a hat in jonquil yellow crape, ornamented with marabouts, and bordered with a narrow ruche; and another in white crape, edged with three biais of the same, and ornamented with a long Dejazet plume from the magazin of Chagot. But the most killing novelties of the day are capotes in rose-coloured taffety ribbons, between two pieces of blonde, bordered with a ruche, and ornamented with a branch of little bedge roses, or hats trimmed with lace, in bands placed in three or four rows upon the passe in knotted bows, or with a small veil, which completely covers the shape and falls down at the back and sides.

HENRIETTE DE B.

Summer Fashions.—Bonnets, though differing in form from those of last season, have not passed from one extreme to the other. The brims are of moderate depth, descending rather low at the sides, and the crown raised a little, but very little, behind. The finest Italian straw will be in vogue for chapeaux. Rice and Italian straw, pouli de soie, and crape for carriage and promenade dress. Straw bonnets, trimmed with ribbon, tulle en bouillonnée, and spring flowers, for plain walking dress. Flowers are expected to predominate for the promenade, and feathers for half dress. The new double shaded marabouts, from their exquisite lightness, and the beauty of their tints are the most elegant feathers of the season. Cannais and crispins of striped, plain, and fancy silks, trimmed with black lace and passementerie, retain their vogue. Mantelets, too, are again in favour. The prettiest we have seen have the ends descending only to the knees, and are trimmed with a double ruche, pinked at the edges; the fronts retained in regular folds at the bend of the arm, by points. Ruches and passementerie retain their vogue for trimmings. Embroidery in silk is expected to supersede guntache. Embroidered muslin and lace scarfs and pelerins will be much worn. Superb summer cloaks, both in white and black lace, will be introduced. They are of a large size, rounded behind, with a large pelerine, but open in front, from the throat, where the cloak is fastened by a knot of ribbon.

Robes.—Corsages are made high both in morning dress and demi-toilette. Robes redingotes are in great request for the latter. Demi points are very fashionable. The materials are pekins, taffeties, foulards, and plain and fancy silks, of the richest patterns and the most brilliant colours; also barèges and fine glasses. White muslins, too, will be in vogue, and look very elegant from the profusion of embroidery and lace trimming. The most elegant dresses are those with the corsage pointed and made biais. They are ornamented with two rows of buttons and small passementerie to correspond. The skirt open before, and trimmed at each side with a small ribbon, quilled narrow at top, but rounding toward the bottom: under-dress of muslin. The backs are frequently made full, and the front corsage tight to the shape. Flounces are in favour. Tight sleeves divide the vogue with those à la Grecque, and à la Louis XIII. Lace is in greater request than ever. Fashionable colours are the same as last month, with the addition of some shades of grey.—Berger's Ladies' Gazette of Fashion.

SOLOMON'S PICTURE OF THE "WIDOW FAIR."—See p. 340.

THE COMBAT BETWEEN RICHARD AND SALADIN.

From the new spectacle of "The Crusaders of Jerusalem," now performing at Astley's.

Here we have a scene from the Astley's circle, so long the locus in quo of equestrian glory, the pride of the horsemanship of Ducrow. Erewhile burnt gloomily to the ground, the phœnix has now risen from its ashes, and the ancient palace of quadrupedal melodrama again astounds its admiring inmates with examples of the wonderful instinct of horses, and the not less marvellous prowess of those bipedal actors who have trained them into "soft though proud" obedience to the rein. Here is the true Surrey stud. "Sell it?" once asked the alarmed Ducrow; "never!" "Abandon it!" ejaculates Batty; "never until children become mathematicians and find me the square of my own circle while the horses are going round!" "Forsake it!" shrieks the dear delighted public; "nay!"

Nay, shout the people with indignant voices,
And the stud echoes with a hundred neighs.

But there is no occasion for us to descant upon the attractions of Astley's—its own circular is enough. One man, however, has thriven in that arcanum who must be personally introduced to our readers, before, in the freshness of his everlasting constitution, he makes his bow to the present and steps into the next century, to observe the destinies of a new race of horses, ponies, and the like. Here, then, is Widdicombe! Widdicombe the immortal! Widdicombe the cool! There, whip in hand, in the circle's very centre, will that great man stand and pursue his striking calling, not only unwarmed by the inspiration of the scene around, but with a look that might freeze the sun in the tropics. His eyes are black diamonds dug out of icebergs—nothing else. He is immoveable—no emotion stirs him. Hundreds around him applaud the beautiful results of his whipping, and yet he whips as though the mysteries of the thong were to him no more than snowballs. So he acts. Genius is with him so much a thing of course, and its developments have become so familiar to him that he refuses to be either excited or amazed. He exerts his power with quiescent grace, with proud impenetrability of demeanour, which must be admired, if only for its matchless self-possession and sang-froid. Widdicombe is a being per se. His popularity is great, and he bows with silent approval of the public taste. He is devoured with rapture, but, while the world is boiling over, he simmers down into the mildest complacency of respectful gratitude. We repeat, that Widdicombe is a great man—a clever man—a good man, if you will—but experience proves that he will never be an old man—no, never!

A ROMANCE OF REAL LIFE.

By HENRY COCKTON,

AUTHOR OF "VALENTINE VOX," "STANLEY THORN," ETC.

CHAPTER X.

LIFE IN THE COUNTRY.

NOTWITHSTANDING the means adopted by Caroline to prevent Charles and his uncle from having any private communication—which was really not desired—Sir Arthur, by a rigid adherence to the course prescribed, was within a week perfectly restored; but as they then launched out again as if with the view of making up for lost time—as they were constantly night after night in scenes of excitement—going frequently to two or three parties in one evening, Sir Arthur, as might have been expected, was very soon knocked up again.

This caused Caroline to be again peevish, as if, indeed, her affection depended solely upon his health; and as the season was then far advanced, he resolved on suggesting the propriety of returning for two or three months to the lodge.

"Do you not think, my love," said he, "that in every point of view it will be advisable for us to retire for a short time from town that our spirits and strength may be recruited?"

"I am of course in your hands," replied Caroline, but my health and spirits need no restoration. If, however, you are to be perpetually ill, why we may as well be buried in the country as not!"

"Nay, my love, we shall not be buried! You used to appreciate rural scenes, and so you do now: I am sure you do! and nothing can be more really delightful than retirement after the gay life to which we have been of late accustomed. Shall we go?"

"I have no voice in the matter."

"Nay, do not be angry, dear Caroline! you know that I do not feel well! I am naturally as strong as ever!—my constitution is still unimpaired; but these dreadfully late hours, together with the colds which I have caught, have for a time thus upset me. Still, so far my love, from your having no voice in the matter, a word from you will decide it either way. If you are anxious to remain in town, why in town we'll remain. It was merely a suggestion of mine, my dear: nothing more than a suggestion."

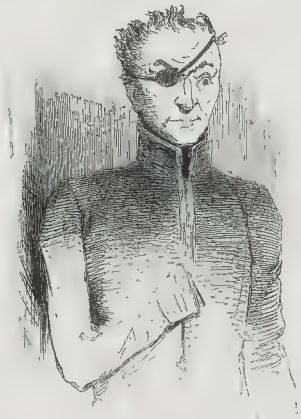
"It will be useless for us to remain in town," said Caroline, "if while we remain you are to be thus afflicted. Enjoyment of course must be out of the question. It is really distressing to see you. If, therefore, we are to go down, we had better go at once."

"Then let us go at once, my dear, let us go at once. You will see me in a week or so as strong as a young lion again! My nerves only want bracing! The fresh air, my love, the fresh air is the thing; that and my natural rest will, in a short time, do wonders!"

"Well, as you please! I am quite prepared to go."

"There's a dear. I knew that you would at once see the propriety of adopting this course; I felt sure that you would. We will therefore make arrangements for leaving at your earliest convenience: shall we my love?"

"I shall be ready, Sir Arthur, whenever you are."



MAJOR PALGRAVE.

"Sir Arthur!" This was the first time she had addressed him as "Sir Arthur" since their marriage. "Sir Arthur." It was certainly in his view unkind! it sounded as if it were unkind. But then, she might not be well; she might not be in spirits; she might have been in some way annoyed. He was anxious to ascribe it to anything but unkindness, and very soon succeeded in convincing himself that her affection for him was undiminished. Oh! yes; he felt sure that it was; he felt, indeed, sure of its having increased, and that feeling made him quite happy again.

Having completed the whole of their arrangements in the two following days, on the morning of the third they left town, and before they had been at the Lodge a week, Sir Arthur, by virtue of taking plenty of exercise during the morning, and retiring to rest early in the evening, felt nearly restored.

For Caroline, however, this life was too monotonous, she was soon half dead with ennui, while the servants entered into a conspiracy to become so excessively stupid that she felt herself absolutely bound to give the ring leaders notice to leave.

No place, in her judgment, was ever so dull. There was really no society. She positively might as well have been in the grave. She was spiritless—perfectly spiritless. She occasionally, it is true, drove her phaeton through the neighbouring town, and excited the admiration of the inhabitants. She also, in order to strengthen that admiration, commissioned Sir Arthur to procure for her another pair of cream-coloured ponies, for her two little rosy-cheeked pages to ride behind the phaeton; but what was all this without society? She would have sent for Lucrece, but that Charles, to whom she had conceived a decided dislike, would, of course, come with her; and, after all, what was the society of Lucrece? There were in the vicinity numerous families living in very good style, but she had no immediate means of obtaining introductions to those families.

Resolving, however, at length to do something, she procured the names of all, and sent to London, with the view of ascertaining if any one of them were known. The result of this was that Dr. Hawtree communicated the pleasing intelligence that he had for years been intimate with the family of Major Palgrave, which was then considered one of the first families in the county.

"Do you know Major Palgrave?" enquired Caroline, on the arrival of this communication.

"I have seen him, my dear," replied Sir Arthur. "He is a tall, thin man, with one arm, and an immense black patch over one of his eyes."

"Is that Major Palgrave? I have frequently seen him myself, on horseback. Do you know that he is a friend of Dr. Hawtree?"

"No, my love, I was not aware of it."

"Oh! the doctor has been intimate with his family for years."

"Indeed! Well, he appears to be a fine old fellow; though dreadfully knocked about."

"Have you not better be introduced to him?"

"Why, I should, of course, be most happy, my love, but who is to introduce me? I have always kept aloof from society down here: my object has ever been retirement."

"Retirement! We may as well be dead. I cannot—I have told you again and again that I cannot exist without society."

"Well, my dear, do not be angry. Come, come, be calm, my love, pray be calm."

"I am calm, but vexed beyond measure, to think that you, who were once so kind to me, now wish to bury me alive."

"Caroline, this, my dear, is not kind of you. I do not wish to reproach you; I do not, indeed; but is it not cruel to say I once was kind, and thus leave it to be inferred that, in your view, I am not kind now? What can I do to make you happy? Have you ever expressed a wish to me that has not been gratified? Is there anything in the world you desire that I would not, if possible, obtain to delight you? Oh, Caroline, Caroline!"

"Forgive me. I did not intend to say that which I did say. You are still kind—very kind—I feel it."

"Bless you!" exclaimed Sir Arthur with an expression of ecstacy, as the big tears gushed from his eyes. "I know that you did not intend to wound my feelings—I know it. You are my dear, dear Caroline still. But come," he added, shaking off the tears, "let us not say another word about it. I'll get an introduction to Major Palgrave in some way. Let me see—Oh! by the bye, why not have the doctor down here? He can then take me with him."

"That will be an excellent plan," observed Caroline.

"To be sure it will—of course! Now I never thought of that till this moment. It will be the very thing. Will you write, my dear, or shall I?"

It was eventually decided that Caroline should write, and Sir Arthur felt once more happy.

On receiving this invitation to the lodge, Dr. Hawtree, who happened to wish for a change, accepted it with pleasure, and when he and Alice arrived they were received with the utmost warmth.

"Was Palgrave with you?" inquired Sir Arthur of Dr. Hawtree, the morning after his arrival.

"Yes," replied the doctor, "and a fine brave fellow he was. He was knocked all to pieces! First he lost an eye, then an arm, then a leg, and I myself saw a ball go within an inch of his head. I don't know what he looks like now; I've not seen him since he returned. I must, however, call upon him now I'm down here."

"Shall we ride round this morning? I should like to be introduced.

"We can't do better. Let's go. He's an eccentric dog, but a splendid fellow."

The horses were accordingly ordered; and when Caroline took Alice in her phaeton for a drive, accompanied, of course, by her pages, Sir Arthur and his friend started for the residence of the major, which was situated about three miles from the Lodge.

On their arrival the major had just mounted his horse, and the moment he recognised the doctor he stuck his spurs into the animal, and almost flew to meet him, when, placing the reins between his teeth, he extended his hand with an expression of regret.

"Doctor," he exclaimed, "I'm delighted to see you! How are you?—how are you?" And they shook hands with great cordiality, when the doctor presented Sir Arthur, whom the major saluted, with the reins still in his mouth.

The party then dismounted and entered the house, and nothing could surpass the delight with which the major seemed inspired by this visit of his old friend the doctor.

"I'll hound you out!" he cried. "If you'd been above ground, I'd have found you out when I came to London; but the fact is, I've only just got round, and what do you think of me, eh? The fact is, there's not much of me left—there's the right arm gone, however, and there's that leg! The fact, is, this is the fellow," he continued, addressing Sir Arthur, "this is the fellow who has cut me clean out of the Peninsula. Glorious work there, doctor, now, eh? Glorious work! What would you have done?"

He then dwelt with peculiar energy upon various features of the Peninsular war, which was at that period raging; but, although he spoke loudly and rapidly, and with the warmth of an enthusiast, he scarcely uttered a sentence which did not contain "the fact is."

"Well," said the doctor at length, "I shall see you again before I leave."

"You are not going yet? You'll dine with me, of course. Sir Arthur will also, perhaps, do me the honour?"

"The women are along," observed Sir Arthur.

"Well, then, the fact is, you must both come and dine with me to-morrow, and bring the women with you."

"I'll consent to that with pleasure," returned Sir Arthur, "if you and your family will do me the honour to dine with us to-day!"

"My family! The fact is, it strikes me forcibly, Sir Arthur, that you haven't a notion of how many of the family remain. When, however, I heard that the Major would be accompanied by the whole of his family, her delight was unbounded, and after kissing Sir Arthur—in private of course—a remedy for hydrophobia, she immediately executed her commission—and no other reward could have been given which he would have prized so highly—she proceeded to give a variety of additional instructions which set every servant in motion.

At the hour appointed, therefore, all was prepared, and when the Major—who was punctual as the sun—arrived with his "troop," Caroline, dressed in her richest style, but without any apparent attempt at display, received them with surpassing grace.

The first thing which struck them was her beauty: they were themselves extremely elegant girls, and therefore appreciated the majority of them might have been termed handsome, but her beauty—to which a fine taste and an elegant presence imparted additional lustre—won all their hearts. The younger ones were especially delighted: they surrounded and kissed her with so much affection, and felt so happy to know her.

When I can break through this rear rank, Lady Cleveland," observed the Major, "I shall be happy to pay my respects. The fact is," he added, as Caroline on the instant extended her hand and received his with one of the most bewitching smiles, "I am proud, Lady Cleveland, of this introduction."

"I am delighted to see you, Major Palgrave."

"You do me honour, Lady Cleveland, for the fact is an honour I esteem it."

Alice was then presented; and as Sir Arthur performed his part to perfection, before dinner was announced by the pages they were all at one family.

As neither the Major nor his daughters expected to have anything but a plain family dinner, their surprise when they saw four courses served up in the most sumptuous style may be easily conceived. How on earth it could have been done on so short a notice was a mystery which they were utterly unable to solve. Caroline, of course, was not surprised. Everything passed off admirably, and the ladies in due time retired, leaving Sir Arthur, the Doctor, and Major Palgrave discussing the merits of the Peninsular war.

In the drawing-room music was immediately resorted to, and, as they all sang sweetly, a concert ensued. But the principal feature of the evening was the eloquent description which Alice gave of Sir Arthur's mansion in town. The rooms, the pictures, the furniture, everything, in fact, was minutely depicted, and had so powerful an affect upon the imaginations of her attentive young friends, that, after passing a most delightful evening, during which time, of course, no allusion whatever was made to the kind attentions which Caroline received from Sir Arthur, they left with the Major, inspired with the hope that whenever they married they might have nice elderly gentlemen for husbands.

On the following day, according to the arrangement made previously, this visit was returned; and as Caroline became extremely intimate with the Palgraves, who made up parties for her, and introduced her with feelings of pride to all the principal families resident within ten miles of the place, she soon had all the society she could desire, and became nearly as gay as she had been in town. She created, in fact, an immense sensation. Her name was exceedingly popular. Lady Cleveland was the leader in everything; there could be no party without Lady Cleveland; Lady Cleveland led off every ball, and Lady Cleveland took especial care not to be outdone in the magnificence of her entertainments.

IMPERIAL PARLIAMENT.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—MONDAY.

In reply to some observations made by Lord BEAUMONT, relative to the Corn-laws, Lord WHARNCLIFFE said, that when he stated that it was not intended by the Government to make any alteration in the Corn-laws, he had not added, as was reported in most of the papers, the words "during the present session."—Earl POWIS laid upon the table a bill to repeal the union of the new Parishes of St. Asaph.—The Marquis of CLANRICARDE moved the reprinting of the report of the commissioners on railways in Ireland. He thought that means should be taken to give employment to the people of Ireland, for it would not only confer great benefit on the country, but would tend to put an end to the agitation for the repeal of the union.—Lord BROUGHAM deprecated the agitation, as calculated to prevent the investment of capital in Ireland.—After some observations from the Earl of WICKLOW and the Marquis of CLANRICARDE, who contended that capital might be safely invested in Ireland, for such property was much more secure than life, the Marquis of CONYNGHAM and the Earl of ARDGLASS should be put down by the Government, and if the present powers of the law were not sufficient they should pass a law to prevent the meetings which took place in that country. CARNARVON recommended forbearance and conciliation.—After some observations from the Earl of DEVON and Lord BROUGHAM, the Duke of WELLINGTON stated his resolution to do his duty by his Sovereign, besides whether he was classed or not by the agitators amongst the enemies of his country. He would recommend other noble lords to pursue the same course. He had been long classed amongst the enemies of Ireland, but he found himself in very good company in the attacks made by the agitators of that country.—The other orders of the day were then disposed of, and the house adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—MONDAY.

Sir R. PEEL, in reply to a question from Mr. REDDINGTON, repeated what he had said on a former evening respecting the intention on the part of Government to put a check to the repeal agitation in Ireland.—Mr. W. S. STANLEY resumed the adjourned debate on the Corn-laws, and contended that the county members had forfeited their pledges to their constituents. He was of opinion that a fixed duty would have been far preferable to the present system.—Dr. BOWRING took the same line of argument, and advocated the doctrines of free trade.—Mr. EWART contended that the opponents of free trade had indulged in mis-statements and fallacies, such as that a repeal of the Corn laws would produce low wages and prices; but what was required was such an extension of the commerce of the country as would enable the people to consume more largely. The country, he believed, was beginning to form a just opinion of the half-and-half policy of Sir R. Peel, who had done more than most men to blot out consistency from the code of political morality.—Mr. CHILDERS could not vote for the total and immediate repeal of the Corn-laws, though he did think they must ultimately be removed.—Captain LAVARD would vote for the motion, though he believed his advocacy of the repeal of the Corn-laws might not be very grateful to some of his constituents. He would not be so selfish as to sell off his stock if he would be a loser of one half. Under these circumstances, he was more than ever entitled to protection.—Mr. P. SCHOLEY considered all indirect taxes on consumption as savouring of protection; but yet, with our great establishments, we could not so far maintain the principles of free trade as to repeal all these taxes. We should, however, adopt our financial system to the purposes of revenue rather than of protection, and more particularly in the main article of subsistence for the people.—Colonel WOOD (of Brecon) avowed his belief that the Corn-laws were as beneficial to the manufacturer as to the agriculturist. At all events the landowner could not abandon his interest in the land so readily as the manufacturer could alter the direction in which he wished to employ his capital. The British agricultural labourer, under many restrictions, he was not allowed to brew his own beer without a heavy duty on his malt; he was not permitted to grow tobacco, nor to make a cigar from beet-root; he had not the advantage of free trade in sugar from the manufacturer. He contended that the landowners were actuated by no other motives than the good of the community, for they well knew that property had its duties as well as its rights.—Mr. F. MAULE said he had attended with pain to the Corn-laws and had urged on Mr. Tyler that in return for the concessions made by Sir R. Peel in his tariff Ameica should adopt a more liberal policy towards England. That gentleman, however, declined to do so. Comparable was presented by our Corn-laws to an extended trade between the two countries. A change in our policy would in all likelihood induce the Americans to adopt a similar course.—Mr. C. VILLIERS was the advocate of free trade. He did not wish to legislate injuriously to the landed interest without making previous inquiry into the burdens to which it was said it was subject. But those who alleged that peculiar burdens pressed on the land should not refuse to grant inquiry into those burdens.—Sir H. DOUGLASS considered a repeal of the Corn-laws as fatal to the best interests of the empire, commercial, manufacturing, and agricultural, and he should therefore give his decided opposition to the motion. England was the best customer of England, and giving protection to the small farmer was in reality extending protection to the people.—Mr. HUME supported the motion, and he thought the landowners were too richly protected, but because they protected themselves without protecting others. They had not protected the labour of the operative classes, and yet of them were to be now offered the bread of free trade! He could

LAUNCH OF HER MAJESTY'S SHIP HOSPITIUS, 26.—This frigate, built according to the plan of Rear-Admiral the Hon. George Elliot, was launched at Portsmouth on Tuesday. The ceremony of naming her was performed by a daughter of the gallant admiral. An immense concourse assemblage of persons had collected to witness the interesting spectacle, and a few minutes before high water, every preparation having been completed, the restraints which had hitherto held her were withdrawn, and she immediately left her semi-recital position for a more commodious one in the basin, where she will remain until she is ready for service. The following are her principal dimensions:—

	Feet.	Inches.
Length between the perpendicular	141	2
Keel for tonnage	116	1½
Breadth, extreme	36	10

PROFESSOR BROWNE'S VENTILATING INVISIBLE PERUKE so closely resembles the real head of hair that sceptics and connoisseurs have pronounced it the most perfect and beautiful invention of the day. SEA BATHING.

BOGNOR has always been a favourite resort for SEA BATHING.—Her gracious Majesty Queen Victoria, with her Royal Mother, resided at Bognor during her infancy; and the late Princess Charlotte delighted to honour this agreeable bathing place with her presence. Owing to its mild and balmy air, Bognor has always been considered, by the most eminent of the faculty, a truly desirable spot for the invalid Of late, the town has been greatly improved: a promenade and carriage drive have been completed, commodious lodging-houses erected, a large hotel added to the former number, and the whole street newly paved. The beach still stands present a gradual and easy inclined plane for bathing; so that the most timid need not be alarmed. Rocks, at a short distance, run along the shore, breaking the swell of the sea, and rendering bathing at all times practicable. The rides and drives are very pleasant and numerous, and without a competition for miles. Harriers, carriages, and invalid chairs of all forms are ready for hire. Well-assorted libraries afford intellectual amusement. Shops of all kinds supply every convenience at the most reasonable rates. House rent is also very moderate. There are coaches to and from London daily; also to Chichester, Brighton, Portsmouth, &c. To those who value health, and seek retired and select sea-side resort, Bognor stands second to none, or to those who, through pressure of business or from illness, may desire a change a more delightful spot can hardly be found in the south of England.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

No. 56.—Vol. II.] FOR THE WEEK ENDING SATURDAY, MAY 27, 1843. [One Shilling.

OFFICE, 198, STRAND. WITH TWO SUPPLEMENTS.

OUR FIRST ANNIVERSARY.

This day, in conformity with the announcement made in our last number, we invite our readers to commemorate with us the first anniversary of the establishment of the Illustrated London News. For the gratification of the public we have always laboured, and we think we are borne out when we say that each successive month has witnessed an increase in our means of public utility, and an augmentation of our artistic resources, of which on so many occasions we have given triumphant evidence. At the outset of our undertaking, we entered on a difficult and untrodden path. We had no precursors to point the way or smooth the obstacles which beset it, no beacon to light our course; we buckled to our arduous work, not with the confidence which cheers a man in the pursuit of an often tried and familiar adventure, but with the half-mistrustful diffidence, if not in our own powers, yet in the dangers of the way, which is felt by the first explorer of some unknown coast, the first traverser of some remote wilderness, the first essayer of some unheard-of and perilous emprize. For such and no less was the prospect before us. We, first of all in England, nay, in Europe, attempted to enliven and embellish the plain and common way of periodical journalism by the charms of pictorial art, and to stamp the history of the time in characters more bright and vivid than the pen alone can supply. The event has demonstrated our complete success, a success which has equalled our wishes and exceeded our expectations, and whose best proof is to be found in that host of friends in every part of the United Empire who honour us with their support. For that support, not with mere lip service, but from our hearts, we thank them; and in this, as in many previous numbers, we furnish them with tokens of our gratitude, which need not that we should ourselves become the heralds of our own praises by commending them. The past is the best witness of the future, and we shall be sparing of professions and promises, as knowing that we have already established a claim to public trust and confidence, built on something more strong than such unstable and adventitious foundations.

We wish to meet our subscribers with feelings and intents congenial to the merry month, and let none doubt that former achievements will have their parallels in the future, and that whatever has already been contrived by us for the edification or amusement of universal England will be equalled, will be excelled, in numbers of this journal to come, which will at once show forth our fervent gratitude for past favours, and our determination to exhaust all the treasures that art and literature can afford, in the grateful task of ministering to the wants and wishes of this great community.

The subjects which have of late employed the creative genius of our artists will be seen by reference to the various illustrations of the many-coloured life of England which we now place before the eyes of our readers. England! that old England of our hearts, our affections, our imaginations—of Edward III., of Chaucer, of Spenser, and of Shakspere. We give the world many illustrations of by-past greatness and present glory, in the hope and trust that they will prove but the foreshadowing of means to come, the signs and tokens of future magnificence and grandeur, which will demonstrate that posterity outstrip their ancestors, and that the building of the second temple is more glorious than that of the first.

When we first started this journal we were met by many a derisive laugh of future inutility, many a sneering anticipation that we should not survive some predestinated period of three months, of six months, of nine months. Has this predestination been vanquished? Have we, or have we not, continued to flourish amidst all the difficulties that were held out to us, from the absence of political partizanship and of theological acrimony, sources of support which we have always repudiated? Never was there an hour when they raged more fiercely—never was there a time when they were more steadily avoided. In this we have the satisfaction of knowing that we have our own reward. The good wishes, the heart-felt blessings of many to whom controversy was odious, who hated the stirring-up of the waters of bitterness, when nought but strife and anger was to follow, have accompanied us in our undertaking, have cheered us on through the arduous path which we endeavoured, and have formally greeted us at the end with all the salutations which could have made labour light or success desirable. In this position we have only briefly to recal the objects which we proposed to ourselves at the outset, and which we now rejoice to see attained, not so much by our doings as by the kindness of those to whom we have already offered up our acknowledgments, and to whom we can never be sufficiently thankful.

I. We endeavoured to divert the mind of England, too exclusively devoted to politics and the incessant calls of faction, from the threadbare ground of party to the only practically-explored high places of religion, morality, and literature. To say how we accomplished the first step of this labour of Hercules would be to retrace the past history of our journal. The work is as yet only begun, and we are fully conscious of the immensity of what remains to do.

Nil actum reputans, dum quid superesset agendum shall be our motto.

II. We perceived that a love of art, not merely for its own sake, but from a deep and dearly-cherished consciousness of those high aims which its cultivation will promote and perpetuate, was growing up in the national soul of our beloved country; we determined, at all hazards, to lend our aid towards the work of directing this love of art to those high and noble purposes which we believed it best qualified to subserve—to plunge into the great ocean of human affairs, and to employ the pencil and burin in the work of illustrating not only the occurrences of the day, but the affections, the passions, the desires of men, and the faculties of the immortal soul. In this field our labours, we would fain hope, have not been in vain. We have shown how the greatest of the fine arts may be brought home to the business and bosoms of the whole human race—how all their business and all their arrangements, whether in the senate-house or the cathedral, the palace or the cot, the theatre or the market, the public walk or the garden-alley, the college-green or the village-common, the publicity of the meeting or the retirement of the domestic hearth, may be brought in all their entirety before the scrutinizing gaze of the great people of our days—the people which rules the world—the community of London, the new Rome and the Athens, and, through them, the community of the British empire—or, to use the language of the stern old satirist—

Quicquid agunt homines, votum, furor, ira, voluptas,
Gaudia, discursus, nostri est farrago libelli.

And so we enter, with our first year's day, on a new and yet old career of purveying for the people—its servants, but not its slaves. We know that the birth and progress of our journal, while it has begotten imitators, has furnished materials for speculation to the most acute minds of France and Germany. Conscious of our power for good or evil, we shall pursue the course of which we have hitherto given our earnest, unbiassed by temporary considerations, unawed by the frowns of power, from whatever quarter directed, and hoping one day to see realized that ever-glorious prophecy of "Peace on earth, and good will to men." Yet we will not close without another word. The entire and intimate union, not merely on parchment, but in reality in the inmost heart of all our fellow-subjects, of the three kingdoms of England, Scotland, and Ireland, is one object for which we have always toiled. Something towards this we have effected, and although, for a moment at least, in one of the kingdoms circumstances may seem to have put it in jeopardy, we shall never cease to bear in view that great command of nature which has ordered the British islands, one and indivisible,

To rule mankind, and bid the world obey,
Disposing peace and war their own majestic way.

ROCK GARDEN—BOTANIC GARDENS, REGENT'S PARK.

The first exhibition of the Royal Botanic Society took place, on Wednesday, in their garden, in the Regent's Park. The fête included a display of flowers, under arrangements similar to those observed by the Horticultural Society at Chiswick. It was, we believe, the first occasion of the gardens being opened to visitors. A considerable number of persons, including many of the highest rank, were present, among whom were their Royal Highnesses the Duke and Duchess of Cambridge and the Princess Augusta. The bands of the Horse Guards and the Blues were in attendance, and performed many popular airs, and thus contributed not a little to the gratification of the numerous fair and fashionable promenaders.

The principal attractions were the flowers, and the arrangements made for their exhibition were extensive and complete. The main gravel walk, from the entrance, led up to a most spacious marquee, in the centre of the grounds, in which and three others, of considerable dimensions, the blooms were ranged. Other smaller pavilions were raised in different parts of the garden, in one of which some microscopes of great power were placed, through which, amongst other interesting phenomena that were revealed, was the circulation of juice in the vegetable structure. The display of flowers was very extensive, and fairly competed with that at Chiswick. The plants were all in the freshest condition; the azaleas, more particularly, were remarkable for the healthy delicacy of their blooms. The pelargonium tribe was also represented by a most liberal supply of plants. The erinceus and speciosus varieties were rather prevailing, and also, the calceolarias and fuchsias. There was a fair review of the heartsease, but the rose cuttings were not very abundant. For individual flowers, perhaps, the Cactus speciosissimus exceeded in grandeur all others. The prizes had been adjudged before the hour of general admission; they consisted of gold and silver medals, silver vases, and other pieces of plate, varying in value from 10s. to £15; the total amount being £600 for plants and flowers, and £10 10s. for microscopes.

The Royal Botanic Society was incorporated in 1839 and nearly all the members of the Royal Family have given it their patronage. The council consists of 33 noblemen and gentlemen; and the whole of the fellows and members exceeds 600. The garden comprises about 18 acres, and occupies the largest portion of the inner circle of the Regent's Park, previously occupied as Sir Stirling's nursery-ground, and the society purchased his stock for £2000. A great part of the garden has been laid out ornamentally and planted; and it is proposed to erect conservatories, hothouses, a lecture-room, library, museum, &c. Among the earliest operations commenced were the formation of a Medicinal Garden, and a collection of plants applicable to agriculture, the arts, and manufactures. The plan has been formed conjointly by Mr. Decimus Burton, the architect, and Mr. Marnock, the curator of the gardens. The grounds have been considerably advanced since last season, and there is now part of them which has not been laid out; and a mound of considerable elevation has been raised, from the summit of which is obtained a view of the whole gardens and the neighbourhood. The engraving shows one of the portions completed—the Rock Garden, with a plantation of Coniferæ and a small pond, between the Agricultural Garden and the Terrace. At the fête on Wednesday, amongst other objects of interest exhibited in the grounds was the model of a vast conservatory, or winter garden, which it is the purpose of the society to erect.

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

FRANCE.—(From our own Correspondent.)—PARIS, May 23.—The laws by which the French intend governing the new islands of Marquesas, and to which Englishmen are to be subjected, are well worthy of serious consideration, and I trust will attract the attention of some member in the House of Commons. The first article of the new rules runs thus:—"A council of war shall take cognizance in the Marquesas Islands of, 1st, all offensive and criminal acts committed by individuals, either Frenchmen or foreigners; 2dly, of all offensive and criminal acts committed by the inhabitants against the safety of the colony, or against the person or property of Frenchmen or foreigners." Now, I do not for a moment wish to find fault with any regulations the French Government may think proper to impose on their colonies. I do not intend to discuss the policy of subjecting uncivilized people to the military law, of which they can know nothing, and which for many years they will not be able to appreciate. The French are justly gaining the confidence of their colonies may or may not be good. Perhaps Algeria may be an example against them. My only object is the protection of my countrymen, and that they may not be subject to the non-protecting laws of a council of war, and be at the mercy of a colonel and his staff, without the British Government demanding for them a sufficient guarantee. This can only be secured by the presence of a British consul, and I trust one will soon sent out. Another article of the new code says, "The ranks and penalties pronounced by the council of war shall, at the option of the judge, be inflicted in conformity with the military Code of the French Penal Metropolitan Code of 1810, modified by the law of the 28th of April, 1832, or by those established by local decree." So that a poor unfortunate stranger, after having been

It was impossible to say, because they adopted a fixed duty by this bill, that they were establishing the principle of a fixed duty in preference to that of the sliding scale. It was to be remembered that in Canada they had no corn average, and that it would, therefore, be impossible to carry out such a sliding scale in that country as was so easily adopted in this. It was of the greatest importance to conciliate the people of Canada, without whose good-will and affection that colony would prove to be the weakest point in the British empire. Those who were opposing the bill were acting, he feared, in the same spirit towards Canada as being by itself in the proposition for the extinction of the legislature of Jamaica.—Lord J. Russell said, he heard with considerable pain the right honourable baronet's declaration, that Canada was one of the most dangerous parts of the empire.—Sir R. Peel said, "if not treated with cordial good feeling."—Lord J. Russell said, that, even qualified as the right honourable baronet had just qualified it, it was a most injudicious declaration, and a highly improper one for a person in the position of the right honourable baronet to make. He denied that there was anything unconstitutional in agreeing to the amendment, or anything mortifying to her Majesty, however painful it might be to the right honourable baronet. It was only intimating to her Majesty the opinion of the House of Commons that a certain course of proceeding would not be advisable, although recommended by the right honourable baronet and his colleagues. For his own part he had no objection to give to the Canadians the boon they required; but he would not have imposed upon them the anomalous condition of placing a three-shilling duty on the importation of American grain into Canada, for he could easily conceive that such a duty might prove very prejudicial to the consumer in Canada. The noble lord taunted the Government with their ill-success in endeavouring to keep most parts of the empire in a state of quietude, and referred to the condition of Scotland and Ireland as an exemplification of the mischievous effects of their course of policy. With respect to the Corn-laws, he could not wonder that the agriculturists were slow to place unbounded confidence in the Government, for he had himself seen nothing but the most deceptive statements on the part of Ministers on that subject, and a shuffling from one principle to another, such as was sufficient to destroy the confidence of their agricultural friends altogether.—The gallery was then cleared for a division, when the amendment was negatived by a majority of 364 to 156.—Lord Stanley then said he would propose to go into committee, pro forma, to make some verbal alterations in the resolutions he intended to propose, and he would then move that on Friday they should be taken into consideration.

—Sir J. Graham said,—Mr. M. J. O'Connell inquired whether it was certain that the Government would proceed with the bill on Monday? An expected several friends from Ireland to oppose the measure, and it would be a great inconvenience to them to have it brought on so soon.—Sir J. Graham said, there was no certainty about it; but it was the intention of the Government to bring it on on Monday, if they could get through these resolutions on Friday. Lord Clements inquired whether it were the intention of Government to take up the Irish Arms Bill on Epsom race-day, and carry it through with Derby speed? (Laughter.)—The house then adjourned.

HOUSE OF LORDS. Tuesday.

After the presentation of several petitions, Lord Brougham complained of the delay which occurred in dealing with the new Bankruptcy Court Lords, and attributed it to jealousy on the part of the Commons, who were at present in possession of their Lordships' old and very convenient House.—The Marquis of Lansdowne explained the cause of the stoppage of the work to be the non-arrival of certain stone, without which the architect could not proceed.—The Marquis of Clanricarde gave notice for Friday of a question relative to advances made by the Board of Works in Ireland.

The Earl of Powis moved the second reading of a bill for repealing the act by which the bishoprics of Bangor and St. Asaph were united into one see. He was impelled to undertake this duty by a sense of duty to the Church, and he was encouraged to proceed by the approbation of the two right rev. prelates who presided over those dioceses. It was an historical fact, that the proposition for the separation of those sees and that for the creation of a bishopric at Manchester were simultaneous, from which fact he inferred that the one measure was subsidiary to the other. Now, whatever objections might be entertained by others, he had no objection to adding another bishop to their lordships' house, provided the creation of a bishopric should be deemed essential to the best interests of the vast population of Manchester. He thought not, however, he thought necessary or expedient that the bishop of a newly erected bishopric should be called upon to exercise parliamentary duties; and he would suggest that the Bishop of Manchester should not have a seat in Parliament, but that he should succeed to the first vacancy in the sees of Durham, London, or Winchester. With respect to income, he would observe that if political expediency were objectionable, ecclesiastical expediency must be more so. Instead, therefore, of applying the revenue of St. Asaph or Bangor to the endowment of a bishopric at Manchester, he thought they might advantageously adopt the suggestion of Sir R. Peel, and anticipate Queen Anne's bounty for that purpose. At least until a vacancy should occur in the archbishopric of York, when there would be ample funds for that purpose. He also thought that the great revenues derived from Wales by Jesus College and other colleges of Oxford, and more than one English bishopric and the revenues of the sinecure rectories, which were to be carried to the general purposes of the Ecclesiastical Fund, might have been properly appropriated to the maintenance of the Welsh bishopric. He objected also to exchanging the deanery of houses, was inhabited by 500 families, of whose members 538 adults were unable to read; 239 children, from eight to fourteen years of age, unable to read, and who have never attended Sabbath or day-schools; and 280 families unprovided with the Scriptures. Out of the whole number, comprehending upwards of 2000 souls, only four individuals attended any place of worship; and those were Roman Catholics!"

The last of the missionary meetings was held on May 13, when the assembled in Finsbury Chapel.—Lord Morpeth in the chair. The meeting was addressed by C. Hindley, Esq., M.P.; Rev. Dr. Vaughan; Rev. T. Binney; Rev. J. Burnet; Rev. T. Adkins; Rev. J. J. Freeman; Rev. J. Hill; J. R. Mills, Esq.; Rev. T. Smith.

COLONIAL MISSIONARY SOCIETY

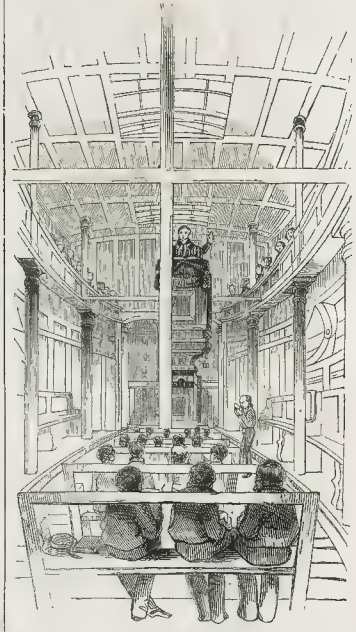
Rev. A. Wells read the report. It gave a concise history of the society's labours at its various stations in Canada, New Zealand, and South Australia, during the past year. Such had been the depressed state of the colonies, that considerable aid had been required by the missionaries from the parent society; there were, however, indications of renewed prosperity, and it was therefore hoped that the demands during the succeeding year being decreased, fresh scenes of usefulness might be occupied. There had been a very serious decline in the amount of funds received, and had it not been for a legacy of £500 bequeathed by the late Mrs. James, of Birmingham, the institution would have been £1000 in debt.

In leaving the missionary societies for the year we would recommend them in the interim to devote a portion of their funds to the advancement of a knowledge of the geography of missions. The charitable sympathies of the public to be permanent must be definite and well-informed, but there is no subject on which it is so grossly ignorant as the localities and geographical relations of missions.

Meetings, dinners, and anniversary festivals of a vast number of societies for the relief of the physical ills of man have been held in various parts of the metropolis, but we have only room to notice one,



INTERIOR OF THE FLOATING CHURCH.

THE INDIGENT BLIND VISITING SOCIETY,

who held their anniversary on Tuesday, 16th, at the Music Hall, Store-street, Lord Ashley in the chair. The object of the society is to assist and ameliorate the condition of the blind poor resident in London and its vicinity—1st, by providing them with Bibles and Testaments of the authorised version, without note or comment; 2nd, with daily readers of the same; 3rd, with conductors to church; by recommending suitable objects to the blind asylum, and by affording temporal relief in necessitous cases. It appeared from the statement of the speakers that it has been calculated there are upwards of four thousand blind persons in or near the vicinity of the metropolis, but not more than one hundred and twenty of that number are as yet, owing to the poverty of the society, brought within the sphere of its beneficent operations. The noble institution in St. George's Fields for the education and support of the indigent blind received many grateful notices from the company. To quicken the charity of our friends we have had a view of it engraved; for, large as it is, and munificent as are its endowments and supporters, it is wholly inadequate to the wants of the sightless poor.

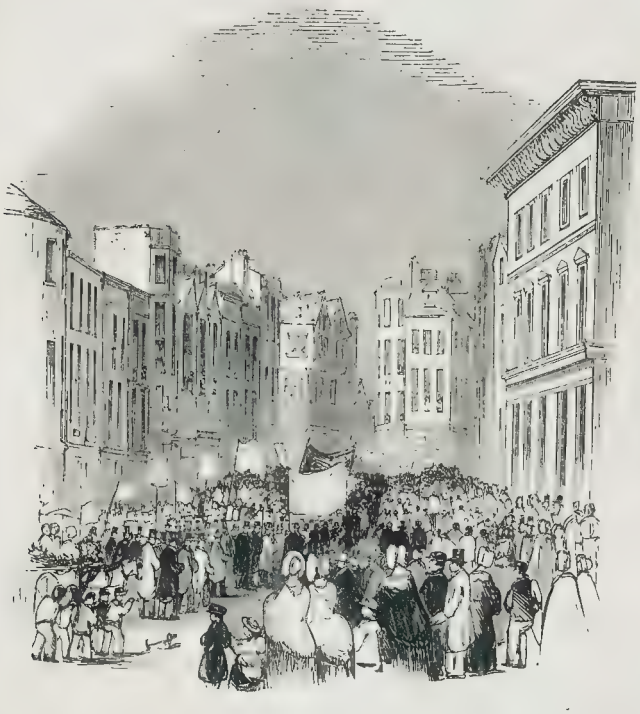
The Temperance meetings have closed the week. The most important was that of

THE BRITISH AND FOREIGN TEMPERANCE SOCIETY,

May 23rd.—Music Hall, Store-street.—Lord Teignmouth in the chair, in the absence of the Bishop of Norwich, who had been announced.

The report stated that in 1832 the number of persons charged with drunkenness was 32,636, in 1842 it was 12,338, being a decrease of 20,298. The decrease in the number of beer-shops in England and Wales, in 1843, as compared with the preceding year, was 2499, and 3830 as compared with 1839. The total quantity of malt converted into liquor in all the distilleries of the kingdom, in 1840, was 3,947,000 quarters, in 1841 it was 3,795,000 quarters, a decrease of 150,000 quarters. The consumption of spirits, in 1830, was not so much, by 5,000,000 gallons, as in 1820; and in 1840 the decrease, as compared with 1830, was 2,087,000 gallons. Illicit distillation has increased in Ireland: 143 persons had been charged with that crime in the three months ending January, 1842, and 1040 were similarly charged in the corresponding quarter of the present year. The principles of the society were progressing throughout Europe. The receipts of the year amounted to only £473 18s. 6½d., and the expenditure to £451 3s. 2d. A debt was due by the society, amounting to £212 8s. The Rev. W. Rothery, Rev. Owen Clarke, and other ministers and gentlemen made energetic appeals to the meeting upon the great principles of temperance, which were heartily responded to by the assembly; and, after a vote of thanks to the chairman, and briefly acknowledged by him, the meeting separated.

NEW ONE PENNY LONDON ILLUSTRATED



TEMPERANCE FESTIVAL AT READING.

The first anniversary of the Berkshire Temperance Association was celebrated on Tuesday week; when Reading, the capital and centre of the county, and the spot fixed upon for the day's proceedings, was a scene of unusual interest and excitement. At nine o'clock the Rechabites, teetotallers, and their friends, poured in from the towns and villages of this and the adjacent counties. The famous "Witney teetotal brass band," which had arrived the previous evening, met the visitors at the several entrances of the town, and ushered them into the first anniversary of their association. While some were thus engaged in receiving their friends others were finishing the preparations on the ground, where the ladies, who had undertaken the superintendence of the "tea," were tastefully decorating their tables. For the use of the association was set apart a field, about a mile and a quarter from the market-place; and here was raised for the occasion an entirely new tent, about 180 feet in length and between 60 and 70 feet in width; and, had the weather proved more auspicious, the whole would have been a splendid entertainment. At the appointed hour, two o'clock, the procession was formed on the ground, and thence proceeded through the principal streets of the town, accompanied by three large teetotal brass bands, with many handsome and appropriate flags and banners. At half past four they returned to the tent, where had arrived Josiah Hunt, Esq., of Bristol; John Hull, of Uxbridge; and the Rev. Jabez Burns, of London; the company, now amounting to more than two thousand, commenced "tea." Notwithstanding this vast concourse of visitors the arrangements were so complete as to prevent inconvenience or confusion. The Chairman, Benjamin Rotch, Esq., of Lowlands (barrister and chairman of the Middlesex board of magistrates), having arrived, the public meeting commenced; and as the company had by this time considerably increased in numbers, it was necessary to form two parties, it being found impossible for the speakers to be heard by the entire meeting. The portion held at the bottom of the tent was addressed by working men; the other, after a few remarks from the chairman, by John Hull, Esq., Josiah Hunt, Esq., and the Rev. Jabez Burns, who spoke eloquently at considerable length, and it is with regret that we are compelled, for want of space, to omit a lengthened report of their speeches. One of the most interesting features of the meeting was the presentation of a handsome Parisian timepiece to the agent of the Association, Mr. John Faulkner, as a token of the esteem and respect in which he is held throughout the county, when the eloquence of the chairman called forth one burst of acclamation, as did Mr. Faulkner in his feeling reply. The day passed off with considerable éclat, and the meeting was adjourned until half-past six o'clock on the following evening in that place.

THE TEA TENT.

THE ISLEWORTH CHARITY SCHOOLS.

In the year 1647 Mrs. Elizabeth Hill bequeathed her residence, the Town House of Isleworth, and certain lands at Langley, in Buckinghamshire, for the purpose of educating the poor children of the parish of Isleworth; and, in 1672, Mrs. Ann Oliver bequeathed various properties in Isleworth for the same purpose. The latter were sold, and the proceeds applied to the purchase of land at Orpington, in Kent. The yearly rents of the above property were employed to carry into effect the intention of these ladies; and, until 1715, the poor children assembled at the workhouse, then situated at Brentford End, to be taught by the master and matron. During that year a master and mistress were appointed, the Town House was appropriated for their residence, and the schools were established there. At this time a foundation-deed was executed by the parish in the public vestry, stipulating that the schools should be conducted according to the principles of the Church of England; and, in order to carry more fully into operation the object of giving instruction to the poor, a subscription was entered into, from which, and from subsequent donations, have arisen the resources from which the schools have been to the present time supported. In the year 1814 the national system of education, as it is termed, was introduced into these schools, and a large sum of money expended in enlarging the rooms; but the original building was so old, inconvenient, and unsafe, that in 1840 it was found indispensably necessary to pull it down, and the present building was erected in the following year from a plan by Mr. C. F. Maltby, selected from a variety of others. It stands on the site of the original building in Isleworth-square, to which it forms a handsome ornament. The management of the schools (which contain 100 boys and 60 girls, many of whom are clothed out of the funds) is vested in trustees resident in the parish; the vicar and parochial officers for the time being are trustees ex officio. Mr. and Mrs. Winkworth are the present master and mistress, having lately succeeded Mr. and Mrs. Adams, who held the situation about 28 years. The Right Hon. Lord Prudhoe presented the trustees with an excellent clock for the turret of these schools on the occasion of his marriage with the Lady E. Grosvenor, August 25, 1842.

THE ISLEWORTH CHARITY SCHOOLS.

The new school is of Gothic character, built of brick, with Bath stone mouldings, and contains a boys' school-room, 40 feet by 21 feet; a girls' school-room, 30 feet by 20 feet, with coned fittings; a committee-room, 18 feet 6 inches by 12 feet 6 inches; retiring rooms for the master and mistress, and storeroom. The lower part is formed with cloisters, and comprises play-grounds for boys and girls, washing-rooms, &c. There is also an engine-house attached to the building. The cost, exclusive of fittings, amounted to the sum of £1242 6s. 7d.

Isleworth is a remarkably salubrious place, and its situation on the banks of the Thames renders it agreeable and lively. The vicinity is picturesque and diversified, and it is within a short distance of the most popular resorts of the Londoners, many of whom prefer its comparative retirement to the more crowded neighbourhoods of Richmond and Hampton Court, &c. The derivation of the name of the village is uncertain. In Doomsday it is called Gieslesworde; in subsequent records Yhistleworth, Istelworth, and Isilleworth. In the time of Queen Elizabeth it was called Thistleworth; but, for above a century, it has been uniformly spelt Isleworth. It is a word of three syllables—Isle-worth—not, as some pronounce it, Isleworth; or, as it is sometimes vulgarly called, Isleworth. The Duke of Northumberland is lord of the manor; and his magnificent residence, Syon House, stands near the Thames, a short distance from Isleworth Church. Both structures are well known to the lovers of Thames scenery.

CURIOUS IF TRUE.—A NON-INTRUSION OMEN.—The Edinburgh Witness has the following:—"The morning levee of the Lord Commissioner had been marked by an incident of a somewhat extraordinary nature, and which history, though in these days little disposed to mark prodigies and omens, will scarce fail to record. The crowd in the chamber of presence was very great, and there was, we believe, a considerable degree of confusion and pressure in consequence. Suddenly—whether brushed by some passer-by, jostled rudely aside, or merely affected by the tremor of the floor communicated to the partitioning—a large portrait of William III., that had held its place in Holyrood for nearly a century and a half, dropped heavily from the walls. 'There,' exclaimed a voice from the crowd—'there goes the Revolution Settlement!'"

THE CHURCHES OF THE METROPOLIS.—No. XXXI

ST. MARY'S CHURCH, SOUTHWARK.

This plain but interesting structure has just been completed from the designs of Mr. B. Ferrey, who, in his treatment of the building has shown much discretion in not attempting too much, but endeavouring to produce effect rather by form than by decoration. He has, accordingly, omitted the usual appendage of a steeple or tower, and contenting himself with placing a small bell-turret over the gable of the west end, has compensated for the plainness of the design in other respects by variety of outline. The situation is on a very confined piece of ground near the Old Kent-road, which allows of no approach being made to the church on the west side, and, accordingly, that end of the building is to be left quite plain, as it cannot be viewed at all from any public road. The east end, on the contrary, comes into view at the termination of Clarence-street, which it faces in a direct line. The style adopted is early English, with high pitched roof and gable, and the plan (85 feet in length internally) cruciform; owing to which, and to the transepts being somewhat lower than the body of the church, considerable variety is given to the whole exterior. There are three entrances, one on the north, and two on the south side. The whole is of brickwork, with stone dressings, except the east end, which is faced with flint-work similar to that of St. Saviour's, Southwark. The church will contain seats for 1200 persons, and its cost has been estimated at about £4200. It will very shortly be consecrated, and opened for divine service.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON, SATURDAY, MAY 27, 1843.

The state of Ireland has lately been such as to excite the liveliest regret and apprehensions in the breast of every well-wisher to the harmony and repose of that interesting portion of our Sovereign's dominions, as well as of every one who desires to see the strength and stability of the united empire unimpaired. Discord and dissension raging where tranquility and concord lately prevailed, the minds of men agitated and disturbed by vague forebodings of coming evil; the calm course of improvement arrested, and the capital which so lately flowed so plenteously over the land, diffusing its bounties through a thousand channels, and sending abundance into the remotest corners of the land, now locked up from us, as if the storm of rebellion was devastating the fair face of the Isle of Saints; that peace threatened for which was lately so profound, and the frightful shadows of civil war blackening the distant horizon. Such is the peculiar position, not overcharged, which it is now our duty to place before our readers in its frightful verity. Those who doubt the depth and reality of the evils which distract Ireland require to be informed that Government engineers have lately been inspecting the state of the fortresses, and ascertaining the extent of searching measures and resources at the disposal of the state, as if the times of '98 were again approaching, and the country was about to be plunged into the miseries of a protracted civil contest.

The causes of these evils lie deep, and cry aloud for speedy investigation and immediate removal. Never was subject more worthy the attention of the statesman; never was there a time which more required the gentle yet searching application of the probing hand of cautious amelioration. Two years ago, when the administration of Irish affairs was committed to the hands of Lord Eliot, a man who had gained well-deserved laurels by his labours in the cause of humanity, and rendered service to the state by the negociation of the convention which bears his name, by which the horrors of the Spanish war were allayed, and its cruelties mitigated, the prospect for Ireland seemed bright and beautiful. Men expected that a period was at length to be put to the strife and tumult to which Ireland had long been a prey; that she was for the future to advance with a giant's speed and strength in the career of improvement, and that the golden days which she enjoyed under the sway of her own indigenous princes, so famed in song, were to return. That these hopes have been disappointed, and the seemingly clear vista of the future was clouded, we have already told our readers.

We do not lay all the blame and responsibility of this unhappy change at the door of the Government, yet it would require greater trust than we have ever put in statesmen, and a greater share of credulity than is generally retained by those who have closely and carefully watched the current of public affairs, to acquit them of all culpability. Of the Poor Law, and the discontents which its administration has excited, we have already spoken at large in former numbers. Of the provocation which has been offered to the Repeal agitation, by the misapplication of patronage, much might also be said. But these topics of grievance are light indeed compared with the more serious grounds of complaint presented by the total absence of all encouragement for the works which are rendered so necessary by the peculiar circumstances of Ireland. What progress, we ask, has been made in offering to her the benefits of that improved system of communication, the offspring of our own days, which is now so rapidly changing the face of the world around us? What steps have been taken for the construction of the harbours which the increasing commerce of the country demands, for deepening the channels and improving the navigation of those rivers which a beneficent policy would soon cover with ships bearing the treasures of the East and the West to enrich that long-suffering population, whom neglect or misgovernment has stricken with poverty, in the midst of a land which nature seems to have destined, in the Scriptural phrase, to flow with milk and honey, to be the granary and storehouse of Western Europe? Then there is the deadening influence of the modern system of centralisation, which has removed many of her domestic institutions to the metropolis of Britain, and deprived her of the public services of those who best know the wants and wishes of her people. Never, perhaps, has this evil been more fatally felt than in the removal of the Excise Board, and the consequent stringent regulations which this arrangement has drawn with it. The importance of this matter will be appreciated by those who reflect, that almost the only manufacture which time or tyranny has preserved in Ireland—we mean that of her distilleries—falls directly under the cognizance of this want of administration. New impediments have been thrown in the way of those engaged in this traffic, and, as a necessary consequence, persecutions have increased; while the stimulus given to the spirit of malevolence and avarice has received a fearful increase of force by the measure which shares the spoils of legal powers between the Government and the informer. These are points which demand instant consideration; and not less urgent is the necessity of a remedy for illicit distillation, so frightfully increased by the financial policy of last year, which imposed a large increase of the duty on spirits. Circumstances have shown that this was a complete miscalculation, and that the miserable amount which the Treasury has received is no compensation for inconveniences to the legal trader, as well as for the increase of general insecurity and turbulence which has resulted. There must be some gross ignorance or inattention in the heads of the Revenue, when a gun-brig could be commissioned to watch the coast for the suppression of smuggling, which, as everybody knows, is carried on in the interior. What could Colonel Brereton and the heads of the revenue police be about? And what exquisite administrative talent was shown by the loquacious Chairman of the Board of Excise, who closed the treasury to the appeals of the Irish distillers, in order to bring the trade more completely within the grasp of his own official harpies, and gain a more extensive field for the exercise of his own peculiar power of mismanagement! Strange specimens these of the talent for business from which so much was expected in the new Government!

THE COURT AND HAUT TON.

CLAREMONT.—Her Majesty and Prince Albert, the ladies and gentlemen of the royal suite, and the royal household, attended divine service on Sunday morning at Claremont. The Hon. and Rev. Charles Courtenay, domestic chaplain, officiated. On Monday morning the Queen and Prince Albert walked in the royal park, and in the afternoon took a drive in an open pony carriage. Sir Robert and Lady Gardiner had the honour of joining the royal circle at dinner. On Tuesday his Royal Highness Prince Albert rode out on horseback. Sir Frederick Stovin was expected to arrive at Claremont to succeed Sir Robert Otway as Groom in Waiting on her Majesty.

THE QUEEN'S BIRTHDAY.—At an early hour on Wednesday morning the band of the 1st Regiment of Life Guards, which had arrived at Esher from town on the preceding evening, proceeded to Claremont, and performed a serenade under the window of the mansion, concluding the performance. About eight o'clock, with "God save the Queen." Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent arrived at Claremont in a carriage and four from town, at half-past one o'clock, and was received with her Majesty and Prince Albert. The Maids of Honour in Waiting, the Hon. Misses Stanley and Hamilton, arrived shortly afterwards at Claremont from town. Soon after four o'clock the dinner party left Claremont for a drive, her Majesty and Prince Albert in a pony phaeton; her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent and the Maids of Honour in an open carriage and four; and the gentlemen of the party, Prince George of Cambridge, Lord in Waiting, Colonel the Hon. Charles Grey and Colonel Wylde, the Equerries in Waiting, on horseback. The royal dinner party at Claremont consisted of her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent; Lord in Waiting, the Countess of Desmore; the Dowager Lady Lyttelton; the Maids of Honour in Waiting; the Marquis of Exeter, the Earl of Liverpool, the Earl Delawarr, the Earl of Jersey, Baron Stockmar, and Henry Greville, Esq., which were totally destroyed, together with a quantity of corn and instruments of husbandry contained therein. Likewise information that, on the night of the 18th inst., a stack of wheat, the property of Mr. Henry Farncombe, in the parish of Ickleshem, in the county of Oxford, was wilfully set on fire and destroyed.

A melancholy accident occurred at the house of Mr. Bentley, the publisher, in Old Burlington-street, on Sunday last, when that gentleman's son, Ernest, a fine promising boy, of seven years old, was killed by falling from the top of the stairs. The child was accustomed to amuse himself by sliding down the bannisters, a practice which parents and servants would do well to guard against.

On Tuesday morning a waterman, named Scott, belonging to Execution Dock Stairs, found the body of a man floating in the water, which he caused to be taken ashore, and it was soon afterwards removed to the dead-house in Wapping churchyard. The body, which was in a very advanced stage of decomposition, at the after-examination was identified as that of John Buckley, a labourer, who was drowned on the evening of Thursday, the 4th instant, by a boat, in which he and twelve other persons were, being capsized by a man named William Hoskins, the mate of the Duke of Cornwall steam-ship. Another man, named Matthew Holland, was drowned at the same time; and a verdict of "Manslaughter" was returned by a coroner's jury, and Hoskins is now in Newgate, awaiting his trial.

NARROW ESCAPE.—On Saturday last, about four o'clock in the afternoon, Mr. H. Beverly, formerly the lessee of the Royal Victoria Theatre, and at present engaged at the Marylebone Theatre, was stepping into an omnibus at Charing-cross, for the purpose of proceeding to the Marylebone Theatre, when the horses suddenly moved on, and Mr. Beverley was thrown into the road. Before he could recover himself the front wheel of the vehicle passed, and the two rear wheels went over both legs, leaving the other part of his body unhurt; his legs, however, were severely bruised and lacerated, though not broken, but the injuries he received were so great as to render it necessary that he should be conveyed to his residence, where he has since been under medical treatment, and it has been found that, although severely injured, there is at present no danger to be apprehended.

FATAL ACCIDENT.—On Wednesday an accident occurred in the dock-yard, Woolwich, which was attended with fatal consequences. It appears a labourer named James Mellish, while engaged in burning a cistern, for the ladyship, perceiving that the air from the window was likely to extinguish the candle, put it on the ground beside her. The servant had scarcely reached the bottom of the stairs before the screams of her mistress for assistance were heard, and her self-possession reached the top of the first stairs before her daughters and domestics could come to her aid. By this time the poor lady's entire person was enveloped in flames, which were promptly extinguished. Drs. Guthrie and Evans were quickly in attendance, but such was the fearful extent of the injuries received, that, after passing a restless night, she was released from her sufferings at an early hour on Saturday morning. Her ladyship had not survived her husband quite two months.

DEATH OF THE DOWAGER VISCOUNTESS ANSON.—We have to announce the death of the Viscountess Anson, who expired at her residence in Harley-street, on Wednesday morning, after a short illness. Her ladyship was third and youngest daughter of the late Earl of Leicester (Mr. Coke, of Holkham), by his first marriage with Jane, sister of the late Lord Sherborne.

METROPOLITAN NEWS.

CAMBRIDGE ELECTION COMMITTEE.—This protracted case closed at three o'clock on Thursday, after an able reply on the part of the sitting member by his learned counsel, Mr. Austin. The committee then adjourned until Friday to consider their report.

SPITALFIELDS SCHOOL OF DESIGN.—On Tuesday took place, in Crosby Hall, Bishopsgate-street, the annual distribution of prizes to the more successful pupils in the Spitalfields School of Design. That gratifying duty was performed by Lord Robert Grosvenor. The Chairman, in presenting the prizes, very satisfactorily and appropriately dwelt on the merits of the students, and of the advantages that must ensue in the improvement of our manufactures by the existence of this institution.

On Tuesday, at two o'clock, a deputation from the Metropolitan Improvement Society, consisting of Lord Robert Grosvenor, Mr. W. E. Hickson, Mr. C. Fowler, Mr. G. Godwin, and Mr. H. Austin, had an interview with the commissioners for improving the communications of the metropolis, in Whitehall-place. The object of the deputation was a new line of roadway, partly running along an embankment on the north side of the Thames, to connect the great Essex road with the west end of London. A plan showing the projected line was submitted to the commissioners.

THE NEXT MAILS FOR INDIA.—The following notices have been put up at the general Post-office, St. Martin's-le-Grand, and at the several branch offices in Lombard-street, Charing-cross, Old Cavendish-street, and Blackman-street, Borough: "The next mails for Malta, Greece, the Ionian Islands, Egypt, and India, via Falmouth, will be despatched hence (General Post-office) on Wednesday, the 31st instant." "The next mail for India, &c., via Marseilles, will be despatched hence (General Post-office) on Monday, the 5th of June next."

SUDDEN DEATH OF MR. FREDERICK TYRRELL.—We regret to announce the sudden death of this able and eminent surgeon, which took place on Tuesday at the Auction Mart, Bartholomew-lane. The sale of the freehold of Mr. Tyrrell's country residence, called East lodge, situate at Acton, Middlesex, of which Mr. Tyrrell held the lease, was advertised to take place by Mr. George Robins, and Mr. Tyrrell intended to become the purchaser. About half-past two o'clock Mr. Tyrrell, who had been visiting a patient in South-street, Finsbury, entered the sale-room and gave some instructions to a gentleman whom he had deputed to bid for the property. While he was conversing with his friend in a most cheerful manner, he was suddenly attacked with illness and left the room. He had scarcely reached the door when he was observed to stagger, and in attempting to lay hold of the bannisters he fell. Several persons, and among others the porter of the Mart, raised him from the ground, and messengers were sent in all directions for medical aid, but long before any of the faculty arrived Mr. Tyrrell was no more. He lived not more than two minutes.

THE seventh anniversary dinner of the Metropolitan Free Hospital was given on Tuesday at the Freemason's Tavern, his Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge in the chair. Nearly 300 gentlemen sat down to a most excellent entertainment. Mr. Chance, the honorary secretary, read the report of the institution, by which it appeared that the principle upon which the hospital was founded was that of affording gratuitous relief, medical and surgical, to poor sick applicants of every creed and clime, without requiring from them letters of recommendation or any other introduction than sickness and poverty. It was opened in May, 1838, and since that period it had afforded gratuitous relief to upwards of 50,000 poor persons. The subscriptions announced during the evening amounted to upwards of £600.

TRINITY TERM.—Thursday being the first day of Trinity Term, the Lord Chancellor and the judges proceeded to Westminster-hall, and opened their respective courts at ten o'clock, the ancient practice of meeting at the Lord Chancellor's house on the morning of the first day of every term having been abandoned as regards Trinity and Hilary Terms, as will not be observed in future on the first day of Michaelmas and Easter Terms.

IMPORTANT FLAW IN THE GRINDING ACT.—According to the Grinding Act, in putting certain articles of bounty biscuits into bond, certain quantities of foreign wheat may be taken into consumption free of duty; but the Act does not state that this flour so put into bond shall be of British manufacture, or the produce of British agriculture. In consequence of this omission, duty-paid American flour may be put in bond, and a corresponding quantity of foreign wheat taken into consumption free of duty.

On Wednesday a Court of Directors was held at the East India House, when it was resolved, that, in reference to the present state of the Council of India, the term of Mr. William Wilberforce Bird's future service should be extended for one year beyond the prescribed period, and it was also resolved that Mr. Frederick Millett be appointed a provisional member of the Council of India.

We understand that the Earl of Dalhousie has been appointed Vice President to the Board of Trade.

ACCIDENTS AND OFFENCES.

EXTRAORDINARY ACCIDENT.—A dreadful and melancholy accident occurred on board the Caledonia steam-ship, Captain Cheesman, on her last passage from Hamburg to London, to a lad named William Butcher. It appears that the unfortunate youth had been sent up to the foretopmasthead on some duty, when, unfortunately, he let go his hold and fell, in his descent passing through one of the fore skylights and completely through the wood of the engine on to the floor of the engine-room. It was then discovered that he had received an extensive fracture of the skull, and that several of his ribs were broken, besides contusions in various parts of the body, one of which, of a dangerous nature, is on the throat. But slight hopes are entertained of his ultimate recovery.

RAILWAY ACCIDENT.—An accident, which we regret to say was accompanied with loss of life, occurred last week on the Glasgow and Ayrshire Railway, at the junction of the Kilmarnock and Ayr branches. When the late train from Kilmarnock had nearly arrived at the junction, one of the guards, named James Jack, in attempting to change the carriages which were to proceed to Ayr from those going to Glasgow, lost his hold and fell in betwixt the carriages, two of which passed over his body, killing him on the spot. There was a medical gentleman in the train from Ayr, who examined the body, but found life was extinct.

DARING ACTS OF INCENDIARISM.—Monday's Government Police Gazette contains the following notice of a reward of £50 for the discovery of the incendiary or incendiaries who, on the night of the 1st inst., set fire to a stack of hay, standing on the estate of the Right Hon. the Earl of Albemarle, at Quiddenham, in the county of Norfolk, by which it was wholly destroyed. Also a reward of £250 for the discovery of the persons who, on the night of the 10th inst., set fire to certain buildings at Barningham, in the county of Suffolk, the property of Mr. Henry Farncombe, in the parish of Ickleshem, in the county of Oxford, was wilfully set on fire and destroyed.

A melancholy accident occurred at the house of Mr. Bentley, the publisher, in Old Burlington-street, on Sunday last, when that gentleman's son, Ernest, a fine promising boy, of seven years old, was killed by falling from the top of the stairs. The child was accustomed to amuse himself by sliding down the bannisters, a practice which parents and servants would do well to guard against.

On Tuesday morning a waterman, named Scott, belonging to Execution Dock Stairs, found the body of a man floating in the water, which he caused to be taken ashore, and it was soon afterwards removed to the dead-house in Wapping churchyard. The body, which was in a very advanced stage of decomposition, at the after-examination was identified as that of John Buckley, a labourer, who was drowned on the evening of Thursday, the 4th instant, by a boat, in which he and twelve other persons were, being capsized by a man named William Hoskins, the mate of the Duke of Cornwall steam-ship. Another man, named Matthew Holland, was drowned at the same time; and a verdict of "Manslaughter" was returned by a coroner's jury, and Hoskins is now in Newgate, awaiting his trial.

NARROW ESCAPE.—On Saturday last, about four o'clock in the afternoon, Mr. H. Beverly, formerly the lessee of the Royal Victoria Theatre, and at present engaged at the Marylebone Theatre, was stepping into an omnibus at Charing-cross, for the purpose of proceeding to the Marylebone Theatre, when the horses suddenly moved on, and Mr. Beverley was thrown into the road. Before he could recover himself the front wheel of the vehicle passed, and the two rear wheels went over both legs, leaving the other part of his body unhurt; his legs, however, were severely bruised and lacerated, though not broken, but the injuries he received were so great as to render it necessary that he should be conveyed to his residence, where he has since been under medical treatment, and it has been found that, although severely injured, there is at present no danger to be apprehended.

FATAL ACCIDENT.—On Wednesday an accident occurred in the dock-yard, Woolwich, which was attended with fatal consequences. It appears a labourer named James Mellish, while engaged in burning a cistern, for the purpose of extracting a piston, was struck by some of the fragments, the steam having burst with a loud report, owing to the generation of steam or foul damp air which might have lodged amongst the oil. He survived but a short time after being conveyed to the Marine Hospital, for the purpose of obtaining surgical assistance.

COACH ACCIDENT.—On Wednesday morning an alarming accident happened on the Grand Parade, Brighton, to one of the Brighton and Lewes coaches. The coach had just arrived from Lewes, full inside and out, when the pole pin fell out, and the pole dragged from the coach. The horses immediately commenced violently kicking, dragged the coach on the pavement, and overturned it, throwing some of the passengers into the shop of Mr. Champion, a butcher. Two ladies were severely injured, one being cut very much about the face; the other passengers escaped with slight bruises. No blame was attached to the coachman, who is a careful, steady driver.

ALLEGED MURDER AT WOOLWICH.—On Wednesday the town of Woolwich was thrown into the greatest excitement from a report that an unfortunate female, named Mary Jones, had been murdered by another of the same class, Mary Foster. It appeared that the two females had quarrelled in Cannon-row, and went out to fight, when the unfortunate deceased struck Mary Foster, and she returned the blow, when deceased fell to the ground and lay insensible. On being assisted up she appeared quite dead to all reason, and on the point of death. Surgeon Bishop, assistant to Mr. Dennie, immediately attended, and used every means to restore animation, but the vital spark had fled on the arrival on the spot. Mary Foster was taken into custody by the police and conveyed to the station-house.

ROBBERIES.—From the coachhouse of Mr. Markham, Chester-mews, Chester-street, the property of Sir J. Muldrup, two drab greatcoats, velvet collars, and with raised plaited buttons, crest—a lion and falcon.—From the house of Mr. Hudson, 17, Addington-square, Camberwell, four silver table-spoons, three dessert, four salts, four tea-spoons, and a plated cream jug, marked J. E. H.—On Thursday a servant girl absconded from the service of Mr. Sykes, 4, Holywell-row, Shoreditch, stealing a £10 Bank of England note, two £5 notes, and 20 sovereigns. She is 19 years of age, tall, and dark complexion; dressed in a purple stuff gown, plum-coloured Orleans bonnet, dark shawl, and lavender-coloured apron.

THE BEAR NUISANCE.—Last Saturday night, as two of those beasts were passing the London Hospital, after a perambulatory exhibition, the smaller of them suddenly pranced up and seized a respectable female by the neck, and, after a struggle of some few moments, she was knocked down by her rude embracer, who soon regained his hold, and rolled her over several times. Her cries attracted a large crowd, who assisted the owner of the animal in releasing her, in the accomplishment of which, however, the poor creature received a severe blow on the arm, which, on examination, was found to be broken. She was then taken into the hospital. During the attempt to disengage the woman some of the bystanders narrowly escaped a similar union with the larger bear.

COUNTRY NEWS.

AYLESBURY.—On Saturday a special meeting of the Buckinghamshire Royal Agricultural Association was held at the George Inn, Aylesbury, the Duke of Buckingham, president, in the chair. The meeting was summoned to consider the Canada Wheat and Flour Bill, but was confined to the members of the association. His Grace presided, and there were present nearly 200 gentlemen and farmers resident in the county. There was considerable discussion, we understand, but no material difference of opinion. It was unanimously resolved to oppose Lord Stanley's resolutions with regard to the Canadian Corn Bill.

ESSEX.—WHOLESALE SHEEP-STEALING.—On Saturday James Crouch, a drover, who has resided at Loughton, in Essex, for many years, and his three sons, George, Charles, and William, were finally examined at Bow-street, on a charge of stealing 123 sheep, the property of Mr. James Wickham, a gentleman residing near Winchester. Upon the conclusion of the evidence, the magistrates committed all the prisoners to take their trial at the ensuing Quarter Sessions for Essex.

GATESHEAD.—FATAL ACCIDENT.—On Thursday week Mr. Favell held an inquest at Bensham, on the body of Mr. F. W. Shipley, of Bensham, aged thirty-one, whose death took place at eight o'clock in the morning of that day. On the previous Monday afternoon, Mr. Stanley, who was an active partner in the firm of Hawks, Stanley, and Co., was at the South Shore Ironworks, Gateshead, and Henry Emslie, the groom, had brought out his horse, that he might ride to Newcastle. The deceased, after mounting, put up his umbrella, which caused the animal to start. He then threw the umbrella to the ground, and it fell near the horse's legs. The beast made a sudden spring, dislodging the deceased from his seat, and while he was endeavouring to recover his position, a second spring threw him on to the ground. He was taken up insensible from a fracture of the skull. In this state he was removed to his residence in Saltwell-lane, Bensham, where he lingered until in a state of insensibility until Thursday week, when he expired. Mr. Stanley was one of the magistrates for Gateshead appointed by Sir James Graham.

KENT.—HOP INTELLIGENCE.—Yalding: The hop bine has made great progress this week, and looks well generally.—Brenchley: In several of our gardens the bine is very backward, owing to the ravages of the flies. In general the fines assume a yellow hue, the last being very wet and cold. A few hop flies have appeared in the sheltered situations.

MANCHESTER.—A numerous meeting of delegates from the mills and factories of the manufacturing districts in Lancashire was held on Saturday week, assembled at the rooms of the Lancashire central short time committee, London-road, Manchester, on Saturday evening, and again by adjournment, for the purpose of taking into consideration the factory bill now before Parliament. From the statements of the delegates it appeared that the operatives were unanimously of opinion that ten hours a day is the longest period to which factories should be permitted to extend.

THE LATE OUTRAGE.—There were no fewer than 23 bricklayers arrested at Manchester on suspicion of having been concerned in the late outrageous attack on Messrs. Healing and Heathcroft, and after records of the investigation which lasted nearly four days, eight of them were committed on the evening of Monday last both re Mr. Maude, to take their trial at the next Liverpool assizes. Six others have been remanded to afford time for further evidence to be obtained against them. The authorities are apprehensive lest another attack should be made upon the croft, but measures have been taken by them to secure the public peace in case of a similar outbreak. It appears that most of the fellows who were arrested on this occasion belonged to a union called the Brickmakers' Operative Association, which held its meetings at a public-house in Manchester on every Saturday night.

NEWCASTLE. THE COLLIERIES.—On Saturday a very numerous meeting of the pitmen of this district was held on the Black Fell, for the purpose of taking into consideration the present depressed state of trade. Most of the parties went in procession from their respective collieries, preceded by a band, with banners, and returned in the same order; the whole proceedings being conducted in the most orderly manner.

NOTTINGHAM.—Earl Manvers, as patron of the living of St. Mary's, Nottingham, has withheld his countenance to the subscription in progress for repairing that sacred edifice until the parish shall have conceded to the principle of a church-rate. The sum required is £3500, and £1000 more to complete the pews, sittings, &c., of the church, which was rendered useless by a threatened fall of its massive tower last December.

IRELAND.

The Evening Post of Tuesday last contains the following admirable letter from Dr. Murray, titular Archbishop of Dublin, which we trust will have its effect in restraining the Catholic clergy from engaging in the agitation now going on in Ireland:—"To the Catholic Clergy of the Diocese of Dublin.—Reverend Brethren: You must have read with extreme pain the statement lately published in the newspapers, intimating that all the Catholic bishops of Ireland had, without exception, thrown themselves as ardent repealers into the great political movement which is now agitating the country. I owe it to you to declare—and I avail myself of the first moment after my arrival in Dublin so to do—that I have taken no part whatever in that movement, and that in no instance did I give to any human being the slightest reason to suppose that I have. In January, 1834, I concurred in the resolution unanimously passed at our general episcopal meeting, recommending our clergy to abstain in future from taking any prominent part in proceedings of a merely political character. To the spirit of that resolution I strictly adhere; and I have not, by any act or word of mine, set an example at variance with it. May the God of peace, who has called you to be the dispensers of his awful mysteries, guide you in the saintly exercise of your peaceful ministry, for the promotion of his greater glory and the sanctification of those who are committed to your care. Beloved brethren, your humble and affectionate servant in Christ,—† D. MURRAY. Mountjoy-square, May 23, 1843."

A brother and sister, children of Mr. Campbell Adair, fell into a vat at Hillsboro' distillery, in the county of Down, Ireland, last week, and were scalded to death.

Mr. Hanlon, ordnance clerk of works at Enniskillen, has been dismissed for attending a repeal meeting at Kells. Mr. Hanlon is replaced here by Mr. Kilby, from Derry.

The number of electors registered in the years 1837 and 1843, respectively, in Ireland were as follows:—1837, 124,377; 1842, 109,975; decrease, 14,830.

DUBLIN, MAY 23.—REPEAL ASSOCIATION.—Notwithstanding the absence of Mr. O'Connell, the Corn Exchange, at the usual weekly meeting this day, was densely crowded, and there was fully as much excitement as at any previous meeting. The amount of "repeal rent" was the largest weekly return yet announced, having been £709 18s. 6d. This included several English returns, and £133 from Clones, county Monaghan, where the meeting of the repealers was recently interrupted by the Orange party, and a man named M'Caffray was murdered. The meeting did not terminate until nearly six o'clock, but the large room was crowded till the close. The following communication from Mr. O'Connell was read:—"Fernicy, May 20, 1843. My dear Ray * * * * The demonstration at Charleville was really magnificent—in order, regularity, peaceable demeanour, and quiet determination. A kiln-dried Quaker is said to have made an affidavit that there was danger of a breach of the peace from the meeting, and in consequence a far greater number of police were sent in than would have otherwise attended; besides, a couple of companies of the gallant 45th Regiment were harassed by an useless march from remote barracks. If the affidavit of the ci-devant Quaker was really made, and could be got at, he should be prosecuted for perjury—because no man in his senses could believe that there was any danger to the peace from a repeal meeting. Everybody knows it is our first interest, as well as our plain duty, to preserve the most peaceable conduct. We would destroy our own hopes in that respect as well as serve our enemies, by any other line of conduct. I cannot be in Dublin before Friday. If the weather prove fair to-morrow, we shall have a glorious exhibition. Emerson Tennent is a greater blockhead than we thought him, if the letter to the Protestant operatives be genuine. Believe me to be most faithfully yours,—DANIEL O'CONNELL." T. M. Ray, Esq."

Mr. O'Connell has been invited to a public meeting and dinner in Athlone. The invitation appears in the shape of a declaration, signed by Lord French, Dr. Higgins, Roman Catholic Bishop of Ardagh (whose speech at Mullingar was noticed in the House of Lords on Friday), Dr. Cantwell, Roman Catholic Bishop of Meath, Sir Michael Dillon Bellew, Bart., and many others residing in the adjacent counties.

PREPARATIONS FOR WAR.—The Dropheda Conservative contains the following:—"All the Irish forts, castles, and battlements have been inspected by a Government engineer, and ordered to be repaired and placed in a state of perfect utility. Indeed, the preparations of the Government are such as would indicate that civil war is not far distant."

EXTRAORDINARY SUICIDE OF A LADY AT HANWELL LUNATIC ASYLUM.—On Tuesday Mr. Baker, acting for Mr. Wakley, M.P., held an inquest in the Hanwell Lunatic Asylum on the body of Miss Sarah Jane Collins, aged fifty. Dr. Connolly, physician to the asylum, said: Deceased was my sister-in-law. She was of feeble mind, and, for the last two months, had been suffering from delirium. She was not an inmate of the asylum, but, on Saturday last, she came on a visit to me. She was not under medical restraint, and I had no apprehension that she was deranged. When she came she appeared in better health and spirits than usual, though I understand she had been somewhat agitated the day before her visit to me. On Saturday night she went to rest in a perfectly quiet state of mind, but at three o'clock next morning I was awakened by her coming hastily into my room, which was on the next floor, beneath the room she slept in. She asked if it was my bedroom, and if I had a light, though it was daylight at the time. She also asked if I could explain her recollections, adding that she thought it (something unexplained) meant that she should burn herself. She, moreover, said that she had been thinking of jumping out of the window. In order to gain time to dress myself, I asked her what she had dreamt well. She replied, "Yes, I have been in a sweet sleep." Observing that I was about to dress myself, she ran quickly out of my room up stairs to her own. I hastily put on my dressing-gown and ran up to her room, and knocked at the door, asking to be admitted. I received no answer, upon which I opened the door, and, looking towards the window, I saw it wide open, and deceased standing outside on the stone ledge. I ran round the bed and seized her by the left hand with my left hand, when she immediately struggled violently to throw herself off. I called for assistance, but no one heard me, and for twenty minutes I held her almost suspended, until, becoming completely exhausted, I could hold her no longer, on account of her weight and violent struggles, and then she fell into the area beneath, a depth of fifty feet. I hastened down, and found her doubled up and apparently dead, but a domestic that now came told me he heard her breathe. I have no doubt that she was insane when she committed the dreadful act. I have heard since that she told some one that "if she had destroyed herself by fire on Palm Sunday she would have been saved." Under such circumstances, if she had been an inmate of this asylum, she would have been placed in a state of confinement. Her insanity, I think, partook of a religious cast.—Verdict, "Temporary Insanity."

HATFIELD HOUSE.

The engraving represents the southern or park side of this magnificent Elizabethan mansion, on the occasion of the recent visit of his Royal Highness the Crown Prince of Wurtemburg, attended by his Excellency Baron Hugel, the Wurtemburg minister, and accompanied by Baron Mancler and Count Zeppelin. The noble possessor of Hatfield, with his characteristic hospitality, entertained the prince and his suite with a sumptuous luncheon, at which a select party met his Royal Highness.

Hatfield House is one of the most distinguished mansions of our nobility. It has been a palace, episcopal, royal, and noble, for upwards of seven centuries. It now ranks as one of the most complete specimens extant of old English domestic architecture. It occupies the airy summit of a hill, on the steep slope of which is the old town of Hatfield. The mansion stands in a fine park, which is watered by the river Lea; and the demesne is 26 miles north of London, six from St. Albán's, and seven from Hertford. Probably neither of our fine old country mansions is better known than Hatfield: its elevated situation and peculiar architecture rendering it one of the most striking objects on the Great North-road, from which it is situate but a short distance.

Before the Conquest Hatfield was granted [by the Crown to the abbot Ely and his successors, by whom it was retained as an episcopal palace. It was rebuilt, in the reign of Edward IV., entirely of brick, and a portion of this palace remains in high preservation. In 1538, by exchange, it became one of the royal palaces, and was the residence of Edward Prince of Wales when the account of his father's death was brought to him.

In 1550 Edward VI. granted this palace to his sister, the Princess Elizabeth, who, during Wyat's rebellion, was committed here to the care of Sir Thomas Pope; and here Elizabeth received the news of her sister's decease, and of her own accession to the throne. The privy garden, which adjoined Elizabeth's apartments, still remains, on the western side of the mansion, and is most carefully preserved as a solitary specimen of the horticultural taste of the Elizabethan period, and as a connecting link in the interest which the venerable remains of the episcopalian palace never fail to excite.

At the commencement of the succeeding reign (James I.) Hatfield House passed into the possession of the noble house of Salisbury, by Sir Robert Cecil, the second son of the great Lord Burleigh, receiving it from the Crown, in exchange for his demesne of Theobalds, near Cheshunt; and in 1604 he was created Earl of Salisbury. Upon obtaining possession of Hatfield he inclosed two large parks, now richly wooded and united. He also commenced rebuilding the mansion on a more elevated and commanding site, eastward of the old palace, and with its principal front towards the south, and an approach by a fine avenue of trees. The architect of the mansion was John Thorp, the architect, also, of Burleigh House and Holland House.

Hatfield House occupies a grand parallelogram 280 feet in length, which is the extent of the northern front of the edifice, and is 70 feet in width. On the southern front, two wings project at right angles, each 100 feet, with a breadth of 80 feet, forming together, with the centre division, three sides of a court, 140 feet in extent; the extreme length of the southern or principal front being 300 feet. The materials are brick, with window-cases, mullions, pilasters, and enrichments of stone. "In them," says Mr. Robinson, in his superb "New Vitruvius Britannicus," "the characteristic effect of time is scarcely perceptible, while it has given to the whole the mellow, picturesque character of age; the weather-stained and mossy bricks harmonizing admirably with the grey hue of the stone, and with the surrounding landscape. It is also believed that no house in the kingdom, erected at so early a date, remains so entire as this. The elevation presents two principal fronts, each differing from the other, but possessing perfect unity of design and execution, in which the chaste and vigorous feeling characteristic of the Tudor period is remarkably prevalent."

The two wings in the southern front are connected by a magnificent centre of two stories, in the Palladian style, with a highly-enriched entrance porch; the basement-story comprising an arcade of corridor, constructed upon the Italian plan: the Doric columns and pedestals of the lower, and the pilasters of the upper story, are richly ornamented. The entablature is surmounted by an elegantly-pierced parapet, at the height of 50 feet from the ground, and above this are seen the gables of the roof; these, however, are in Flemish taste, and constitute the only portion of the building not deserving high commendation. Each wing has an enriched entrance-porch; and the breadth of their fronts, between the massive turrets, is broken by projecting oriel windows. The square corner-turrets, 90 feet high to the parapets, are crowned by cupola-formed roofs, rising 20 feet to the pinnacles, which are terminated by gilded vanes, representing small banners charged with the Cecil crest. The centre tower, in which is the grand entrance-porch, rises to the height of 70 feet, and above this, in the middle of the roof, is the clock-tower and cupola, 15 feet high, completing the pyramidal effect of the whole. In the third story of the tower are the full armorial bearings of the noble founder of the mansion; above the parapet, which exhibits the date of the completion of the building, 1611, is his lordship's crest with the coronet.

The principal feature of the northern front of Hatfield House is the centre compartment, in which is the entrance doorway; "but," says Mr. Robinson, "a perfect idea of the architecture beauty of this extensive building can only be obtained by an examination of the internal fronts; on these the bold projections produce alternate masses of light and shade exceedingly picturesque, a portion of the masterly skill with which the original plan was contrived. Time has given the whole a venerable impression, and the primitive colour of the brick has acquired a rich hue from the lichen that now covers it, such as nature alone can bestow."

The whole cost of erecting this noble mansion was £76311 11s. 3d., an amount which does not appear to be very great, as it included the charges for impaling both the parks, garden-work, supply of water to the house, &c. The roof is entirely covered with lead. The record of expenses is still preserved, and is a curious document of the prices of materials, labour, &c., more than two centuries and a quarter since.

The interior of this stately mansion, in the general arrangement of its apartments, corresponds with the masterly design of its magnificent exterior. The great hall, 50 ft. by 30 ft., differs in some respects from the halls of an earlier period. It has a massive carved screen at each end; bay windows, rising the whole height, besides an oriel at the upper end; and on each side of the fire-place is a complete suit of Elizabethan armour. Here are also ranged several morions and weapons of the same period. This noble apartment presents one of the earliest instances of an alteration from the open timber roof, the ceiling being coved, and divided by carved cantalevers, each being the finest example of the style, 25 feet in length.

The great staircase contains five landings, with massive and boldly-carved balusters, figures of genii, and armorial lions, enriched ceilings, &c. On the first story is the great chamber, or King James's Room, 39 ft. long by 27 ft. 3 in. wide, with a Florentine ceiling, enriched with gold; the chimney-piece is of black marble, 12 ft. wide; and in the fire-place are silver dogs, 4 ft. 9 in. high. The gallery or corridor extends the whole length of the southern front, and is richly decorated and furnished, so as to be scarcely paralleled in its gorgeous assemblage of ornaments. It was in this gallery that a series of tableaux vivans from the Waverley Novels was personated by the nobility and gentry, in splendid costume, at a grand entertainment, in June, 1839.

The library, at the west end of the gallery, is of equal dimensions with King James's Room. The state papers in the collection comprise 13,000 letters, from the reign of Henry VIII. to that of James I.; besides splendid MSS., plans, maps, charts, and autographs; Queen Mary's original council book, &c.: here also is preserved "Queen Elizabeth's Jewel." The domestic chapel in the west wing is richly carved and has a brilliant painted glass window; and here also are the carved and gilt state-chair and footstool of Queen Anne. The billiard-room, in the east wing, is tastefully pannelled, and has an elaborately fretted ceiling. These are the only apartments that we have space to enumerate.

Most of the apartments are hung with portraits of the Cecil family, and of celebrated contemporaries of Queen Elizabeth and James I. The family serie sis nearly complete, from almost the introduction of the art of portrait-painting: second in the list is the well-known portrait of Lord Burghley, by Zucchero, with the treasurer's staff.

In the year 1800 Hatfield House was visited by King George III. and the royal family, on the occasion of a grand review of the yeomanry, militia, and volunteer forces raised in the county of Hertford. After the review a sumptuous dinner was served to the royal party in King James's Room.

The late marquis was the only son of James, sixth Earl of Salisbury, the lineal descendant of Lord Burghley, and was advanced to the title of Marquis of Salisbury in 1789. Upon succeeding to the family estates, his lordship restored Hatfield House to its primitive magnificence. He died in 1823, and was succeeded by his son, the present marquis, who has maintained his paternal mansion in costly repair. On November 27th, 1835, part of the west wing was destroyed by fire; but the building has been scrupulously restored. The fire broke out in the suite of rooms occupied by the Dowager Marchioness of Salisbury, who unhappily perished in the flames.

The prospect from the roof of Hatfield House is a richly-wooded tract of country, studded with interesting objects, especially within a moderate distance. Directly westward is the venerable abbey church of St. Alban, its hoary walls stretching alone the ridge of a beautiful eminence. On the north are the widely-spreading woods of Brockett Hall, the seat of Viscount Melbourne; and then the sylvan shades of Wood Hall Park. Eastward are Digwell House and Tewin Water; with Panshanger, the seat of Earl Cowper. The environs of the towns of Hertford and Ware are variegated with villas and pleasure-grounds. Southward of Hatfield House are Gobions, near North Mimms, once a seat of the illustrious Sir Thomas More; and Tyttenhanger, where King Henry VIII. and Queen Katherine passed the summer of 1528. The beautiful park and woods of Hatfield occupy the immediate foreground of the panorama; and the lengthened avenues on either side of the mansion, and many of the single trees, especially the old oaks, are exceedingly picturesque.

EXHIBITION OF THE ROYAL ACADEMY.

75. "Portrait of a Lady." J. C. Knight, A. This is one of the three portraits placed on the line, and it richly deserves the post of honour. The gracious smile of matured womanhood, as we may conceive it to beam on a friend of early years—radiant but sincere—is the happy expression which the painter has chosen for his picture; and its grace and gladness, its intelligence and faith, were never more beautifully pourtrayed. The technical excellences of the picture are also deserving of the highest praise.

78. "Entrance to the Crypt, Rosslyn Chapel." D. Roberts, R.A. We have already expressed our admiration of the general merit of this beautiful picture, and have only now to call attention to its perfect execution. Sir Joshua Reynolds has claimed for the Dutch school an exclusive consideration in all that pertains to the mechanical performances of the painter, but, as mere imitation is not the end of art, if, indeed, it be not its lowest excellence, this advice has not been followed in the degree which its relative importance demands. Here, however, as in almost all Mr. Roberts's works, the most perfect finish has been obtained, without going into pettiness of detail, and a steadiness of effect, secured in the absence of those forced tones of colour and exaggerated degrees of chiaro-scuro which ordinarily distinguish the works of the mere copyist of nature. The happy medium between the dashings of a first study by a great master and the finical littleness of a servile imitator of a leaf or button [illegible] has been reached without sacrificing the essential properties of either method. We recommend it to landscape painters as a perfect model of palette prudence.

79. "The Entombment of Christ." W. Etty, R.A. Very well for a sketch, but not of the entombment of Christ. Neither do we like it as a composition of colour. Its contrasts are spotty, inharmonious, and inappropriate.

86. "Portrait of the Rev. Sir Henry R. Dukenfield, Bart., Vicar of St. Martin's." Sir M. A. Shee, P.R.A. We [illegible] Sir Martin must have acted and [illegible] painting the well-dressed hair of his reverend sitter, or he would never have permitted the smartness of a beau to invade the gravity of clerical expression. Fresh curls in grey hairs may please the vicar's parishioners, but they are assuredly most offensive to good taste, and, to a stranger, interfere with that respect for the person represented which it should be the first object of such a picture to inspire. The ring on the finger, the book in the hand, the showy gown, the assured glance of the eye, are affectations of the same kind. Apart from these faults the picture, as a piece of "brushwork," will maintain the credit of the president.

87. "Lex Talionis; the raid on the reivers, or the laird getting his ain again." A. Cooper, R.A.

> Right hastily they clam the peel,
> They roosed the kye out, ane and a',
> And ransackled the house right weel.

We rejoice to meet Mr. Cooper on new and untrodden ground; for he has too long confined himself to the battle-pieces of early English history, and the less worthy incidents of the race-course and the field. He possesses an amount of literary knowledge, and, as the public well know, a facility of pencil, in the descriptive walks of art, which deserve to find employment on more varied and more instructive subjects. With great talents it is a pity he should stultify them by repeating his subjects, his style, his beauties, and his defects. The picture which has suggested these remarks represents an ancient Scottish peel house, or marauder's castle, with a retaliatory attack from a party on whom black-mail had been levied by its inmates, and the recovery of the captive flock and herd, and the liberation of their imprisoned keepers. The story is told with much spirit, and with great regard to local accuracy. As a painting its texture is, perhaps, too thin, and the handling of the landscape at once strikes the observer as objectionably slaty and obscure. The white horse and the polished mahogany horse are mannerisms which, in so good a picture, we should have gladly missed.

93. "Scene at Zurich, taken from the Bridge." S. J. Stump. A cold and literal representation of a beautiful scene taken under one of its worst aspects. Why should an artist "walk" as it were "in darkness?"

94. "The World or the Cloister?" W. Collins, R.A. A well-fed nun, and her well-fed superior, endeavouring to persuade a better-fed friend to forsake the vanities of real life for the greater vanity of life in the cloister. In this picture Mr. Collins has fallen wholly short of the religious sentiment of his subject, and has rendered it in a gross and most unsatisfactory manner. The actors are, in fact, a group of Sussex fisherwomen, in the costume and surrounded by the circumstances of an Italian convent.

103. "Portrait of A. Cooper, Esq., R.A." A. D. Cooper. A good head, taken, like the scene at Zurich, under an evil aspect. The academician should have been drawn in a style more congenial with his character and pursuits; the mind should have been expressed in the features, of which, in all cases, they are to the painter the mere vehicle.

104. "The Hop Garland." W. F. Witherington, R.A. This gentlemen's professional offspring are generally the victims of an undue merriment. No matter what may be their occupation, however poorly paid or laborious its duties, still they laugh; working or playing, tramping or sleeping, a broad grin distends their cheeks, and a risible atmosphere seems permanently to inflate their jolly natures. For ourselves we cannot laugh any more; but we will in seriousness ask Mr. W. to be a little more discreet in the temperament of his otherwise beautifully drawn and sweetly finished pictures. The sons of the soil exhibit with a distinctness not usual with their superiors in life the graver as well as the more elevated passions of our common nature; and nowhere are they seen under the influence of more varied emotions than in the picturesque vicissitudes of a hop-gathering.

107. "Prince Arthur's Dream." H. Le Jeune. "I like this exceedingly," said a young and enthusiastic painter on the first day's exhibition, an opinion in which we heartily acquiesce.

123. "Portrait of Mrs. Gordon, of Abergeldie." A. Geddes, A. There is a fine characteristic expression in the ably-painted head of this lady which strongly reminds one of the discriminative hand of Wilkie; and a crispness, liberality of touch in the treatment of the other parts of the picture which declare the painter to be a man who acts on the genuine requirements of his model, in preference to the conventional usages of precedent, or the monotonous prescriptions of authority, a practice which we cannot too earnestly recommend.

124. "Portrait of Mrs. L. C. Humphrey." H. W. Pickersgill, R.A. On looking at the noble lineaments of this accomplished lady, we would fain associate with our admiration the poetic faith of Mr. Simmons, that Nothing through earth or ocean's range,

But suffer's dull disastrous change,
Save woman's radiant looks, that beam
As ages back they beamed,
When Sydney wove his starry dream,
And Surrey's falchion gleamed.

We would that a glance so beneficent, so gay, were in fact immortal; and as much also would we wish that the painter, whose art is calculated to give it in a degree the desired perpetuity, had, in the present instance, laboured more worthily in its high vocation. Compared with the living original, or regarded with the many Vandykes which "our meddling memory musters up" to mar our contemplation, this portrait is but as the dead colouring to a finished picture. An inkiness of tone pervades the carnation, which is in no small degree aggravated by the black sky background, and the colours appear to be scrambled, giving the picture the weak and shallow effect of a crayon drawing.

128. "Sickness and Health." J. Webster, A. A convalescent girl, pale and emaciated, from the effects of recent disease, is placed by her mother at the sunny side of the cottage-door, while a hurdy-gurdy man and a couple of dancing children endeavour, by their united fun, to rouse her dormant feelings, and mitigate her distress. The artifice has succeeded; and the poor child, ashamed of the assumption—even for a moment—of a gay expression of countenance, turns down her head, and seems fretted she had smiled. This is an exquisite touch of nature, and very chastely rendered by the painter. The subordinate figures and accessories are all in admirable keeping, and the whole is accurately drawn and sweetly painted. But, as "we are nothing if not critical," we would suggest that the bluish-grey frock of the dancing girl might be changed for one of a warmer colour, with very evident advantage to the harmony of the picture.

129. "The Sun of Venice going to Sea." J. M. W. Turner, R.A.

Fair shines the morn, and soft the zephyrs blow a gale,
Venicia's fisher spreads his painted sail,
Nor heeds the demon that in grim repose
Expects his evening prey.

A rich cluster of the scrapings of Mr. Turner's iridescent palette: for it is evidently more the work of the palette-knife than the pencil. Yet how glorious is the general effect! Looked at from a considerable distance, it is discovered to be a fisherman's vessel, under a lofty crowd of canvass, making her way from the lagoons of Venice to the open sea. And like a thing of life she goes, so gay—so buoyant—so swift—that we almost feel the bright city to be lessening in the distance.

131. "Portrait of C. H. Baily, Esq., R.A." T. Mogford. This picture exhibits our graceful sculptor in one of those contemplative moods which are habitual to him, and which, therefore, presented the painter with that precise aspect under which the character of the man was best pourtrayed, and which it was consequently his duty to adopt. The drawing is free, and the general disposition skilful; but we can say little in favour of the colouring.

136. "Portrait of the Queen, in the Robes worn by her Majesty when delivering the Royal Speech on opening the Session of Parliament." Sir M. A. Shee, P.R.A. Painters are either greatly straitened in themselves, or vilely under command in the selection of incidents for their portraits, or they would never run such an eternal round of sameness in their invention and management. Are there no finer passage in her Majesty's history than the exhibition of a state robe, that it should be so constantly chosen for the subject of her picture. How, we may be permitted to ask, did she look as she stood weeping at the great window of St. James's on the day of her proclamation? What are the touching incidents of that life of familiar charity which she is known to lead at Windsor? In what manner did she reciprocate the loyal greetings of her Scottish subjects, and how did she bear herself as their proud chieftains bowed before her? These and similar moments in her brilliant life are, in our opinion, the circumstances under which her portrait should be drawn for the world and its posterity; and till such moments are chosen, and the practice becomes habitual, the art will, in its historic bearings, continue to be a thing of nought. It will be gathered from these remarks that we do not, in the proper sense of the term, consider this picture to be a portrait of the Queen.

137. "The Actor's Reception of the Author." D. Maclise, R.A.

"He advanced into the room, trembling and confused, and let his gloves and cloak fall, which, having taken up, he approached my mistress, and presented to her a paper with more respect than that of a counsellor when he delivers a petition to a judge, saying, 'Be so good, madam, as to accept of this part, which I take the liberty to offer.' She received it in a cold and disdainful manner, without even deigning to answer his compliments."—Gil Blas.

The force of Mr. Maclise's genius is so great, so rich in materials, and so fertile in expedient, that in the exercise of its powers his pencil literally knows no bounds. Hence it is that his pictures are ordinarily overloaded with splendid accessories, and their main incidents obscured by the gorgeousness of their furniture and apparel. Perhaps in none of his extraordinary works is this prodigality of invention more apparent or more to be regretted than in the marvellous performance before us: it is literally "dim with excessive brightness." In gazing upon its crowded beauties, the eye grows weary of admiration, and hastens to find rest in the separate contemplation of some precious cup or lustrous jewel—some antique chair or storied cabinet, whose imitation is so perfect as at once to fix and gratify the sense. The improvidence of this treatment, and its injurious effect on the story of a picture, become more apparent when its subject is of so slight and trifling a nature as not to require such an array of adventitious aid, which is precisely the case in "The Actors Reception of the Author." The sycophancy of the bumbled author, the brute pride of the actor, and the affected dignity of his vulgar partner, are common-place points for a small picture; but in a grand composition, richly painted and decked with splendours which a Sardanapalus might have envied, they become too feeble to sustain their places and sink to the level of bright groups of colour in the glorious medley which surrounds them. The aggregate effect is then exactly that of a tesselated pavement, in which all the colours are equally prominent, unrelieved and flat. We shall give next week a better example of Mr. Maclise's power.

145. "Portrait of the Right Rev. the Lord Bishop of Ely." J. Phillips, R.A. We consider this to be Mr. Phillips' finest work this year. There is a sober refinement and depth of colour in the treatment of the head which equals the matured works of Reynolds.

150. "Portrait of a Lady." J. F. Knight, A. Another of Mr. Knight's massively painted, but beautifully finished portraits. This gentleman's draperies, while they exhibit great breadth and splendour, are neat and finished imitations, showing us how compatible are the small with the great acquirements of art. Indeed we hold that in a good picture nothing should be half painted.

153. "The Terrace." T. Creswick, A. A lovely picture of the terrace of Haddon Hall.

164. "Scene from the 'Vicar of Wakefield.'" C. R. Leslie, R.A.

"Virtue, my dear Lady Blarney, virtue is worth any price; but where is that to be found?—Fudge."

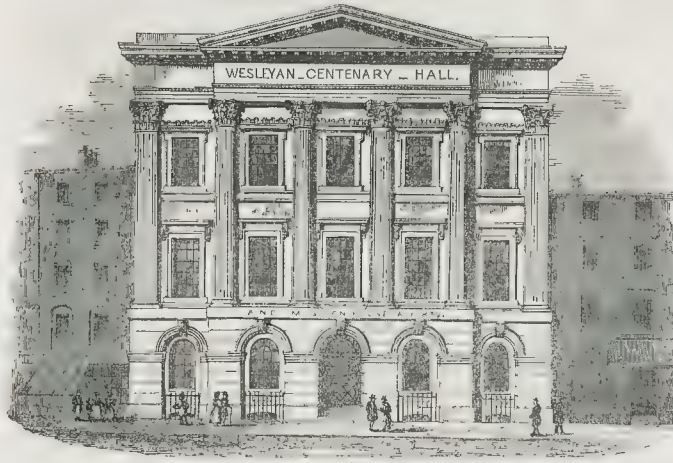
This is a delightfully English picture: the comfortable room, the corner cupboard, the ugly long-waisted chair back, the pictures of the children, are things about which no patriot can be mistaken; and the charming vulgarity of the illustrious visitors, the awkward self-restraint of the younger daughters, and the rude sincerity of Mr. Burchell are traits in the national character which will as readily be distinguished as our own. We know of nothing since the immortal designs by Stothard for the "British Novelists" that at all approach the sterling merits of this admirable work. For truth of character and dramatic skill we hold it to be quite unrivalled. It is slightly "pinky" in its colour, and somewhat "chalky" in its lights, but these are faults which the mellowing hand of a few years will rectify.

220. "The Father's grave." J. C. Horsley.

The eye that lent thee light,
The lip that poured its passion in thine ear,
Have left their germ of promise; but as yet
Thy chastened heart is lowered upon the grave,
Hope lies in shadow cast by memory.

The "new-made widow" is proverbially "a sad sight;" but here sits one whose sorrows are illumined with bright hopes of the majority of her fatherless boy, and whose sadness melts in the aspirations of her faith. This picture, which addresses itself to the tenderest feelings of the human heart, and it is calculated to make a permanently moral impression upon them. The drawing, colouring, expression, and selection of accessories are equally excellent, and the finish and keeping deserve great praise. It appears to have been an object with the painter to give an impression of a thoroughly English scene, with all the attributes of an English village.

Here we must pause for the present; but we cannot postpone to a future week the gratification which our readers must experience in the possession of a sketch from Mr. Edwin Landseer's "Horses, the property of William Wigram, Esq.," No. 314. of the middle room. In this masterly performance we are at a loss which most to admire, the enlarged knowledge of general nature, and of the animal world in particular, which it exhibits, or the felicity of hand with which that acquaintance with truth is brought to bear on its just expression in a picture. Nothing is redundant, nor, on the other hand, is anything wanting. The expression of the jealous horse, who would monopolize the water to himself, but who is disturbed on the one side by the intrusion of a thirsty neighbour, and on the other by the fidgetty movements of a couple of magpies, is finely told in the back-turned ear, the excited nostril, the stiffening tail, and that sidelong thousandth part of a glance which, in startled selfishness, the horse is for a moment directing towards the causes of his disquietude. This, we repeat, is genius, and of the highest order.



WESLEYAN CENTENARY HALL, BISHOPSGATE.

The calm remonstrance of the Wesleyan body against the Factories Education Bill, and the statistical reasoning and historic and constitutional references on which they were founded, have given them a weight in the deliberations of the Government which is hourly increasing in importance, and it is even said they will have the effect of causing the withdrawal of the obnoxious clauses. So much for meekness and good temper. But our present purpose is not with the remonstrance, but with the building in which it was concocted, and from whence, as from another Vatican, the spiritual voice of the vast Wesleyan society is sent through its ready agents to the ends of the earth, with as great speed and certainty as the royal despatches. This building is the Centenary Hall—the Parliament House—of "the connection." At the desire of many of our subscribers we have drawn up the following account of its origin and history.

The year 1739 was that in which John Wesley began formally to devote himself to the ministry, and to enter upon that career which terminated only in his death. As the period advanced, when a complete century from that time would have been passed through, the Wesleyan body became influenced by a wish to celebrate the circumstance in some notable manner. In 1838 it was resolved that religious services should at particular times in the following year be performed suitable to the occasion; and also that a subscription should be entered into for the furtherance of certain objects pertaining to that body. Among the objects thus proposed were such as the following:—To erect and endow a Wesleyan theological college or seminary for the education of preachers for home stations and missionaries for abroad, to provide a Polynesian missionary ship for the conveyance of missionaries to and from several of the eastern islands, to provide superannuation allowances for aged ministers and pensions for their widows, to aid in building or repairing chapels, and to aid in another object, which we shall detail presently. The subscription was commenced, and has ultimately amounted to a sum unexpectedly large. The religious consideration of the centenary, and the general manner in which the subscribed funds have been, or are to be, appropriated, are subjects which we do not propose to enter upon here. One portion, however, has been devoted in a manner which it is our object to notice. The Wesleyan Methodists, in the same Christian spirit which has actuated other religious bodies, have established a Missionary Society, which has gradually increased the sphere of its operations to an important extent. The Mission-house in Hatton-garden, where the business of the society was transacted, became, every year, less and less adequate to the wants of the establishment, and the Wesleyan Centenary Committee determined to devote a portion of the subscribed funds to the purchase of a building for the transaction both of the missionary business and the general business of the body.

In pursuance of this part of their design they authorised the purchase of extensive freehold premises, in Bishopsgate-street, formerly known as the City of London Tavern, and directed the adaptation of them, by various alterations and additions, to the purposes above-mentioned; and to the special use of the Wesleyan Missionary Society they resolved to offer certain portions of the front buildings in Bishopsgate-street, and also to erect in the rear of the same premises, and in immediate contiguity with the general and connectional apartments, a NEW Mission House, for which, as a place of missionary business, the locality was peculiarly desirable and advantageous. It will be seen, from this introduction, that the building is of a twofold character, both as it respects its construction and its destination; it consists of an old building, greatly altered and thoroughly renovated, and of a new one, built behind, and in connection with the former. The two, taken together, consist of apartments for the general business of the connection, and others for the missionary business; and we may remark, that the latter portion has been liberally and gratuitously presented to the Missionary Society at the expense of the centenary fund, without any charge either for the ground or for the buildings upon the missionary fund. The building presents an elegant exterior on the eastern side of Bishopsgate-street, exactly opposite Threadneedle-street. There are three stories visible in front, the upper and middle one of which are each lighted by five large windows, while the ground story has two windows on either side of the entrance door.

The door opens into a large entrance hall or vestibule, on each side of which are doors leading to several apartments appropriated as reception rooms, secretary's offices, &c.; while opposite is a flight of steps leading to a square enclosure, which, under any other circumstances, would be deemed a central court or quadrangle. It occupies a vacant space between the old house and the new one, and the architect has ingeniously contrived that numerous rooms on all four sides of it shall receive light by windows opening into this square; if it were open over head, it would really be a quadrangular court, such as is found in most Eastern and in many European houses; but it is entirely closed, lighted by side windows a little below the ceiling, and painted with the same taste and neatness as every other part of the building. From this central part entrance is obtained to various parts of the building. Proceeding onwards from the quadrangle, we come to two or three apartments appropriated as warehouses, in which the printed publications, as well as other property belonging to the society, are deposited. The arrangement of the warehouses illustrate in some degree the extent of the society's transactions, and the geographical organization by which these transactions are carried on: here Ashantee, there Tonga; in another part Caffraria, in another Gambia, and so on: these are for the reception of packets and parcels received from, or about to be forwarded to, the foreign missionary stations of the society. Again, the home transactions by which the parent society keeps up regular intercourse with the auxiliary branches all over the country are aided and systemized by a similar contrivance. A nest of small cells or boxes, 300 or 400 in number, is appropriated to the reception of orders, &c., from these auxiliaries, each cell being devoted to, and inscribed with the name of, some particular town in the kingdom.

These warehouses contain numerous boxes, chests, and packing-cases, in which the books, clothes, implements, and other outfittings of the missionaries are sent; and connected with them is the necessary commercial machinery for maintaining intercourse with all the foreign stations of the society.

Adjoining the warehouses is a room which, when the arrangements of the new building are thoroughly brought into working order, will be a very interesting one, viz., the outfitting-room. In this room are deposited all the outfittings which the society is accustomed to give a missionary when proceeding to foreign parts. On shelves are ranged religious books of various kinds, as well as others which would be valuable to a missionary; while in drawers are deposited the materials for making clothing, as well as many other articles to be used as occasion may require. Returning from the warehouses and outfitting-room back to the quadrangle, we proceed to the upper apartments of the new building or Mission House. A semicircular staircase of very elegant construction leads up to the top of the building, having on the level of each floor a gallery or landing-place from which the doors of the several apartments open. These apartments are employed for various purposes, some as offices, others as the private apartments of the general secretaries, to whom is principally entrusted the ecclesiastical superintendence of the missions. The liberality of the centenary fund committee has been shown in the general plan and arrangement of these portions of the building. The apartments in the front of the building, as was before observed, are alterations from a building devoted to very different purposes which formerly stood upon this spot. The ground consists, besides the entrance-hall, of official departments, reception-rooms, &c. On the first floor is a noble room, called the saloon, having on one side the original picture by Parker of the rescue of John Wesley from the flames when a boy. Adjoining to this is another room, devoted to the meeting of committees and other official business of the society.

Above these, and occupying the upper part of the building, is a hall, far exceeding in size any other room in the building: it exceeds the whole width of the house, and is proportionably wide and lofty. At the north end is a raised platform, railed off from the rest of the room, and provided with seats and a table or desk. At the east side, elevated several feet from the ground, is a small gallery calculated for the reception of a limited number of persons. Nearly the whole floor of the room is occupied by oak seats, capable of containing ten or twelve hundred persons, and conveniently placed for giving to the occupants a full view of those who may be on the platform. This hall is intended for various kinds of meetings connected with the Wesleyan body, and, as the number of persons assembled within it is sometimes considerable, the floor is supported by pillars in the room beneath.

The Wesleyan Centenary Hall, in Bishopsgate-street, was formerly the City of London Tavern; but its new exterior hardly denotes the very great change which has taken place as regards the present and late destination of the building. It has no particular feature to mark it; neither is there any aim at novelty in the design: the style of the basement is tame, and the columns rather take from than add to the importance of the front. According to the original design exhibited at the Royal Academy, there was to have been an attic and a superstructure, copied from the choragic monument of Lysicrates. But that extraneous feature has been abandoned, and a pediment substituted for the attic. The interior arrangements are very complete for holding conferences, &c.

THE FASHIONS.

Paris, Rue Chaussée d'Antin, May 22, 1843.

Mon cher Monsieur,—Since my last letter I have found nothing deserving of any very particular mention, and shall, therefore, confine my remarks to those costumes more generally to be seen in our streets and places of public amusement. Let me then observe that the mantelet now generally worn appears to be but very slightly removed from that commonly worn in 1837; in fact, the difference is so very slight as to be almost imperceptible. True, the trimmings and ornaments are different, although the cut remains the same. Mantelets of black puce or chestnut-coloured taffety are those generally seen in négligé evening toilettes, whilst glazed taffeties, in bright shades, belong only to half-dress day costumes. Ribbons are less employed in trimmings than garnitures formed of the same material as the dress. The taffety is cut in bouts, and is laid in four rows. Several new fashions in the manufacture of robes appear in prospective; amongst these are sleeves buttoned at the wrist, and skirts trimmed with immense flounces à l'Espagnol. Feathers upon straw hats appear also, to be viewed with much favour; and, although simple ribbons will always be considered to be in good taste, still we may allow and even admire an ingenious novelty, especially when it takes the form of the Penelope hat of Lucy Hocquet, and which we have described in a former number. These tasty additions are, however, not confined to the atelier of Lucy Hocquet. We have seen that Alexandrine, whose artistic taste is equally well known and appreciated, has just produced something whose strange, yet novel and elegant, form must be seen ere its effect can be perfectly understood. Imagine to yourself a large Swiss hat, with round flat borders converging to a flat point serving to receive the head. This primitive straw hat, which is simple, light, and possesses infinite naïveté of form, is trimmed with several ornaments in a picturesque style, such as little cockades of ribbon or velvet, and flowers, which lean against the hair according to the Italian style. For country dresses nothing I have seen is more elegant than two or three which have come from the same fertile source of inspiration. The one is a robe of batiste, with a double sleeve. With this is worn an écharpe of myrtle green taffety, which goes round the greater part of the waist. The collar, which is quite plain and flat, is of fine holland cloth. The other has half long pla n sleeves, with a noeud of sankeen. The écharpe, which is supported by a plaid cravat, is of figured lawn, and the mittens are of taffety. Mayer, who sets the fashion here and in St. Petersburg in every thing relating to gloves, has released the hands of all our élégantes in black, puce, or deep blue silk; and mittens of taffety, as well as those of velvet, are everywhere worn and everywhere liked. I must defer the description of our Paris novelties to my next letter, and in the meanwhile I subscribe myself HENRIETTE DE B.

RAILWAY SPEED.—The returns given in the report of the officers of the railway department, Board of Trade, show the average speed upon the various lines, exclusive of stoppages, as follows:—London and Birmingham, 27 miles per hour; Great Western, 33; Northern and Eastern, 36, North Midland, 29; Midland Counties, 28; Birmingham and Derby, 29; Manchester and Birmingham, 28; Newcastle and North Shields, 30; and Chester and Birkenhead, 28. The average speed on the metropolitan lines, exclusive of stoppages, is about 22 miles an hour.

On Tuesday a meeting of the Universal Peace Society, the object of which is to put down warfare whether between nations or individuals, because of its alleged injustice, impolicy, and opposition to the pacific principles of the Christian religion, was held in the meeting-house of the Society of Friends in Houndsditch. The report of the Society for the past year was very satisfactory.

SCOTLAND.

THE CHURCH OF SCOTLAND.

GENERAL (RESIDUARY) ASSEMBLY.—FRIDAY (May 19).—The assembly having met at twelve o'clock the sederunt was constituted by prayer by the moderator, who in an eloquent and impressive manner alluded to the separation which had taken place on the previous day—a separation which they all regretted. The assembly adjourned about three o'clock till Saturday.

SATURDAY.—A draft of the answer prepared by the committee to her Majesty's letter was read by Dr. Lee. The draft is nearly or altogether to the following effect:—"We, your Majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, ministers of the Church of Scotland, met in assembly, have received with profound respect your Majesty's letter, conveying to us your most gracious answer to your Majesty's purpose to extend to us the countenance and support which former general assemblies have received in fulfilment of the solemn engagement which binds the Sovereign to maintain inviolate the Church of Scotland in all its rights and privileges. As your Majesty has been pleased to advert to the circumstances in the present condition of the church which have occasioned a departure from the form generally observed in communications from the throne to former general assemblies, we beg to assure your Majesty that, entertaining the most infinite desire to maintain unity and peace in the church, in combination with the purity of faith and worship, and the faithful administration of ecclesiastical government, we will give attention to the momentous views which you have recommended to our consideration, with the view to the adjustment of the matters connected with the church. On all these occasions it becomes us to invoke the aid of Divine Grace, through which alone we can hope to be so guided, by wisdom from above, as to arrive at such conclusions as will tend to the prosperity of our holy religion, with all its pure and peaceable influences." The letter then goes on in the usual way to express gratification at the re-appointment of the Marquis of Bute as her Majesty's representative, and to acknowledge the royal donation of £2000 to be applied to the purposes of education in the Highlands and Islands of Scotland. It then concludes, "That God the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ may enrich your Majesty with all temporal and spiritual blessings—that he may encompass your Majesty's royal consort and family with especial favour; and that after a long and prosperous reign, he may bring you to eternal glory in Heaven, is the earnest prayer of your Majesty's most loyal and obedient subjects, the ministers and elders of the national Church of Scotland." It was unanimously agreed that the draft of the letter read in answer to her Majesty's letter should be transmitted to her Majesty in the usual way.

EDINBURGH, Monday morning.—The churches throughout this city were very much crowded yesterday, especially in the case of the non-intrusion party. The opening of the first of the new buildings for the Free Presbyterian Church, which took place yesterday, excited a good deal of interest, and although no public announcement was made, the church was completely filled during the forenoon and afternoon services. The building, which is in the Lothian-road, is a neat and substantial structure, and is capable of accommodating about 1500 persons. It has been erected for the congregation of the Rev. Dr. Candlish. The Dr. himself preached in the forenoon, and the Rev. Dr. Macfarlane, of Greenock, preached in the afternoon. In St. Andrew's Church, which is in connection with the General Assembly, was a prayer meeting in the evening, at which the Lord High Commissioner and his suite attended. The church was excessively crowded, and great numbers were unable to obtain admittance. In the Great Hall at Canonmill a sermon was preached by Dr. Candlish in the evening, but not one half of the immense assemblage could obtain admission, and it was arranged that Mr. Chalmers of Dailly, and Mr. C. J. Brown, of Edinburgh, should preach to the people in two separate parts of the Park in the open air, which they accordingly did, great numbers attending. The Marchioness of Breadalbane and Lady Hannah Thorpe, accompanied by Mr. Campbell of Monzie, M.P., attended the meeting of the Free Presbyterian Assembly on Saturday, and were loudly cheered.

MONDAY, May 22. The General Assembly met at St. Andrew's Church, at 11 o'clock. After the reading of the minutes, some conversation took place relative to the proper time for taking up the Strathbogie case, which resulted in an agreement that the question as to the deposition of the Strathbogie ministers, and the dispersed commission from that Presbytery, should be taken up immediately after the discussion of the Veto Law. Lord Belhaven, after reading several clauses of the Queen's letter, laid on the table the resolutions alluded to in the proceedings of Saturday, for the repeal of the Veto Act—the repeal of the Act admitting quoad sacra ministers to the Church Courts—and to address her Majesty to endow these churches, and to constitute them legal parishes. It was agreed that the resolutions should be taken up along with the overtures on the subject to which the resolutions refer. The overtures from Ayr and Hamilton, on the subject of the repeal of the Veto Act being read, Mr. Stewart, of Beladrum, in a few words, urged on the assembly the necessity of repealing this act.—Mr. Proudfoot, of Strathaven, hoped that, without discussion, the assembly would agree to repeal the Veto Act. (Hear, hear.)—Dr. Cook agreed in the propriety of not discussing the merits of the Veto Act. The grounds on which he originally opposed it are same as he yet held, that it would bring the church into calamities and into collisions with the civil courts. He moved that, as the Veto Act interfered with civil rights, it be an instruction to presbyteries to proceed in settlements in the way laid down before the passing of the Veto Act, reserving to the parishioners the unlimited and absolute power of stating objections to the presentees, and to the presbytery the power of judging of, and giving effect to, these objections.—Mr. Hugh Paton seconded the motion.—The Procurator brought forward a counter motion.—Dr. Cook's motion was adopted.

FREE PRESBYTERIAN ASSEMBLY.—The assembly met at 11 o'clock on Friday week, the proceedings being opened with Divine service. A deputation from the Presbyterian Church of Ireland came forward to the bar with an address expressive of the sympathy and concurrence of that church with the proceedings of those who now constituted the Free Presbyterian Church of Scotland. Several of the members of the deputation addressed the assembly, warmly approving the course they had taken in vindicating their principles.—Dr. Chalmers, in the name of the assembly, thanked the Presbyterian Church of Ireland for their friendly sympathy and regard as evinced by this address, and by the sentiments of the deputation.—Dr. Cooke, being loudly called for, stood up and delivered a commentary on the subject of the Queen's letter to the general assembly. After the appointment of several committees the assembly adjourned till the evening. The assembly met again at seven o'clock, when the hall was quite crowded. The chair was taken by Dr. Macfarlane. Divine service was then performed, the 62nd chapter of Isaiah being the portion of Scripture which was read. Dr. Buchanan said he had to submit a motion, which was in the following words:—"That the assembly do now invite the concurrence of the elders, deacons, probationers, and students who have been invited to be present in following out their separation from the Established Church of Scotland." Dr. B. then proceeded at great length to comment upon the Queen's letter.—The motion was agreed to.—A deputation from the probationers presented themselves, and gave in a declaration of adherence to the Free Presbyterian Church, signed by 200 individuals.—Dr. Candlish then addressed the assembly in an elaborate speech, which was loudly cheered.

The business before the assembly on Saturday was of little general interest. Reports from the different sections of the Provisional Committee were received and read, in regard to states for the churches the funds, and the supply and distribution of ministers.

MONDAY, May 22.—The Free Presbyterian Assembly met to-day at 12 o'clock, in Dr. Candlish's new church in the Lothian-road. After 12 minutes had been read, communications were given in from a number of clergymen, stating their adherence to the non-intrusion protest. Dr. Candlish moved for the appointment of a commission of the assembly, to correspond with other Presbyterian bodies on the subject of the tercentenary celebration of the Westminster Assembly of Divines. The commission was appointed. It was announced by Mr. Campbell, of Monzie, that the Dowager Marchioness of Breadalbane had subscribed £1000 towards the Free Presbyterian Fund. [The number of adherents to the seceding protest is now said to be 498 ministers; but what proportion of these is parochial, and what quoad sacra, is not stated. As to money, Dr. Chalmers announced that the gross receipts in aid of the LEW scheme were £223,023 6s. 11d., of which £150,341 6s. 3d. belongs to the building fund.]

LAW INTELLIGENCE.

VICE-CHANCELLOR'S COURT.

(Before Sir J. Knight Bruce.)

WATTS V. SPOTTISWOODE AND ANOTHER—UNITED SERVICE GAZETTE—INJUNCTION.

On Thursday Mr. L. Wigram said he was instructed in a case in which Mr. Alaric Alexander Watts was plaintiff, and Mr. Andrew Spottiswoode and Mr. Charles Hyde were defendants, to move for an injunction restraining them (the defendants) from in any manner interfering with the management of the United Service Gazette newspaper. The learned counsel then read the notice on which the motion was founded; but the opposite party not being ready with their affidavits, the case was postponed.

POLICE.

MANSION-HOUSE.—A young man, named Henry Bennet, servant to Mr. Abbott, wine and spirit merchant, Coleman-street, was brought before the Lord Mayor, charged with having committed an extensive embezzlement.—Mr. Abbott stated that, having had occasion for a quantity of silver on Saturday last, he sent the prisoner for £250 worth to the Bank. The prisoner did not return, but on Sunday evening gave himself up to a policeman, who found upon his person £91 14s. 2d. The witness stated that the prisoner had been in his service about six years, and was unfortunately devoted to drink, and had been brought before the late Lord Mayor for having threatened to destroy himself.—The prisoner, in answer to questions from the Lord Mayor, stated that he purchased a suit of clothes, and went to a great variety of places, after having got the money. He did not, however, know where he could have lost the large sum of money which made up the deficiency.—The prosecutor said he believed the prisoner had become acquainted with persons of bad character.—The Lord Mayor remanded the prisoner for a few days.

Mr. Clarkson, the barrister, applied to the Lord Mayor, on behalf of 120 watermen connected with Greenwich, who petitioned his lordship not to consent to an application made to his lordship to destroy the Waterman's Pier at that place.—Mr. Newton attended for the watermen, who, he stated, were interested in and dependent upon the floating accommodation at Garden-stairs. The petition was signed by upwards of 5000 persons, many of whom were respectable tradesmen and bankers, and principally at No. 8, Broad-street-buildings.—It appeared that Mr. Hancock was the inventor of a lock; that he had induced Mr. Pownall and Mr. Brasier (the one well known for his connection with the county of Middlesex, the other as Rear Indis merchant) to assist him; that they had never intended to be partners; that they had given repeated notices of their wishes and intentions; yet Mr. Hancock issued a bill, dated 17th April, 1843, in these words:—"One month after date we promise to pay to our own order Five Hundred Pounds." Signed—"Hancock, Pownall, and Brasier." This bill had been paid over to a Mr. Watts, solicitor, who held the instrument as security.—Mr. Brasier and Mr. Pownall both stated that they never contemplated any partnership, that they had merely assisted Hancock out of charity.—Mr. Alderman Farebrother and Sir John Pirie, report as to the invention that a charge of forgery had been made out.—Mr. Ings, for the accused, said he was taken by surprise. He did not suppose the magistrate would entertain the charge, but his answer was that there was a partnership, and that Hancock had a right to do what he had done. To prove this he begged an adjournment for ten days.—The Magistrates were willing to grant time, and it was arranged that the case should stand over for a week; that the bill should be impounded, and the defendant admitted to bail, himself in £900, and two sureties in £250 each.

MARYLEBONE.—EXTRAORDINARY ASSAULT.—On Monday, a fashionably-dressed young man, who gave his name Hugh Stratford Stratford, and said that he was staying at Ibbotson's Hotel, Vere-street, Oxford-street, was placed at the bar before Mr. Rawlinson, charged with having violently assaulted Mr. Alexander Chisholm, surgeon, of No. 32, Devonshire-street, Portland-place, and, who, from the serious injury inflicted on him, was in such a state as to excite much alarm for his safety. It appeared that the prisoner had mistaken his victim for Mr. Barnard Gregory, the proprietor of the Satirist newspaper, who had given him dire cause of offence by repeated attacks on him in that paper, on account of his connexion with certain gambling transactions. The solicitor for the prisoner (who it appears is highly connected) offered any amount of bail, but the magistrate refused to part with the prisoner upon any terms. Chisholm is pronounced out of danger, and he was consequently remanded until Thursday.

UNION-HALL.—Joseph Russell, an engine-driver, and Henry Knight, a stoker, belonging to the South-Western Railway, were brought before Mr. Traill, charged with doing considerable damage to the property of the company, owing to their negligence on the arrival of a luggage train from Southampton, and were severally sentenced to twenty-one days' imprisonment.

MARLBOROUGH-STREET.—Robert Leslie, a hair-dresser, living in Little Pulteney-street, was brought before Mr. Maltby, charged with having stabbed a police-constable in the station-house at Vine-street.—It appeared that directions have been recently issued by the police commissioners to have a watch kept on the cells at the various station-houses, as more than one attempt has been recently made by prisoners to do themselves or others confined with them some serious injury, and that in consequence of these orders a constable has been appointed at the Vine-street station to look into the various cells at stated periods, through a small trap-door, and to ascertain that all is right within.—John Warren, a man taken into custody for begging, and locked up in the same cell with the prisoner, and the prisoner was confined was very young three months ago, when he was married he called peelers and paupers. He saw the prisoner take a white-handled knife from his pocket, open it, and then place it in his side pocket. In a minute or two after this the gaoler on duty looked in at the trap-door, upon which the prisoner ran towards the opening, and made a thrust at the policeman's face.—The policeman who was stabbed is named Builder, C 51. The wound appeared to be a very serious one. The knife had evidently been aimed at, but the blow had taken effect about half an inch below it, on the nose, which was cut to some depth.—The prisoner, who appeared to be fully five to the serious situation in which his vindictive feeling against the police had placed him, begged for mercy on account of his wife and children, attributing his conduct to intoxication.—Mr. Maltby said the assault was of so serious a character that he should send the case to the Central Criminal Court.—The prisoner was then locked up.

ANOTHER OUTRAGE AT MANCHESTER.—AFFRAY BETWEEN THE MILITARY AND POLICE.—On Tuesday evening Manchester was thrown into a state of excitement in consequence of an affray, which, after several detachments of the 15th Regiment of Foot, now stationed in that town, on two of the police-stations, and an indiscriminate assault of every police officer upon they could in the station. This conduct, on the part of the military, arose from the interference of the police to prevent a quarrel in the street between two soldiers on the previous evening, on which occasion several of the soldiers were apprehended by the police, and taken into custody. After a resistance and considerable punishment on both sides. On the same evening, a large party of the 15th Regiment were coming down Oldham-road, with the intention of attacking the police-station, when they were forcibly to liberate their comrades, when the superintendent was obliged to draw a line of policemen across the street to keep them from carrying their design into effect. The military, however, succeeded in rescuing the prisoners for their misconduct, ordered them to pay a fine of 20s. each, or go to prison for one month. The fines were immediately paid, and the prisoners were discharged. Here, it was supposed, the matter had terminated, particularly as the examination had been conducted in the presence of two officers of the regiment, both of whom appeared highly displeased with the conduct of their soldiers. But during the day large mobs of turn-outs, and small parties of soldiers belonging to the 15th, were parading different parts of the town. Information was conveyed to Captain White, chief of the borough police, that the soldiers meditated an attack on the station-house, and preparations were accordingly made for its defence. Before the necessary measures for this end were taken a body of 40 or 50 soldiers, accompanied by a mob of about 2000 persons, reached the Oldham-road station so suddenly and unexpectedly, that the policemen on side (then only five in number) had scarcely time to close the gates. The soldiers and the mob then retired for a few minutes, and upon a policeman in the street they pursued him, and demolished all the windows of a house in which he took shelter because the proprietor did not turn him out. In a few minutes the number of soldiers increased to about 200, and these, followed by about 5000 people, returned to the station-house, and endeavoured to force the gates. Not succeeding in this, they smashed the windows and window-frames, and commenced throwing stones into the exterior of the building on which stones or bludgeons could make an impression. At this time there were twenty-five policemen in the station-house, but the superintendent and inspector had got half enough. The General immediately ordered them out of the ranks, and gave them into the custody of the police. A company of the 16th Regiment of Foot subsequently arrived at the station-house, and kept the crowd eighty of the 2nd Dragoon Guards, or Queen's Bays. These were ordered to remain on guard at the station during the night. The sergeant of the 15th stated, when at the New Bailey, that the prisoners had to a man left the barracks with the determination of renewing the attack on the police. The spinners who have recently turned out, and who, during the present week, have been taken before the magistrates in parties varying from two to thirteen, for assembling in large numbers and intimidating other workmen, have taken advantage of this occurrence to forward their own views. The outrages committed last week at the instigation of the brickmakers' union on the property of Mr. Pauling, a master builder, in consequence of a dispute about wages, while they show the dangerous and alarming character of trades' combinations, have filled the mindsof employers with fear and anxiety.

SCRAPS.

THE DEATH OF GENERAL SIR THOMAS PICTON.

He was slain at the Head of his division, repelling one of the most formidable attacks of the French at Waterloo. He was struck on the head by a musket ball and fell dead; shortly afterwards his body was raised and placed against a tree, where it remained until the action was decided.

Loud thunders crashed, the clouds were riven,
Then shook the firmament of Heav'n;
The bivouac flames black night had giv'n
A doomsday's awful scenery.
Sweet dreams of home from his have fled,
Whose next sound sleep shall be the dead,
The turf their pillow, earth their bed,
The lofty sky their canopy.

Storms veiled the morn, the dark day frowned,
When deadliest foe led chiefs renowned,
And quaked the trembling earth around
Upturn, blood-stained, and slippery.
Blazed red-mouth'd war's continued roar,
While bursting shells Death's showers pour,
And thousands welter in their gore
Of England's stubborn Infantry.

Now raged the battle fierce and long,
Round Gaul's proud eagles legions throng,
Then forms its column close and strong,
"Vive l'Empereur!" shouts valiantly.
Steady as mason through dense smoke,
Nor shot nor shell that column broke,
Bright victories won its memories woke,
And glory spoke its gallantry.

But Picton saw the threaten'd storm,
His columns close a phalanx form,
Ne'er glowed a knightly heart more warm
In days of olden chivalry.
With fire and steel, heart, soul, and might,
Charged England's sons th' advancing fight,
The van led on that gallant knight—
That dreadful shock triumphantly.

On Waterloo the sun has set,
Life's crimson stream the green graves wet,
The bravest of the brave have met,
Died on Fame's death-bed valiantly.
When age to age shall mark the year,
What tombs or tablets need ye brave
Where mounds shall be, and long grass wave—
The slumbering heroes' beraldry.

Propt by a tree, his comrades gone,
A silent warrior rests alone,
His sightless eyes seem gazing on
The field of glory vacantly.
Sits he; as if to catch the sound
Of distant gun or bugle wound,
'Twas Death's cold silence threw his hand
Picton, the knight of chivalry!—J. E. de B.

A WELSH WITNESS.

The attorney for an opposing creditor in a bankruptcy case, on Thursday week, before Mr. Commissioner Stevenson, thinking that a youth whom he was about to examine had rehearsed his part with the bankrupt prior to his entering the court, put the question usually propounded when suspicions of that sort arise:—"Well, my man, have you not seen the bankrupt since the last meeting?" "Yes, I have," was the ready answer. "Well, sir (and he heathens how you answer the question), on your oath what did he say to you?" "Oh my oath be not that I should find the commissioner a naid gentlemanly man."

SINGULAR SCENE AT A FUNERAL.

On Sunday afternoon week the body of an old pensioner, named Penfold, was interred in the churchyard at Patcham, a small village about three miles from Brighton on the London road. The wife of the deceased was attired in a becoming manner, and followed her husband as chief mourner. Behind her, at a respectful distance, was another female, in widow's weeds, who appeared as deeply concerned in the sad ceremony as Mrs. Penfold, and on the corpse leaving the church followed it to the grave, to the no small astonishment of the spectators. It was whispered that the strange widow was also married to deceased, and so it proved. She was Penfold's first wife, from whom he separated many years ago. He enlisted in the Inniskillen dragoons, and went abroad. On his return, supposing his wife to be dead, he married again. His first wife was married again, and we believe her husband is living; but on hearing of the death of her first husband, she resolved, like a true penitent, to pay him the last and tribute of her affection by seeing him laid in his grave. There is another more potent reason, perhaps, for making herself known as his first wife. Penfold, it is said, died possessed of some property, which she lays claim to.

FONTENELLE.

This writer reached the very advanced age of ninety-nine years, and continued his literary pursuits to the last. Lord Orrey, in a letter written from Maraton, near Gastonbury, very beautifully said, "Fontenelle, like our neighbouring thorn, blossoms in the winter of his days." Voltaire pronounced him to be the most universal genius of the age of Louis XIV. A person of quality called on him, and found him in a very ill humour. "What's the matter?" said the nobleman. "The case is this," said the philosopher, "I have only one servant, and I am waited on as badly as you who have twenty."

HYMN OF DARKNESS

Exquisite world! my patient bosom bore
Thine unimpassioned heart; but powers live
In thy pure beauty now—like golden ore
Traversing rocks, or feel my sensitive
The human heart which then were as in cones
Are cedars, or the germ of fire in acorns.
The worlds that were, where are they? Wrecked: the law
Of thy rare beauty clothes each skeleton.
Death struck their living down, though Havoc saw
No human being fall: Fate rushed upon
Reptile and rock alone, and thick-lipt owl,
And crushed them in unfathomable mud.
Then o'er the lifeless hosts there stood unseen
The ardour of creation with warm wing,
Fanning Life's slimy eyes that long had been Entranced: then moors and graceful evening
Arose; and from the red earth's cool caress
Sprung the first human heart and feebleness.

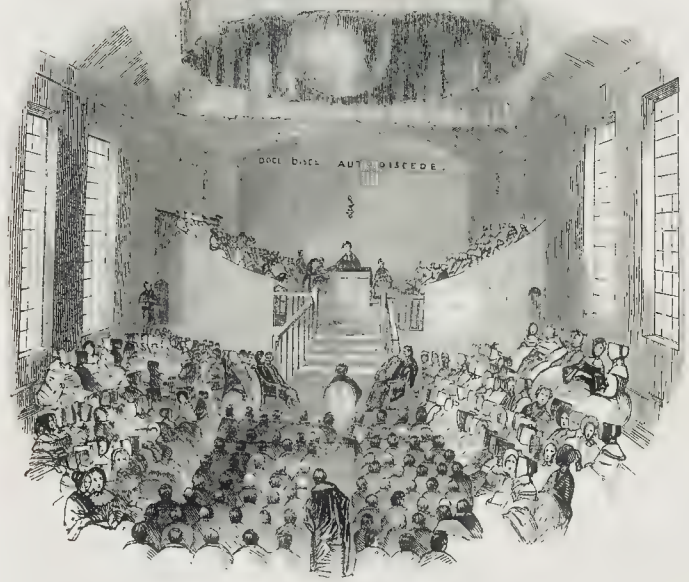
Insects, birds, beasts, and herbs, I love you all
As genitest mothers love their little ones.
I come—the new-born dew-drops quickly fall;
Love leads faint Labour home; the gay fawn runs
To the shy roe, and perceived things
Lie down beneath the shade of my grey wings.

Be not too bold, O earth: the awful hosts
About me bid thee not: they are the pale
Phantoms that rise not yet—the countless ghosts
Of gaunty hearts: canst thou not hear the wail
Of their remorse, nor are the avenger when
The whirlwind rushes o'er thy abodes of men.

Teach I not thee the truthfulness of death,
The blush of roses—the immaculate light
In blues' breasts—their scent-abounding breath—
The poet pale, and the still paler night
Of his poor lamp suppressing? Lo! alone,
Yet once again I shall resume my throne.—H.

STAPLE-INN, NEW CHAMBERS.

This handsome building has just been erected at that part of Staple-inn, Holborn, which communicates with Southampton-buildings. It consists of chambers for the six taxing masters of the Court of Chancery, their clerks, &c., and has been built at the expense of the Honourable Society of Staple-inn. The design is by Messrs. Wigg and Pownall, architects, Bedford-row, and is a masterly specimen of the style of the reign of James I. The foundation is of concrete; the facing is of Suffolk brick, with dressings of Portland stone; the height is about 55 feet; length, 90 feet. Among the peculiarities of construction is the employment of iron girders and shoes let in the walls; no bond-timber being used. The principal apartments on the ground and first floors will be occupied by the masters, and in the centre of the building is a spacious library. The entire structure is raised upon a terrace, and is seen to best advantage from the area of Staple-inn; the embellishments are in the best taste of the period.



ST. PAUL'S SCHOOL.—THE APPOSITION.

The apposition, or recitation of the exercises and speeches of this ancient school, took place on Thursday, the 18th inst., at two o'clock, in the school-room of the institution, in the presence of the Master and Court of Assistants of the Merchant Tailors' Company, the high master of the school and the assistant masters, the pupils of the school, and a large number of visitors, amongst whom were the Dean of Peterborough, Dr. Butler, the principal of King's College; the Rev. Mr. Lonsdale, Mr. Gladstone, M.P., Sir Robert Inglis, M.P., &c. The speeches were well delivered, and the exercises creditable to the classical proficiency of the young aspirants for honours. The following list will show the selection of the recitations and scenes from Greek, Roman, and English dramatists. It was past four o'clock before the business of the morning was concluded:—

It is now upwards of three centuries and a half since Dean Colet, tired with trouble and persecution, characteristic of his times, before he retired from the world founded this excellent institution. The dean, having outlived his numerous brethren, resolved, in the midst of life and health, to consecrate his fortune to some lasting benefaction. This he performed in the foundation of St. Paul's School, of which he appointed William Lily first master in 1512. He endowed it with lands and houses then producing an income of £122 4s. 7½d. per annum, of which endowment he made the Company of Mercers trustees. Accordingly, the members of this company have in rotation the nomination of scholars, who are at the expense of books only. Lily had for some time been the first teacher of Greek in the metropolis. In the year after his appointment he wrote a grammar for the school, which, under his fostering care, soon became distinguished, and set the example for many similar establishments. The revenue of the school has, of course, materially increased; for in 1818 the annual income was about £6300. The original statutes of the school, signed by Dean Colet, were some years ago accidentally picked up at a bookseller's by the late Mr. Hamper, of Birmingham, and by him presented to the British Museum. The schoolhouse has been twice rebuilt: it was destroyed by the great fire of 1666, and rebuilt by Sir Christopher Wren; and this building, being found too small, was taken down, and the present handsome and substantial edifice, facing the eastern end of St. Paul's Cathedral, built, from the designs and under the superintendence of George Smith, Esq., in 1824.

MEMOIR OF THE LATE CHARLES JAS. APPERLEY, Esq. ("NIMROD.")

This gentleman, long and favourably known in sporting circles by the pseudonyme of Nimrod, died in London, on Friday, the 19th instant. As a writer on the theory and practice of fox-hunting Mr. Apperley ranked among the most eminent of those who have adopted that subject. Less elegant in style than Beckford, and inferior to some modern authors in his treatment of the details of kennel management, as a general authority he was as justly popular as, in the majority of instances, he was correct. The spring time of few men's lives produces palateable fruit—less than any that of an author, whose harvest, under the most auspicious circumstances, is long in attaining maturity, should it ever reach it. With the birth, parentage, and education of Nimrod, therefore, we have nothing to do, beyond stating that he was the son of a Welsh gentleman—a bit of a martinet in his way, as your Cambrian 'squires were wont to be—and that the course of Greek and Latin prescribed for the youth of this country was in his case administered according to the approved practice. No doubt he little relished the knocking about he received at the time, but in after years he always spoke gratefully of those who, in his boyhood, had exerted themselves to make him smart. Young Apperley, having gone through his schooling, straightway entered upon the routine that so many—"pity 'tis 'tis true!"—perform. From Rugby he passed into the world—into free living, love, matrimony, misunderstandings, and malcontent. To the latter he attributed his having turned author. "In 1821," he says of himself, "circumstances occurred that rendered my continuing to live with my family very far from desirable, and having made up my mind to occupy a house and farm in some retired part of the country, I began to speculate as to how I should employ those hours which the more requisite attention to the occupations of between two and three hundred acres of land might fail to fill up. I could both hunt and shoot, I was aware, inasmuch as I was about to set myself down in a country abounding with game, and with one pack of fox-hounds close to my door, and two others within easy reach. Still, there are many non-farming as well as non-hunting days in the year, and 'how should I employ myself on such days?' was a question that very naturally presented itself. 'I will write a book upon hunting,' said I to myself, 'a book upon hunting, and other sports of which I had partaken up to the period of my forming the resolution.'"

The sports which he alludes to here he entered upon when he went to reside at Bilton, in Warwickshire, and became a member of the Stratford-upon-Avon Club. Of that portion of his life he never spoke but in terms of unqualified gratification. Independent of its high social character, the members were all fox-hunters to the backbone, and laboured in the pursuit of pleasure as none but true fox-hunters do. Nimrod used to say he never worked so hard in his life as during his connexion with that society. For several seasons, in addition to his stud of hunters at Stratford, he had horses at Chapel House, in Oxfordshire, and at Middleton Stoney, near Bicester, which enabled him to hunt not only with the Warwickshire, but with the Duke of Beaufort and Sir Thomas Mostyn. His constant experience of the systems pursued with various packs of hounds, and a keen observation of their different peculiarities, no doubt laid the foundation of that practical knowledge of the craft he professed which distinguishes his writings. Had he stuck to that, had he confined the operations of his pen to the kennel, the stable, and the field, Mr. Apperley would have left behind him the most perfect treatises on the materiel of the chase that had ever appeared. But he took his note-book into the Melton ball and the drawing-room, and the boon frank fox-hunter became in too many instances the huckster of small talk and retailer of stale gossip.

It was in the year 1821, in consequence of his determination to write upon field practice, that he commenced his career as a contributor to the "Old Sporting Magazine," under the signature of "Nimrod." In that work appeared his well-known Hunting Tours, his Letters on the Condition of Hunters, and on Riding to Hounds. Indeed we should have said his too well-known Tours, &c. &c.; for it was in this his misfortune as his fault, that the public were bidden to his literary feasts, to eat of the same dishes, re-cooked in all sorts of fashions. And here, per parenthese, it may be observed that this custom is fast travelling into licentiousness. It may be correct to re-publish essays in a collected shape, but surely it is not fair to serve them forth under various aliases. Thus, "Foreign Sporting, by Nimrod," should not have made its re-appearance as "Nimrod Abroad," inducing people to read under false pretences. But, returning to our muttons, for a series of years Mr. Apperley continued to write in the magazine aforesaid, to his own profit and that of its owner, Mr. Pittman, a periodical proprietor of whom it is recorded that he might serve as a model to all present and future magazine manufacturers. We have said he continued to write in the "Old Sporting Magazine," or ought perhaps to have said, he never ceased; for the quantity fully equalled the quality. In speaking of his propensity that way he observes—"No man disliked pen and ink more than I did at one period of my life; few men's pursuits were less associated with the desk; but how stand matters now? Why, I have the greatest pleasure in writing, and I really believe life would be burdensome to me without it."

While contributing to the "Old Sporting Magazine," he had a stud of hunters kept for him, a villa called Beau Repaire, in Hampshire, and a monthly income that would have served a German prince. Malgré all these appliances, however, embarrassment, the heritage of letters, overtook him one day in form of a ca. sa.; but a most that surrounded his castle compelled the officers to turn their attack into a siege. So long as the summer lasted he continued to keep them at bay; but winter arrived, "then came a frost, a nipping frost," the besiegers crossed the ice, and "Nimrod" fell, as the Stadtholder had done before him.

On the death of Mr. Pittman a feud sprung up between him and the new proprietor of the "Old Mag." In this dilemma,

> As nought remained but Calais or the Bench,
> He left this land of freedom for the French.

For the last ten or a dozen years Nimrod occupied a pleasant château called St. Pierre, about a mile from Calais, on the road to St. Omer. Here he gave his grey goose quill no holiday, for, besides contributing to a large majority of the monthly periodicals, he wrote several books—one a great mortal tome, ycleped "The Life of a Sportsman," "as big as all dis sheuse"—published by Mr. Ackermann, of Regent-street, at the small charge of two guineas! Among these volumes was the "Life and Death of John Mytton, Esq., of Halston." That most eccentric and unfortunate man was long a staunch friend to Mr. Apperley, and certainly the least graceful act of the author's life was the publication of that biography of his benefactor. But "we come to bury Nimrod"—at least to offer a small parting memoir of the writer—not the man. As a sportsman, that is, a fox-hunter, his early experience was extensive; for, previous to leaving England, he had hunted with eighty-two packs of fox-hounds, to say nothing of staggers and harriers. No question he was a sound theoretical sportsman, and could write to hounds better than any of his contemporaries as well probably as any of his predecessors; but he could never ride to them. He was timid and "abroad" in crossing a country, and burlesqued jockeyship when perpetrating a race. Incomparably his best production is "The Turf, the Chase, and the Road," which originally appeared in the "Quarterly Review"—insufferably his worst, the "Life of a Sportsman," is never likely to appear much beyond the publisher's counter. The virtues of his style are, facility, appropriateness, and technicality; for he always handles his subjects like a workman. Its vices, infirmity of construction, prodigality of the first person singular, and the constant use of the adjective "good" in reference to persons as they apply it on 'Change.

LADY SALE.

THE CABUL CAPTIVITY.

A very interesting series of "Portraits of the Cabul Prisoners" has just been published as illustrations to Lady Sale's and Lieut. Eyre's Journals of the disasters in Affghanistan, 1841-2. These portraits are cleverly drawn on stone by Mr. Lowes Dickinson, by whose permission we are enabled to present the accompanying engravings to our readers. The portrait of Lady Sale is from a drawing by Lieut. Eyre: the physiognomy of our high-minded countrywoman is full of earnestness, and bespeaks true courage, such as is rarely witnessed in this unchivalric age. Her ladyship's enthusiasm in not only minutely noting down events as they occurred, but, often in doing so hourly, has recorded an entire year's stirring events, such as have scarcely a parallel in the annals of modern warfare. Indeed, the "Journal" itself is a surprising work, even apart from the perilous circumstances under which it was penned. It is, throughout, a truthful narrative, chronicling the terrors of the day with extraordinary minuteness, from all kinds of sources—from the reports of the day, from telegraphed news, and from intelligence forwarded by persons of all degrees, engaged in the war, or anxiously watching its fearful results. Lady Sale notes:—"I believe several people kept an account of these proceedings, but all, except myself, lost all they had written, and had recourse to memory afterwards. I lost everything except the clothes I wore, and, therefore, it may appear strange that I should have saved these papers. The mystery is, however, easily solved. After everything was packed on the night before we left Cabul, I sat up to add a few lines to the events of the day, and the next morning I put them in a small bag, and tied them round my waist. * * A much better narrative of past events might now be written, even by myself; but I have preferred keeping my journal as originally written, when events were fresh, and men's minds were biassed by the reports of the day, and even hour."

But the imminent peril amidst which the Journal was written is, perhaps, nowhere so well told as in the page wherein Lady Sale describes her position on the top of her house, whence she had a fine view of the field of action, and where, by keeping behind the chimneys, the "soldier's wife" escaped the bullets that continually whizzed past her.

The next engraving introduces to the reader the scene of the captivity at Cabul.

To this scene the following extract, abridged from Lady Sale's Journal, may prove the best accompaniment.

"Six rooms, forming two sides of an inner square or citadel, are appropriated to us; and a tykhana to the soldiers. This fort is the largest in the valley, and is quite new; it belongs to Mahommed Shah Khan: it has a deep ditch and a fausse-braye all round. The walls of mud are not very thick, and are built up with planks in tiers on the inside. The buildings we occupy are those intended for the chief and his favourite wife; those for three other wives are in the outer court, and have not yet been roofed in. We number nine ladies, twenty gentlemen, and fourteen children. In the tykhana are seventeen European soldiers, two European women, and one child (Mrs. Wade, Mrs. Burnes, and little Stoker). Mahommed Akhbar Khan, to our horror, has informed us that only one man of our force has succeeded in reaching Jellalabad (Dr. Brydon of the Shah's force: he was wounded in two places). Thus is verified what we were told before leaving Cabul, 'That Mahommed Akhbar Khan would annihilate the whole army except one man, who should reach Jellalabad to tell the tale.' Dost Mohammed Khan (the brother of Mahommed Shah Khan) is to have charge of us. Our parties were divided into the different rooms. Lady M'Naghten, Captain and Mrs. Anderson and two children, Captain and Mrs. Boyd and two children, Mrs. Mainwaring and one child, with Lieut. and Mrs. Eyre and one child, and a European girl, Hester Macdonald, were in one room; that adjoining was appropriated for their servants and baggage; Captain Mackenzie and his Madras Christian servant Jacob, Mr. and Mrs. Ryley and two children, and Mr. Fallon, a writer in Captain Johnson's office, occupied another. Mrs. Trevor and her seven children and European servant, Mrs. Smith, Lieut. and Mrs. Waller and child, Mrs. Sturt, Mr. Mein, and I had another. In two others all the rest of the gentlemen were crammed.

"It did not take us much time to arrange our property; consisting of one mattress and resai between us, and no clothes except those we had on, and in which we left Cabul. Mahommed Akhbar Khan, Sultan Jan, and Ghoolam Moyen-oo-deen visited us. The Sirdar assured me we were none of us prisoners; requested that we would make ourselves as comfortable as circumstances would admit of; and told us that as soon as the roads were safe we should be safely escorted to Jellalabad. He further informed me that I might write to Sale; and that any letters I sent he would forward. Of this permission I gladly took advantage to write a few guarded lines to say that we were well and safe.

"19th.—We luxuriated in dressing, although we had no clothes but those on our backs; but we enjoyed washing our faces very much, having had but one opportunity of doing so before, since we left Cabul. It was rather a painful process, as the cold and glare of the sun on the snow had three times peeled my face, from which the skin came off in strips. We had a grand breakfast, dhall and radishes. We parch rice and barley, and make from them a substitute for coffee. Two sheep (alias lambs) are killed daily; and a regular portion of rice and otta given for all. The Affghans cook; and well may we exclaim with Goldsmith, "God sends meat, but the devil sends cooks;" for we only get some greasy skin and bones served out as they are cooked, boiled in the same pot with the rice, all in a lump. Captain Lawrence divides it, and portions our food as justly as he can. The chupatty is at once the plate and bread: few possess other dinner-table implements than their fingers. The rice even is rendered nauseous by having quantities of rancid ghee poured over it, such as in India we should have disdained to use for our lamps.

"24th.—A day or two ago the Sirdar sent some chintz to be divided amongst us. A second quantity was to-day given out; and we are working hard that we may enjoy the luxury of getting on a clean suit of clothes. There are very few of us that are not covered with crawlers; and, although my daughter and I have as yet escaped, we are in fear and trembling."

The next portrait is after an original sketch from life, by G. T. Vigne, Esq., and represents the treacherous Akhbar, in war-costume.

It should, in justice, be stated that Mahommed Akhbar behaved throughout courteously to the prisoners; and their privations and sufferings seem to have been, in a great degree, the unavoidable consequence of their position and the state of the country.

MAHOMMED AKHBAR KHAN.

The portraits comprised in the above work are twenty-five in number, including those of Lieut. Eyre, the late Captain James Skinner, Sir W. H. M'Naghten, Sha Shuja Ool Moolk, Major Pottinger, Captain Connolly, Mrs. Eyre, Mrs. Waller, &c. There are besides eight views of the localities of the disasters, as, the exterior of a prison near Cabul, the fort in which General Elphinstone died, the Burmese idols, &c. Altogether the series must be regarded as almost indispensible accompaniments to the narratives they are intended to illustrate, showing, as they do, the principal actors in the "strange, eventful" twelvemonth; and the history of the world harely contains scenes of more terrific interest.

SAILING MATCH OF THE THAMES ROYAL YACHT CLUB, OFF GREENWICH.

On Tuesday there was a beautiful day's sailing amongst the yachts belonging to this distinguished club. The weather was exceedingly propitious, not only for sailing, but also, with the trifling drawback of a few minutes' showers, pleasurable to the highly respectable and numerous company that attended the match. It was the opening below-bridge match of the season, and the Royal Sovereign steamer, as usual, was engaged for the conveyance of the officers of the club, its members and their friends. The prizes were three very handsome pieces of plate, to be disposed of between two classes of boats; under 25 tons for the first class, and under 12 tons for the second class, with two prizes for the first class, that is, first and second if five started, and one prize, of course, to the first yacht of the second class. The following yachts had been entered to sail from Greenwich to Coal-house Point (two miles below Gravesend) and back:—

FIRST CLASS.

Yachts.	Tons.	Owners.
Phantom.	20	A. O. Wilkinson, Esq.
Cruiser	26	W. Pegg, Esq.
Mystery	23	Lord Alfred Paget.
Meteor	25	T. F. Berney, Esq.
Blue Belle	25	A. Fountaine, Esq.
SECOND CLASS.
Brilliant	8	H. Fowler, Esq.
Dolphin	10	T. and J. M. Wanhill, Esqrs.
Fay	13	J. T. Hawes, Esq.
Termagant	12	J. Wright, Esq.
Foam	7	F. Davey, jun., Esq.
Ripple	9	C. G. Guthrie, Esq.
Briton	7	G. Hammond Whalley, Esq.
Lady Louisa	12	T. Smith, Esq.

The Mystery, Lord Alfred Paget's, was the great card of the first class; those that had seen or heard of the power she had exhibited last season—of the prizes she had carried off in numerous engagements on the coast—backed her in many instances at even against the field. Next to the Mystery stood in the scale of betting the Blue Belle, built since last season by Ditchburn and Co. She, like the Mystery, is an iron boat, and being laid down by the same firm as Lord Alfred Paget's, was necessarily presumed to be near first-rate. Thus much of the two great cracks.

On the arrival of the steamer at Greenwich, the valuable prizes were submitted to the inspection of the Governor of the Hospital, the Hon. Sir R. Stopford, who is vice-patron of the club.

The wind was blowing freshly from the E.S.E., and the Phantom was at the southermost station of her class, and the Brilliant of the second. The start took place at seven minutes past eleven, and was throughout most beautiful; the whole canting round without the slightest accident, and being in trim and under way at the same instant. They were all together for a few minutes, when the Mystery took the lead, closely followed by the Phantom, the Meteor, the Cruiser, and the Blue Belle; and in the Second Class the Dolphin led, the Termagant was second, and the Ripple third. Immediately after this, and before their arrival at Woolwich Dock-yard, the Mystery, for want of sufficient wind, fell a trifle astern, and the Phantom went into the first place, closely followed by the Blue Belle. On entering Gallions, the Phantom, Blue Belle, and Mystery were on the south shore, at equal distances from each other, and presented a very pretty appearance: in Long Reach, the Mystery went to windward of the Blue Belle, and took the second place. The Mystery now made up to the Phantom, and weathered her in gallant style off Erith, but in coming out of Northfleet Hope, the Blue Belle, after some excellent sailing, went to windward of the Mystery, and took the first place, which she held down to Coal-house Point, where she rounded first at 43 minutes past 2, the Mystery at 47 minutes past, and the Phantom at 49 minutes 35 seconds past. It was dead low water on the yachts turning, and the Belle and the Mystery were close together until nearing Woolwich, when the Blue Belle was a yard or so only in advance, both hugging the south shore. The Mystery tried to go to windward of her, but she luffed up, and on their facing the point, the Blue Belle touched the shore, and at this moment the Mystery went to windward of her still nearer the shore, and also touched the ground. A man or two instantly ran out on the point of the bowsprit, and easing her aft, she ran off the shore in gallant style, and amidst deafening shouts, leaving her opponent fast on the shore, where the Phantom also passed her. They arrived at Greenwich thus:—Mystery first, at 46 minutes 30 seconds past 5; the Phantom, 51 minutes 30 seconds past 5; the Cruiser at 9 minutes past 6. In the Second Class, the Dolphin came in 10 minutes past 6; the Termagant, 15 minutes 30 seconds past 6; and the Brilliant at 42 minutes past. The first prize, which was a very magnificent cup, was then presented to Lord Alfred Paget; and the second and third prizes were also presented to A. O. Wilkinson and T. and M. Wanhill, Esqrs., as the owners of the other victorious boats.

THEATRICAL PORTRAITS.

MISS HELEN FAUCIT AS ELVIRA.

THE NEW TRAGEDY, ATHELWOLD.

The subject of this tragedy has been treated by play-wrights it several shapes, but whether from something revolting in the story, or their inability to overcome the difficulty of the chief incident, it never has kept hold of the stage as a stock piece for any considerable time, nor is it likely, we fear, to do so in the present attempt. Aaron Hill's "Athelwold," which was produced in 1731, had a comparative success for a brief period, but since then has been forgotten, and would have remained for ever in its sleep of oblivion were it not now awakened to stand contrast with its modern rival. The heroine of the tale is a woman devoid of everything but personal charms, for the display of which she is content to forego every consideration that is honourable or virtuous. Such a character cannot enlist our sympathies for a moment; there is nothing of the gradual plunging into crime, superinduced by the machinations, of that "unspiritual god, Circumstance;" she is an exception to the old axiom, that nemo repente fuit turpissimus—she is vicious in limine; but bad as she has been depicted by the old annalist Stowe, she is made to appear still worse by the present dramatic artist, who draws her mental portrait with the addition of some "grim features" that add nothing of "the horribly beautiful" to the picture. The language of the piece is bare and there sprinkled with some poetry, but the general tenour of it is prosaic, and in many passages highly objectionable. By a slight but effective alteration in the conduct of Elfrida, a most moral and efficient play could have been written on this subject, worthy of the exercise of such a pen as now-a-days belongs almost exclusively to the muse of Knowles. Of the acting much must be said in terms of the highest commendation. Macready as Athelwold was, what he is not often, natural and pathetic, without any revelation of the trickeries of histrionism; there was more of the "ars celandi artem" thrown away upon many indifferent passages than would have immortalized him in Shakspere. The following lines were beautifully uttered:—

"I neither care
To sentence, nor to censure. I am here
Solely to suffer, to endure, to mourn
My fatal, gross deception."

Miss H. Faucit is an actress of such exquisite and artless tenderness, when left to her own discretion, that we cannot but deplore any schooling which, in itself bad, tends to repress and confine the native energy and grace of her powers.

In clear conception, particularly of amiable characters, and the native expression of their feelings, she is not inferior to any actress now living, or, indeed, any whom we remember. In everything that calls forth the gentlest sensibilities of the heart she is "all heart herself;" while the nice and subtle distinctions which she makes in the different phases of a part—varying without destroying its identity—do equal honour to her head. Everything bad sits badly upon Miss Faucit—on the contrary, everything good derives additional virtue from her impersonation of it; the better the text the purer is her delivery; the nobler the sentiment the more powerful the effect she produces; imparting to, at the same time that she borrows from, the inspirations of her author; or, in the fadeless language of our evergreen dramatist,—

"Stealing and giving odour."
"Let her smiles, then, monsters of the mind,
And represent nought but her own sweet kind!"

HAYMARKET THEATRE.

Sheridan's admirable dramatic satire, "The Critic," has been revived at this (now only) legitimate theatre, and was acted throughout with an unusual gusto by the performers. Farren, in Sir Fretful Plagiary, was beyond all praise. Even if there were but this solitary star left from the bright constellation of genuine English comedians which shone so brilliantly a few years since, there is still light enough left to shed a glory upon our stage. He is perfection itself in everything he personates in the wide range of his wonderful versatility. Mr. Charles Mathews sustained the difficult part of Puff most admirably: his nonchalance was inimitable. The other performers also acquitted themselves most satisfactorily—Mrs. Stanley, Mr. Stuart, Mr. Tilbury, and Mr. Gallot, in the respective parts of Mrs. Dangle, Sneer, Dangle, and the Prompter. The "tragedy" was performed with an unusual attention to new readings, situations, &c., and formed a most ludicrous satire upon the "getting up" of pompous pieces so frequently to be seen in our time. Mrs. Humby and Buckstone were irresistible, as may be also said of the rest of the serious dramatis personæ: in fact, "laughter roar'd out to see the sight," and the applauses of a numerous and fashionable audience were "many and very near between." The other performances were the new and interesting musical drama of "The Little Devil," and the comedy of "My Wife's Husband." There is a spirit of nationality about the lessee of this legitimate stage, which for the nation's sake as well as his own we are glad to see encouraged. If a foreigner were to arrive here in quest of the old native English comedy, anxious to see performed what might have delighted him in perusal, namely, the works of Sheridan, Murphy, Colman, &c., where could he have his wish gratified so happily as at the delightful little evergreen house (we cannot now call it a mere summer one) as the Haymarket? If it be true that we are threatened with the total expulsion of English drama ere long, the sisters of the sock and buskin cannot say they left our shores friendless and unprotected so long as they had the asylum offered to them by Mr. Webster's judgment and liberality. But it is all nonsense to say that the taste for the true drama is on the decline: let any one who loves it go to the Haymarket and witness its reception there.

LITERATURE.

THE STRANGER IN INDIA; or Three Years in Calcutta. By GEORGE W. JOHNSON, Esq., Advocate of the Supreme Court at Calcutta. 2 vols. 8vo. Colburn.

Public writers in this country have long complained of the apathy and indifference evinced by the public relative to the affairs of our great empire in India, but this insensibility seems in a fair way of being remedied, at least if the number of books published relative to India be any fair criterion. There are Sketches of India, and First Impressions, and Adventures of Griffins—Overland Routes and Rough Notes without number, and there are few of them which will not be found to yield good store of information, both novel and interesting, to the untravelled citizen, who is loath to quit the comforts of his fireside and domestic ease for the excitement and hardships inseparable from a visit to the Far East.

Three years in Calcutta would seem to be no bad apprenticeship to the career of a thoroughbred Indian. Mr. Johnson appears to have spent his time in such a way as to be both profitable to himself and useful to his readers; for we have read few books on India which contain a greater amount of information, conveyed in a more familiar and unpretending style. His observations are the more valuable as he is far from having confined himself, like the generality of English tourists or visitants, to the mere ordinary society of his countrymen domesticated in India. The manners and customs of the native population appear to have had, and justly so, more attractions for him. History has no scene more astonishing than the firm and long-continued establishment of English domination in India. Greece or Rome never exhibited its parallel. Never have a conquered race lived in such tranquil subjection to the power of the conquerors. Causes of difference, notwithstanding, have been more rife than are recorded in any analogous case. Religion, language, manners—in all things the hand of nature seems to have marked out the two nations as aliens and enemies; yet experience shows, as if to confirm the old maxim of extremes meeting, that there is in each a remarkable tendency to adopt all that is imitable in the other. The English in India become domesticated to the ways of the Hindoos—their Oriental pomp and luxury, their long trains of attendants, their cookery, and even in some respects their ways of thinking; while the Hindoos embrace the faith of their conquerors, acquire ideas of refinement and delicacy which they had not before, and even learn their language. From all this union of elements so dissimilar there will perhaps spring up some product hardly yet expected, and only dimly seen through the darkness of the future—some new and vigorous nation, which will unite English intellect and energy with Asiatic forms and temperaments—which, fighting under the banner of the Cross, when ancient superstitions have been cast away, will carry its standards to the central land of Tartary, and establish a new faith, a new learning, a new political system on the ruins of what will then be antiquity.

Turning from these speculations, we find matter of frequent interest sufficient to occupy us in Mr. Johnson's volumes, which are replete with subjects attractive to all who take an interest in the existing condition and future destinies of the people of India. He points out several causes which powerfully contribute to retard its advance to civilization, and, among others, a Hindoo law, which the lukewarm zeal of Christian governors has not yet repealed:—

At present, conversion to Christianity from Hindooism is prevented most powerfully by the persecution and loss of property to which it subjects the convert, according to Hindoo laws. Many natives, converts in heart to our religion, have acknowledged to me that they were deterred from its open profession solely by the ruin to which such an avowal would subject them.

The Hindoo law decrees that such apostates from the religion of Bramah forfeit all their landed property, become incapable of inheritance, and are outlaws and outcasts. A regulation of Lord W. Bentinck's neutralized, in some measure, this law, which would bind its slaves either to ignorance or hypocrisy; but that regulation does not effectually protect the native convert, and the following instances related by Mr. Hill are unexaggerated examples of many cases which came to my knowledge in Calcutta.

A Hindoo youth desired to be baptized, but added, "in that event, can any of my relatives seize my property?" An answer to this query was sought from the highest authority, who replied that, although the regulation passed by Lord W. Bentinck, bearing in mind, protect the youth, yet his relatives would have recourse to such artifices, and pursue him so pertinaciously with litigation, that he must advise the youth to sell his landed estates before his desire for baptism could be known.

The eagerness of the Hindoos to acquire the purer and more enlightened civilization of Europe, through the only practicable source, a knowledge of European speech, is fully exemplified in the following passage:—

The facility with which the natives acquire the English language is very striking; not merely in the compositions and conversations of such as are students of the Hindoo college, but in the readiness with which even the most illiterate attain to an easy comprehension of those who speak to them in that tongue. Many of them, however, undertake to write it, who afford very lucid illustrations of the assertion that "a little learning is a dangerous thing;" for every master occasionally receives petitions from his domestics relative to some fancied grievance, containing the most farcical errors; and even those who undertake to write English for public inspection are not altogether competent to the work. The names, &c., written over the native shops, are generally highly ludicrous. Thus, a craftsman who wished not only to inform Calcutta of his trade, but that he had practised in the Western Presidency, has this on his sign-board:—"Dadabhoy, carpenter at Bombay."

Mr. Johnson, as a practitioner in our Indian courts of justice, had many opportunities of observing the low state of morality among the native population, of which he gives several curious instances. Their ignorance, notwithstanding all that has been done of late years by the British Government in the erection of schools, is so dense as to furnish even to half-instructed Europeans matter for sorrow or laughter, according as their disposition may incline them:—

The ignorance of their doctors—those who have had no instruction from European professors—is most appalling; and no wonder, for their medical manuscripts show that they have no rational idea of medicines or their operation, and quite as little of the causes of disease. I have had abundant opportunities of hearing this ignorance exposed by native practitioners who have been examined in the witness-box of the Supreme Court, and can unreservedly say that the want of knowledge betrayed was always profound. Then, in a trial relative to the murder of a woman by unskilful treatment during her accouchement, it was stated by three witnesses to be their usual practice, when the labour was protracted, to force the patient from her couch, and drag her about the room by her hair!

Fever they attribute, in all instances, to the patient's exposure to cold, and as invariably administer a compound of stimulating drugs, which they term cooling, producing astringency, thirst, and inflammation.

Again, upon the occasion of an issue to try whether a child was born blind, it was ludicrous, not so much to hear the conflicting evidence as to whether or not the infant was born afflicted, as the reasons assigned by the native practitioners for their several opinions. The point was important; for, if the infant had the power of vision for only a few hours, or even minutes, it would not fall within the disinheriting rule of the Hindoo law relative to blindness. This law of disherison consequent on such a privation prevails in almost all Eastern countries, and accounts for the despotic deprivation of sight which so many tyrants, upon their accession to the throne, have inflicted upon their relatives.

The most learned men among the Hindoos are their pundits, the interpreters of their laws; but their opinions, those of the Brahmins who attend upon their sacred rites, are proverbially ignorant and immoral.

On the tendency of the form of government by which our Indian empire is administered to degenerate into its cognate vice of despotism we have some curious particulars:—

The most flagrant attempt I remember was a proposition to admit, in criminal cases, evidence taken against a prisoner in his absence. The draft of the proposed act was actually published in the government gazette, and if one gentleman had not raised his voice loudly against this proposed inlet for the exercise of the greatest oppression that can scourge a land, it would have passed into a law. So strong was the tendency to tyranny, inherent in our Indian form of government, could be adduced than that to the mind of such a man as Lord Auckland a measure like this should not appear abhorrent to every just idea of liberty. The act proposed was no trivial innovation, but of so grave a character as to be utterly inexcusable upon any plea of convenience.

We have been obliged to omit many passages we had marked for extraction in this work, but we thought it advisable to confine ourselves to those bearing more immediately on the moral and political condition of the Hindoos, to which recent events have lent so strong an interest.

CHURCH, UNIVERSITIES &c.

The Earl of Abergavenny has appointed the Rev. Robert Gream, M.A., rector of Rotherfield, Sussex, domestic chaplain to his lordship.

The same noble earl has presented the Rev. J. D. Macfarlane, late of St. Edmund Hall, Oxford, to the rectory of Sutton, Norfolk.

The Rev. Edward Bellh, M.A., vicar of South Berstead, near Bognor, Sussex, has been presented by his parishioners with a superb silver candelabrum and a pair of silver candlesticks, as a token of esteem for the zeal shown by the rev. gentleman in the discharge of his ministerial duties.

Mr. G. B. Rusbout has presented the Rev. R. Whitefoord, of Queen's College, Oxford, to the rectory of the second portion of Burford, Shropshire.

Earl Cornwallis has presented the Rev. E. Moore, of Brasenose College, Oxford, to the rectory of Boughton Malherbe, Kent.

THE BISHOP OF BATH AND WELLS.—In consequence of the inability of this right reverend prelate, from his extreme age and increasing infirmities, to perform his episcopal duties, the Bishop of Salisbury has undertaken the triennial visitation of the diocese. His lordship will consecrate several new churches and chapels, and will hold a series of confirmations in the month of August.

OXFORD.—There will be an election at Magdalen College on the 26th of July, to fill three vacant fellowships on the foundation of that college, open to graduates of the university who are respectively natives of Lincolnshire, Yorkshire, and Berkshire. Mr. J. E. Welby, Fellow of Magdalen College, was on Thursday week admitted to the degree of Master of Arts. J. W. Sergé, of Queen's College, has been elected a scholar on the Michel foundation of the same college. The Rev. J. B. Hughes, of Magdalen College, has been appointed assistant master in Marlborough School, for the sons of clergymen and others.

CAMBRIDGE.—At the last congregation the following degrees were conferred. Honorary Masters of Arts. The Hon. George Francis Stewart Eliot, Trinity College, son of the Earl of Minto. The Hon. Walter William Brabazon Ponsonby, Trinity College, son of Viscount Duncannon. Bachelors of Arts:—George John Boucher, King's College; William Bryce Watson, Trinity College; John Augustus Tulk, Trinity College; Richard Snow Mortimer Buckingham, Trinity College, Ferdinand Ernest Tower, St. John's College; Charles Alsager Tryon, St. John's College; George Stallard, St. John's College; John James Halls, Corpus Christi College; Thomas White house, Sydney Sussex College. At the same congregation the Senate awarded £100 to Mr Ansted, of Jesus College, for his assistance in arranging the geological collection during the last two years.

On Tuesday morning, at the early hour of five o'clock, the election of a Master of Sydney Sussex College took place in the chapel of the college. The electors consisted of ten Fellows. At nine o'clock, A.M., the result of the election was declared in favour of the Rev. Mr. Phelps, Tutor of the college.

OXFORD.—On Sunday last Dr. Pusey preached to a large congregation at Christchurch, and publicly, and without reserve, professed and taught the peculiar fundamental doctrine of the Roman Catholic Church, namely, Transubstantiation. The text taken was that which describes the institution of the Lord's Supper by our Lord—Matthew xxvi. 26, 27, 28, compared with John, vi. v. 54. Dr Pusey, in practising his application on subject, spoke of the Lord's Supper as the means of continuing and maintaining the spiritual life imparted in baptism, and urged to more frequent communion, both on the part of "the holy" and of "sinners;" the former, that they may enjoy an antepast of heaven; the latter, that they might, peradventure, obtain the remission of sins. The sensation created by the reverend doctor's sermon has since been considerably increased by the announcement that a copy of the discourse has been demanded by the University authorities, with a view to examination and probable cessation. It is stated that Dr. Pusey has, however, requested two days for consideration before complying with the request, and that it is conjectured that he intends to plead the circumstance of the sermon having been preached in his own cathedral at Christchurch, of which, as professor of Hebrew, he is a canon, as a reason for exemption from the cognisance of the academical authorities

SEIZURE OF COLLEGE PLATE FOR POOR RATES AT OXFORD.—At the recent Oxford city sessions an appeal was heard against the poor-rate of St. Michael's parish, on the ground that the Colleges of Exeter and Jesus (the whole of the site being in that parish) were not fairly rated. After hearing evidence as to their rateable value, the court ordered the rate to be amended, by increasing Exeter College from £3 15s. to £23 3s. per rate, and Jesus from £7 1s. to £19 8s. 6d. Upon the parish officers demanding the rate both colleges refused paying, whereupon distress warrants were granted, and three dozen of silver forks were seized from the former college, and three silver tankards from the latter. Exeter immediately redeemed theirs by paying the cash; and Jesus did the same on Saturday. It is expected that actions will be at once commenced against the parish officers for an illegal seizure, as the colleges claim exemption from poor-rates for the greater part of the buildings.

BISHOP OF LONDON'S CONFIRMATIONS.—The following are the Bishop of London's arrangements for a course of confirmations throughout the county of Essex:—October 4, Harlow, morning; Epping, afternoon; 5, Ingatestield, morning, Bishop's Stortford, afternoon; 6, Saffron Walden, morning, Thaxted, afternoon; 7, Dunmore, morning, Bocking, afternoon; 9, Great Yeldham, morning, Halstead, afternoon; 10, Coggeshall, morning, Kelvedon, afternoon; 11, Great Bromley, morning, Great Oakley, afternoon; 13, Witham, morning, Maldon, afternoon; 14, Southminster, morning; 16, Chelmsford, morning, Brentwood, afternoon; 17, Great Burstead, morning, Rayleigh, afternoon; 18, Rochford, morning; 19, Orsett, morning, Romford, afternoon.

NATIONAL SPORTS.

THE TURF.

To say that nothing is thought of at this moment by sporting people but Epsom races would be to propound an indictable libel upon that prodigious event. Not a cockney who knows the difference between a horse-chesnut and a chesnut horse has thought, spoken, or dreamt of anything during the past fortnight beyond Cotherstone, Bill Scott, lobster, salads, iced champagne, a white Chesterfield, and Gray's "undeniable turn-out;" and, as for the females of the species, from parasols à la Chanter to "sandet shoes," of the choicest kid or prunella, they have been armed cap-à-pie for months. The next time an enemy proposes the capture of Great Britain, let him make his descent upon her coasts on the Epsom *Derby

EXHIBITION.—Sir GEORGE HAYTER'S GREAT PICTURE of the HOUSE of COMMONS, painted on 170 square feet of canvass, and containing Portraits of all the Members, a Portrait of the Queen, and various other historical pictures, in which are more than eight hundred portraits of eminent men of the present day, is OPEN for EXHIBITION, from Ten o'clock till dusk, every day, at the Egyptian Hall, Piccadilly.—Admission, 1s. each person.

THE CHINESE COLLECTION, HYDE PARK CORNER.—The unique Collection consists of objects exclusively Chinese, and surpasses in extent and grandeur any similar display in the known world. The spacious saloon is 226 feet in length, and is approached by a grand avenue, forming a portion of the Collection embraces upwards of sixty figures as large as life, portraits from nature, appropriately attired in their native costume, the members of the household of the highest rank to the wandering mendicant; also many thousand specimens in natural history and manufactures connective, the whole illustrating the appearance, manners, and customs, and social life of more than three hundred millions Chinese.—Open from Ten till Ten.—Admittance, 2s. 6d.; Children under Twelve Years, 1s.

PARR'S LIFE PILLS.—The sale of this wonderful medicine has extended all over the world; and the benefit resulting from their use is experienced by persons in all climes and countries. From the following extract it will be seen that, in British North America, PARR'S LIFE PILLS are producing their undoubted results—the resurrection of the afflicted to health. Extract of a letter received from Messrs. Savage and Co., Montreal, from Mr. Varry, a respectable medical gentleman, in Niagara, British North America —

"Enclosed I send you cash, being the amount of first supply of PARR'S LIFE PILLS. I am now entirely out of the Pills, and could have sold many more on Saturday evening, as they are enquired for every day, and as a small appointment prevails in the town and neighbourhood in consequence of my supply being consumed. I have sold some few boxes to a country merchant who has been afflicted with an affection of the Diaphragm and Liver, and he has found so much relief from the Pills that he has determined upon introducing them in his neighbourhood. I have been visited by a gentleman who has received the greatest benefit from the Pills, and who has been afflicted with an affection of the Diaphragm and Liver, and several persons in this town have been cured of different disorders by their use:—one woman was confined to the house for six weeks under one of our most skilful physicians with a liver complaint, and was told by him that she would never recover. This gentleman cupped her and said if the pain returned in the evening he would not attend. The pain did return, and she sent for PARR'S LIFE PILLS. This was on Thursday, and on the following Sabbath she was able to go home from church, and attend at church. Her husband informs me that his wife is now in better health than she has been for ten years. One case more before I close. An old woman living next door to my father for the last fifteen years has, to my knowledge, been afflicted for that length of time with inflammation of the eyelids—so bad at times as to deprive her of sight. She is upwards of 50 years of age, and for years could eat nothing but certain kinds of food. She has been taking PARR'S LIFE PILLS—her eyes are well, and she can eat anything with a good appetite. This case of cure I have been an eye-witness to. (Signed,) GEORGE VAREY, Jun.

SCHWEPPE'S SODA and POTASS WATERS.—The Public are respectfully cautioned against imitations of the above celebrated articles, unprincipled persons filling Schweppe's bottles with a spurious composition, and palming it upon consumers as Schweppe's manufacture. Their Aerated Lemonade is equally protected by a yellow label on the bottle. J. R. and Co. are importers of German Wines, and lists of prices of these and all other descriptions of Foreign Wines sent, on application, postage free —91, Barnars-street, London; and Liverpool, Bristol, and Derby.

THE FACT is established in the most satisfactory manner, by comparison, that DISON is selling Cambric Pocket Handkerchiefs, one third lower in price than they have before been offered, caused by his having availed himself of the stagnation of commercial affairs in France, and purchased (for cash) a large quantity of cambrics at a great discount. He is offering beautifully fine hem-stitched real French cambric handkerchiefs at 3½s. and 4s. 6d. per dozen, the latter equal to those usually charged 5½s. Gentlemen, as well as ladies should promptly avail themselves of this rare chance. The Irish cambric handkerchiefs he has from 16s. a dozen. Purchasers will be sure to have goods, as they really are, not Irish passed as French, and all warranted, of DISON, No. 37, Regent-street, her Majesty's principal lace-man.

ELASTIC BOOTS THE QUEEN'S BOOTS.

SEA BATHING.
BOGNOR has always been a favourite resort for SEA BATHING.—Her gracious Majesty Queen Victoria, with her Royal Mother, resided at Bognor during her infancy; and the late Princess Charlotte delighted to honour this agreeable bathing place with her presence. Owing to its mild and balmy air, Bognor has always been considered, by the most eminent of the faculty, a truly desirable spot for the invalid. Of late, the town has been greatly improved; a promenade and carriage drive have been completed, commodious lodging-houses erected, a large hotel added to the former number, and the streets newly paved.—The beach and sands present a gradual and easy inclined plane for bathing; no rocks or pebbles intervene, but the finest sand. A MAY GARLAND

TO CELEBRATE THE ANNIVERSARY

OF THE

ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

FOR THE WEEK ENDING SATURDAY, MAY 27, 1843.

OFFICE, 198, STRAND.

INVOCATION TO MAY

"Of all the fair months that round the sun
In light-link'd dance their circles run,
Sweet May, sweet May, thou'rt dear to me"

MOORE.

"We frolic while 'tis May."

GRAY.

Descend, sweet May,
Thou queen of flow'rs,
In vernal robes
To dress the bow'rs!

Give the woods
Their chequer'd shade,
Give the floods
Their silent flow:

Break the pause
That music made,
And wake the birds
From winter's woe!

Month to ev'ry poet dear,
Fairest nursling of the year!
Handmaid who, with leafy wing,
Fans the cheek of wanton spring;
Ere the summer's burning flushes
Tinge it with confessing blushes,
That she will a mother soon
Be to many a rose in June!
Season of delight and love,
Welcome from the fields above!

* * * * * *

She comes—the varied vernal May!
Let's haste to gather our "BOUQUET!"
First, the peerless primrose flowers,
Cull'd along the way-side bow'rs;
Twine them with the crowsfoot creeping,
And "The shepherd's glass" that, sleeping,
In the meadow loves to lie
Till the dewy grass be dry!

Here are yellow cowslips glowing—
And blue violets scarce showing
Their sweet eyes like a maiden when
She hears love's first confession word,
And turns away—nor looks again,
Save as a startled, trembling bird!

This white and rosy May will twine
Most sweetly with the young woodbine!
And sprinkle these gay butterflies—
The meek'ry of their different dyes,
The sulphur, peacock, tortoiseshell,
Will harmonize our garland well!
And wisely, too, a moral show,
That they when touch'd away will fly—
Likely worldly joy that oft we know
Upon the tasting lip will die!

"Forget-me-not," and harebell too,
And the field hyacinth so blue;
Besides the flow'r to which, they say,
NARCISSUS gaz'd himself away
In mirror of a glassy stream!
Forsooth! some poet's fancy dream!

Crocus, with its varied hues,
Let us 'mid our sweets infuse;
Queen of meadow, and the bloom,
Sembling bee without his hum.
Orchis, with deceiving form,
Mimicking the insect swarm!
Lords-and ladies spotted gay
We will range in bright array!
Ev'rything of grove or field
The "painted populace" can yield!

Next we'll skim the streamlet's wave
For the lotus-flow'rs that lave,
Blue and yellow blossoms spread
Widely o'er their rocking bed!

Now from lowly let us climb,
To snatch a garland from the lime;
Or the infant oaks' first budding,—
And the perfum'd chesnut studding
His green lance-like leaves with flow'rs,
That, as distant castle-tow'rs!
Frown their battlements of fear,
Till their sweetness draws you near,

And you find that peace and love
Are mingling kisses sweet above,
'Mid the blossoms that afar
Seem'd the mimic homes of war!

Through the garden's richer store
We will range to gather more!
—— But hold! not rudely be the task commenc'd,
The garden is the Rose's Palace fenc'd
By ancient ban is of cunning artifice!
All other flow rs are menials to her there;—
SULTANA she, to one sole sacrifice
In love's devotion, which she will not share
With aught of earth beside!
'Tis a sweet theme,
Which many a muse before has tried:—
Let LOVE now dare
The hands profane which touch the lyre,
They but essay (it were no crime t' aspire)
To sing again that oft sung tale:
THE MAY-ROSE AND THE NIGHTINGALE!

"Chang'd in their outward form, but changeless still
In heart and love devotion, like the flow'r
And tuneful night-bird of the Persian song!"
Anon.

Now doth the 'enamour'd nightingale
In province of the sun,
Embow'r'd in some lone, deep Iranian vale,
His plaintive descants run
In long divisions through the list'ning night:
While stars above,
To hear his sweet lipp'd melody,
Silence their spheral minstrelsy,
And even veil their light,
That she, his floral queen of love,
The rose of May,
Should, guileless but to him, the mossy vest
That doth conceal her snow envermeil'd breast
Unbind from out its verdant zone,
To feed his rapture'd eyes alone,
And in return drink deep his soul-infused lay!

Perchance 'tis fable that such lovers are:—
But even so,
What child of Fancy would forego
A creed which has been since the morning star
Of Poësy first shed its beam
On young Imagination's dream;
And taught us, scions of th' immortal mind,
The beauty and the innocence
Of wreathing, e'en with small pretence
Of our poor limited creative sense,
Garlands of graceful thought, in shapes of this sweet kind!

Live on, thou fiction or romantic truth,
Poetry a child, which e'er, thou wert and art,
Born in the spring-flush of her early youth,
And dear to ev'ry warm impassion'd heart,
That since has thrill'd to hear a love-fraught tale,
Like yours, sweet May-rose, and enamour'd night'ngale!
* * * * * * * *

MAY-DAY.

Now the bright morning star, day's harbinger,
Comes dancing from the east, and leads with her
The flow'ry MAY, who from her green lap throws
The yellow cowslip and the pale primrose.
Hail, bounteous MAY! that dost inspire
Mirth and youth with warm desire;
Woods and groves are of thy dressing,
Hill and dale doth boast thy blessing:
Thus we salute thee with our early song,
And welcome thee and wish thee long!

So sings Milton to the sweet Birdmonth—he whose mighty mind, "nigh sphered in Heaven," hymned the soft beauty of the first day that dawned upon the infant world, which surely must have been a May-morning—

Sweet day, so calm, so pure, so bright,
The bridal of the earth and sky!

What must have been a May-morning in Paradise, when even now, in the homeliest districts, it gladdens the heart of man, with its advent of young flowers and budding leaves, and sweetly singing birds? It seems to be Nature's own birthday, throughout the varied kingdoms of her living world. All countries have invariably greeted the welcome arrival of this fair day, but none more than old Pastoral England, in the time of her elder poets. There was "a sweet contention" between them and the nightingale—the thrush—the cuckoo and the robin, as to which could usher in the May with the most appropriate music. The following ancient song, written in 1600, aptly exemplifies this:—

Spring, the sweet spring,
Is the year's pleasant king;
Then blooms each thing,
Then maids dance in a ring;
Cold doth not sting:
The pretty birds do sing
Cuckow—jugge, jugge,
Pu we, to witta woo.

The palm and May
Make country houses gay,
Lambs frisk and play,
The shepherds pipe all day;
And we hear aye
Birds tune this merry lay,
Cuckow—jugge, jugge,
Pu we, to witta woo

The fields breathe sweet,
The daisies kiss our feet,
Young lovers meet,
Old wives a sunning sit;
In every street
These tunes our ears do greet,
Cuckow—jugge, jugge,
Pu we, to witta woo!

The custom of welcoming in May-morning has been observed in various manners in different countries. We say "has been," for the refinements of civilization have in a great degree banished all the festival observances of our merry ancestors. Even jolly old Christmas,

"With the pleasant ways
Of his ancient days,"

has fallen into comparative desuetude and neglect with the rest. But, perhaps, although Nature forgets not to bestow "her 'custom'd liveries on the fields and groves" at the usual time, no season has lost its poetic charm so much as the sweet May. A solitary bonfire with a May bush and pole are yet to be seen here and there in retired nooks and corners of Old England, to the delight of the children, "your only chroniclers of merriment" now-a-days; but the games of this delightful season have all vanished away from the general scene of the country, and in the town are but perpetuated by a low and disgusting mummery. Time was when from the court to the cottage all "rose up early to observe the rite of May." Some went "a-dew-gathering," a sort of rustic love-spell that was sure to enchant every village maiden, gentle or simple;—others to "fetch in May"—a rivalry that "robb'd many a hawthorn of its half-blown sweets;"—while others set their wits to work to get up some pretty device, some rural drama (like the following), the purpose of which was to bring The Ladie of the May into a termination of her last year's reign by setting between two rival suitors.

One of the additions to "The C ntents of Pembroke's Arcadia, written by Sir Philip Sidney, Knight," is an account of a rural mask, or May-game, performed at Wanstead, in honour of Queen Elizabeth, which begins thus:—

"Her most excellent Majestie walking in Wanstead Garden, as she passed down into the grove there came suddenly among the train one apparelled like an honest man's wife of the countrie; where crying out for justice, and desiring all the lords and gentlemen to speak a good word for her, shee was brought to the presence of her Majestie, to whom upon her knees she offered a supplication, &c.'

The scene which followed has been put into the dramatic form in which probably it was enacted, preserving as much of the old quaint Arcadian narrative as possible, and supplying the rest from other resources which it is hoped may not be deemed wholly indecorous to mix up with the waters from the "well of English undefiled."

ADDRESS OF THE NIGHTINGALE
TO THE
OTHER SONG-BIRDS OF THE MONTH.

The answer of Agesilaus King of Sparta, to one who requested him to hear a man sing who could imitate the nightingale, was: "I have heard the nightingale herself!" So much for musical OR ANY OTHER IMITATION!

Vide Plutarch.

Have ye no song
Which doth belong
Peculiarly to your own throats,
That thus you steal,
And then conceal,
One half the music of my notes?
I hardly plain "terem"
But straight some false cuckoo,
Black-cap or thrush,
In neighbouring bush,
Doth emulate
With jealous pirate—
Thinking they sing
As well as I,
Who to the spring
Give melody!

My song is perfect from its earliest lay!
It hath no need for more than one essay!
Not like the striving Jongleurs that at length
Break off with disappointed hope and strength:*
Not knowing how themselves to steer aright,
But (metaphor being chang'd) from borrowed light!
It were not music if it did not make
Some would-be minstrels follow in its wake!

However sweet thy song may be
Just after show'r, on topmost tree,
What poet, of undying name,
Has giv'n thee, Robin! such a fame
As he, the envied exile (who Was banish'd for too much he knew),
Bestow'd on me?—If I ne'er sung,
I'd been musician from his tongue!
Silence! ye menials of the wood—
I'm regent of this solitude!

* * * * * *

Now the queen has had her song,
Let us other sweets among,
And suit the beauties that kind May
Has blossom'd forth for our BOUQUET!

Liburnam's golden ringlets braid
With the white and purple shade
Of the lilac;—let the stars,
Whose lustre burning noon-day mars,
Jerusalem and Bethlehem†
Mix their jewels bright with them!

Marigold and peony,
Pale or crimson as they be—
Tulips and the speedwell flow'rs,
That ruin'd walls love more than bow'rs,‡

Yellow lily of the day,
And the modest convol, pray,
Let us with the eglantine,
Garden or wild columbine,
Adonis flow'r, and poppy bright,
That dazzling hurts the charm'd sight,
Mingle in a floral wreath,
That will of spring and beauty breathe!
We must not here forget the clove—
It breathes the very breath of love!

To the orchard we will now,
And from the blossom'd apple-bough,
From almond, cherry-tree, and pear,
Our wreath enrich—but hold! forbear!—
'Twere better far to let them bloom,
Than cull them for a fruitless tomb!
Fresh flowers, like pleasures we may seize,
Are best the moment first they please;—
Their lot is out to spring and die—
Then snatch their sweets before they fly!
But fair fruit-blossoms, like to joy,
We would not have a blight destroy,
Should anger on their promise-bough
Till time their ripened hope bestow.

And last, to shield our GARLAND OF THE MAY
From all fierce lightning's withering decay,
Let the bright laurel's green ¶
Amid its leaves be seen—
And then to it we'll say—
Go forth, our sweet BOUQUET!
And if the eyes of living flow'rs,
That gem, like stars, this isle of ours,
Will turn to thee in gentleness,
We'll fear no thunder's might—
But, gaz'd on by their loveliness,
We'll borrow beauty's light.

* The cuckoo commences his song (if it may be so called) with two notes, or whistles, including a minor third, as musicians term it; after which he essays a major third, then a fourth, lastly a fifth, beyond which the bird can no farther go, but abandons his vocal propensities for the rest of the season.—Vide Abbé Kircher's Notation of Bird Songs.

† Milton in one of his Latin elegies calls Ovid "illustrior ames," in contradistinction to the more generally lauded Latin poets.

‡ The star of Bethlehem and the star of Jerusalem close their flowers at noon.

Why loves my flower, the sweetest flow'r
That swells the golden breast of May,
Thrown rudely o'er the ruin'd tow'r,
To waste her solitary day?

LANGHORNE.

MAY IN THE METROPOLIS.

"Rus in urbe.

With all the decline and gradual disappearance of old May customs which we must lamentingly remark throughout the kingdom, or, indeed, through the world in general, it is curious to observe that their "ling'ring bloom" delays more in and about our great city than in the rural districts, where in their "smiling spring" their "earliest visits" first were paid. When COWLEY said,

"God the first garden made, and the first city Cain!"

(a line which has been vilely parodied by Cowper into a perversion, that is frequently quoted while its great original remains "unknown but to a few"), he little thought that an immense metropolis like London could at once be the greatest mart of universal commerce on the globe, and a garden be sprinkled over with parterres of "herbs, fruits, and flow'rs, Walks, and the melody of birds" sufficient to captivate even his friend the enthusiastic horticulturist EVELYN himself. If a man will but dispassionately "intend his eye" (to cite the immortal ADDISON again), he will find no occasion to deplore the want of ruralism in his urban habitation, or to wishfully exclaim with the Roman poet,

"O! Rus, quando ego te aspiciam!"

Our parks, our squares, our markets, nay, the very windows in our most confined streets, are all in this sweet month, the fairest offspring of the triple seasons, or the graces of the ancient year.† Only survey the thousand avenues that lead into this vast emporium, on a May morning. What a moving mass "of verdant leaves and flow'rs of every dye," while in our public garden inclosures the hawthorns and the lilacs, the fruit trees, and the countless blossoming shrubs, luxuriate as freely before the rich mansions of the great, the "regum turres," as in the country orchard or near the cottage door.

"redolent of spring,"

It is possible to be as secluded at the hour most friendly to study and contemplation, the sweet morning in its earliest prime, when the infant day, with

"hues of youth,
Carnation'd like a sleeping infant's cheek," wakens up in the east and wraps himself in those fantastic robes of coloured light which the textilis ventus, the woven wind of Zephyr's wings, fans into being round him—it is quite as possible, we repeat, for the thoughtful mind to indulge in a solitudinal reverie in one of our secluded inclosures as

"by the lone sea:"

ay! and there's a "music too" in the tempered "roar," the external hum, of the millions waking up in their many nations hive of industry, that like the murmur of a far-off waterfall "soothes, tho' monotony doth ring no change."

Altogether we may say that London is the most garden city of the world, tout ce si bien soigné, as the Frenchman exclaims with extorted liberality, on seeing our hedge-rows and way-sides; and to repeat our motto, there is not so much rus in urbe to be found, or perhaps ever was found, elsewhere, whatever we may read of the rose-embosomed Ispahan, or the hanging garden-galleries of Babylon.

MAY SONG FOR THE QUEEN OF HEARTS,
VICTORIA!

In twice twelve circles hath the sun
His chariot through the zodiac run,
Since MAY brought forth the purest gem
That ever grac d a d'adem,
And said, "This maiden, yet I ween,
Will be of all my Queens THE QUEEN!"

Her words were answer d through the grove
By songs of loyal'ty and love!
Wide on the wings of fame they flew,
The neighbouring shores re-echoed too,
And all confess'd that ne er was seen
So fair a lady for May Queen!

Long be her reign in hall and bow'r!
From day to day, and hour to hour;
May she be happy in her life,
As Queen, as Mother, and as Wife,
And like a mild benignant star
Extend her glory near and far!

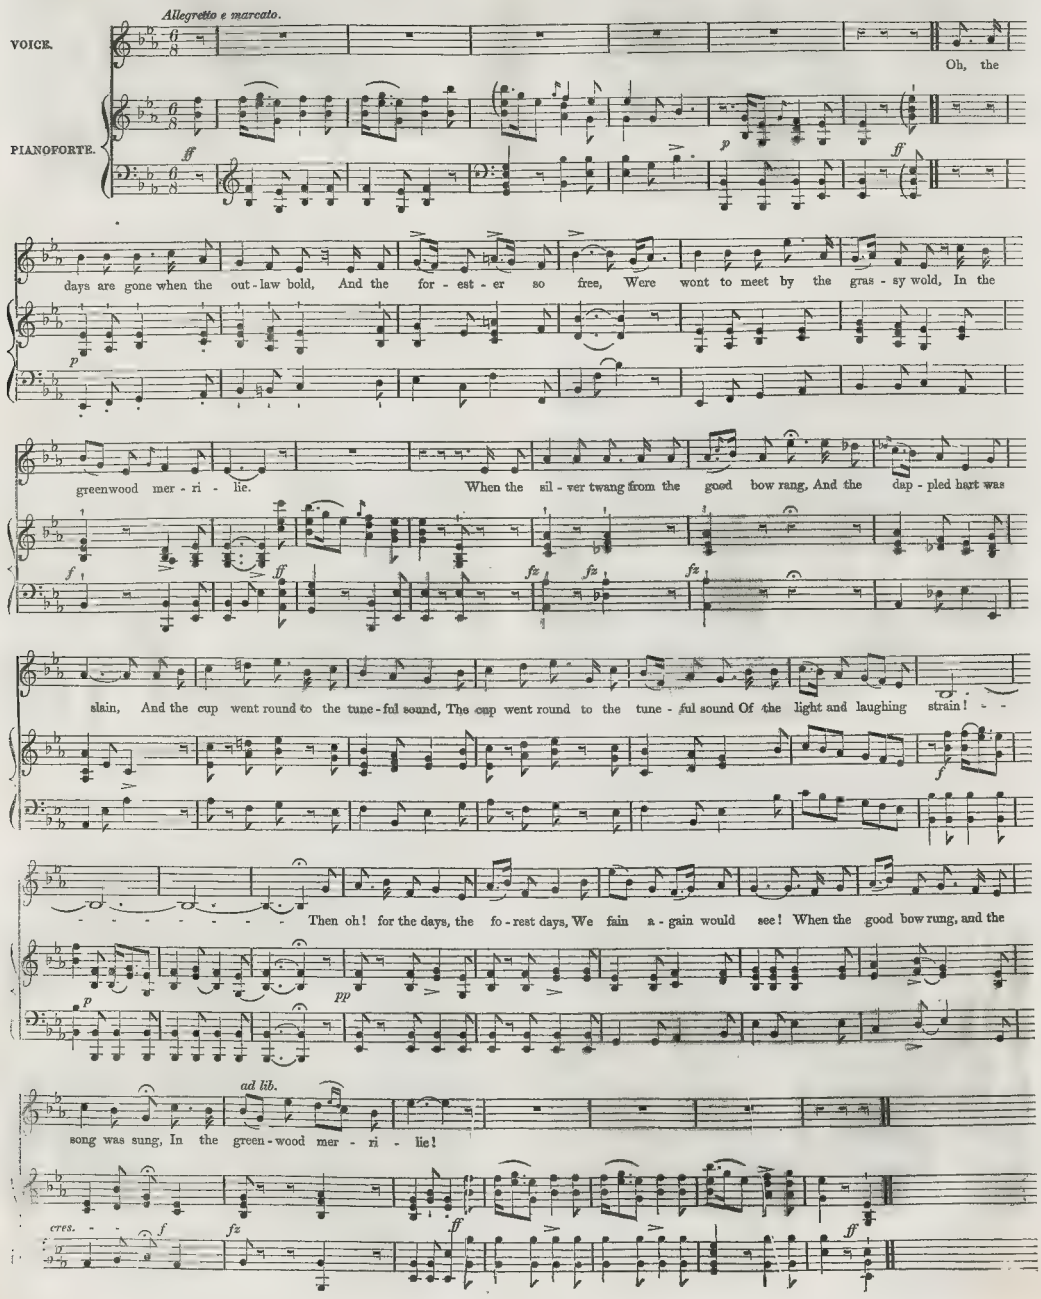
The idol of her land and home!
The joy of all where'er she come—
The fair, the virtuous—the mild
The nation's guard an, tho' its child!
Sing to our Sovereign Lade-May
A long and merry roundelay!

§ * For the use of this preterite vade all the best writers of the last two centuries.

† Not only the Egyptians, but the ancient Greeks, divided their year into no more than three seasons, spring, summer, and winter, which were called ωραι, or hours. According to Hesiod, their names were Eunomia, Dice, and Irene.

THE FOREST DAYS.

SONG, BY DESMOND RYAN, ESQ. MUSIC BY E. J. LODER



Allegretto e marcato.
VOICE.
PIANOFORTE.
Oh, the days are gone when the out-law bold, And the for-est-er so free, Were wont to meet by the gras-sy wold, In the greenwood mer-ri-lie.
When the sil-ver twang from the good bow rang, And the dap-pled hart was slain, And the cup went round to the tune-ful sound, The cup went round to the tune-ful sound Of the light and laughing strain!
Then oh! for the days, the fo-rest days, We fain a-gain would see! When the good bow rung, and the ad lib.
song was sung, In the green-wood mer-ri-lie!
cres.

"Salvatur sceris Hyenis."—HOR.
O! Primavera! gioventu del anno
Bella madre di fiori
D'erbe novelle e di novelli amore."
GUARINI.

Flee! winter, to the shuddering Pole,
Fling round the Russ thy frozen chain;
There chill the fountains of the soul,
And scowl far o'er the shrinking plain.

But thou, whose blessed smile and tear
Springs from th' all-bounteous throne above,
We hail thee, mother of the year,
May! Ins of th Eternal's love.

SPRING LIFE IN TOWN AND COUNTRY.

THE DRAWING-ROOM.

Oh! 'tis a glorious sight to see
This empire's mighty chivalry,
And England's daughters, like a zone
Of living gems, surround the throne.
But nobler still to moral ken
Is the thought that earth's most mighty men,
From east to west, from near and far,
Bow before HER—the Brunswick's star!
Thrice happy, Queen, an infant's chain
Can lead the lions by the mane.

HYDE-PARK CORNER.

The row—the row—where duly meet
From five to six the land's élite.
The citizen dozy—senator prosy;
Where the crown and coronet mutually greet—
Where the brave old Duke with pleasure can look
And munch on the scenes of Vittoria and Cadiz—
Where the Darby at Tattersall's settles a book
Which often has missioned the signer to Hades.

BOND-STREET.

Centre of elegance, and fashion's mart—
By union of rank—bazaar of art,
Fairest thy picture is, thou floral May.
In Fox's, Michel's operatic sway,
Roll the delightcabs, and prance the pamper'd steeds;
Beauty's smile glances upon the Cashmeres feeds,
The guardsman saunters; even the senate there,
Forgets its Budget light in the perfumed air.

HORTICULTURAL FETE, CHISWICK.

Flowers are there of brightest hue,
Such as Eden scarcely knew;
Flowerets rescued from the Pole,
Or where Australia's breakers roll.
But other flowers are there beside—
Fair Britain's beauties in their pride,
And, casting on them both together—
"How happy could we be with either."

THE BRITISH YEOMAN.

The yeoman's homestead! Centuries
Have hallowed it. The vernal breeze
Unlocks the fountains of his heart,
Which yearns to bar, his better part,
And the bright wee flowers of mid-June,
The Dawn of earth which [illegible]
Such be the scene for future years,
And never be suffused with tears.

THE FARMYARD.

[illegible] the plough, and cheer the sturdy [illegible]
[illegible] by the British farmer stand,
Proud, as of yore on his own land—
Whose heart will never bend, but break.
Stout bulwark of the land and throne.

JACK-IN-THE-GREEN.

"Vat is dat?" de people's majesty" screamed
A Frenchman just in Paris come so late.
Determin'd to know [illegible] explained,
But navare have I see de ting before."

Rattled the scrapers 'neath the mounseers nose,
Jack-in-the-Green, like Pegasus, gamp-aloed,
The Frenchman muttered quelle horrible chase,
And in a burst republican tornadoed.

VILLAGE FAIR.

"When bidden to the wake or fair."

How welcome came that holiday,
Our saturnalia of dear May,
When, [illegible] from pedant rod,
We rush'd joy-screaming o'er the sod!

Yet welcomer in riper years,
When Pleasure hushed her doubts and fears
And [illegible]
We don't forget the village fair.

SPRING IN THE OLDEN TIME.—THE MAYPOLE.

"In the month of May, namely, on May-day in the morning, every man (except impediment) would walk unto the several meadows and green woods, there to rejoice the spirits with the beauty and savoury of sweet flowers, and with the notes of birds—praising GOD in their kind."—JOHN STOW, the Chronicler.

Our blessing on the olden time,
When flourished merrie May;

When lord and hind flung to the wind
All cares on that bright day.

When queen and king would join the ring,
Where revelled mirth and glee;
And youth and age, and cleric sage,
Danced 'neath the greenwood tree.

While flew the flag from the old church tow'r,
And cheerly rung the chimes;
And all in praise of God's good power
In the days of the olden times.

MAY.

THE MUSIC-MONTH OF THE METROPOLIS!

"Let's shun the alleys green, and for awhile Exchange the minstrelsy of birds for man's!"—Anon.

Not only is it song-month now
In sylvan shade—on blossom'd bough—
By meadow stream, or waterfall,
But in the lordly palace hall—
In crowded theatre—saloon—
The air is resonant of tune!
Ev'ry minstrel of sweet mouth—
From cloudy north to sunny south—
From emerald west to orient clime—
Now carols here his best lov'd chime!

Concert, from concert springing, grows
Just like the offsprings of the rose,
Budding at first in early MAY!
Nor suffering after night decay,
Till the summer's lingering hours
End both melody and flow'rs,
Or waft them on transferring wing
To make elsewhere a second spring!

Nought on earth has des ons peer
With the garland-sweets that here,
In this merry month of May,
Mirthful MUSIC can display—
Frolic DANCE entwining round her
Shapes for which the GRACES crown'd her,
Saying, "Like the MUSES we
"born shall cease to be but Three!
"So many GRACES 'gin to shine,
"We too shall, ere long, count NINE!"

Sweet sister POESY and she,
Whose pencil's dip'd in memory,
(Or in Imagination's springs),
In month of MAY unfold the wings
Of sleeping FAME, and bid him rise
To waft him through the farthest skies!

All that is fair for eye to see—
All that to ear is MELODY—
All that the mind can charm'd survey
Belongs to thee, SWEET MONTH OF MAY!

MAY-POLES.

May-poles, May-fairs, and May-games are as old as any English sports we have on record. May-poles may still be seen in some of our villages, decorated with garlands, for young people to dance round. Formerly the inhabitants of London used to go out early in the morning to fetch May from the neighbouring fields, and return with it in triumph. The church of St. Andrew under-Shaft, in Leadenhall-street, is so named from a pole or shaft which used to be set up there on May day, higher than the church steeple; and this May-pole is mentioned by Chaucer. Another, alluded to by Beaumont and Fletcher, flourished in the Strand, nearly upon the site of the church of St. Mary le Strand. This May-pole was removed in 1713, and a new one erected July 4, opposite Somerset-house: it had two gilt balls and a vane on the summit, and was decorated on festival days with flags and garlands. This second May-pole was taken down in 1718, when Sir Isaac Newton procured it from the inhabitants, and afterwards sent it to the Rev. Mr. Pound, rector of Wanstead, Essex, who obtained permission from Lord Castlemaine to erect it in Wanstead Park, for the support of the then largest telescope in Europe, made by Mons. Hugon, and presented by him to the Royal Society, of which he was a fellow. Soon afterwards the following limping verses were affixed to the May pole:—

"Once I adorned the Strand,
But now I've found
My way to Pound,
In Baron Newton's land
Where my aspiring head aloft is rear'd,
T' observe the motions of th' ethereal herd.
Here sometimes raised a machine by my side,
Through which is seen the sparkling milky tide
Here oft I'm scented with a balmy dew,
A pleasing blessing which the Strand ne'er knew.
There stood I only to receive abuse,
But here converted to a nobler use;
So that with me all passengers will say,
I'm better far than when the pole of May."

A third pole must have been set up in May-fair, where a fair, which still gives name to the spot, was held for fifteen days.

Long before the date of these poles, however, the May-games had been shorn of their principal glories. In 1644, the Long Parliament issued an ordinance against May-poles, and they were all taken down. The Puritans fought a stubborn battle with these "heathenish vanities of superstition and wickedness, whose fall is deplored by the author of Pasquil's Palinodia, in verses of extraordinary harmony, cons dering the time when they were composed:—

"Happy the age, and harmlesse were the dayes,
For then true love and amity were found,
When every village did a May-pole raise,
And Whitson ales and May-games did abound,
And all the lusty yonkers, a rout,
With merry lasses dane'd the rod about,
Then friendship to the banquet bid the guests,
And poor men fared the better for their feasts.
Alas! poor May-poles! what should be the cause
That you were almost banisht from the earth?
Who never were rebellious to the lawes
Your greatest crime was honest, harmlesse mirth."

At the Restoration, May-poles were permitted to be erected again; though few held up their heads after this coup fanatique.

Stow describes the "Maie-pole" as "the chiefest jewel," which the people "bring home with great reverence, as thus—they have reade ie or fourtie yoake of oxen, every oxe having a sweete nosegaie of flowers tied to the top of his hornes, and these oxen draw home the Maie-pole, * * which they covered all over with flowers and hearbes, bound round with strings from the top to the bottome, and sometimes it was painted with variable colours, having 200 or 300 men, women, and children following it with great devotion. And thus equipped, it was reared with handkercheifs and flagges streaming on the top, they strawe the ground round about it, they bind green boughs about it, they set up summer halles, bowers, and arbours hard by, and then fall they to banqueting and feasting, to leaping and dauncing about it."

Sir Henry Ellis quotes an old pamphlet, in which we find the May-pole mentioned in a new and curious light. We gather from the writer that our ancestors held an anniversary assembly on May-day, and that the column of May, whence our May-pole, was the great standard of justice, in the Ey-commons, or fields. Here it was that the people, if they saw cause, deposed or punished their governors, their barons, and their kings. The judges' bough or wand (at this time discontinued, or only faintly represented by a trifling nosegay), and the staff or rod of authority in the civil and in the military (for it was the mace of power, and the truncheon of the field officer), are both derived from hence. A mayor, he says, received his name from this May, in the sense of lawful power; the crown, a mark of disparity, was also taken from the May, being representative of the garland or crown, which, when hung on the top of the May, or pole, was the great signal for convening the people; the arches of it, which spring from the circle and meet together at the mound or round ball, being necessarily so formed, to suspend it to the top of the pole. He also tells us of a most ancient custom between youth, the one party in winter and the other in spring livery; when spring was sure to gain the victory.

In a few rural villages, remote from the influence of large towns, the May-pole may still rear its flower-crowned head. A short time since there was standing in the village of Hemswell, in Lincolnshire, a lofty pole set up where was once an uninclosed space; and this was, doubtless, a May shaft. In Durham a prize appears to have been given to any person who climbed up and fixed a garland on the summit of the May pole.

Washington Irving says: "I shall never forget the delight I felt on first seeing a May-pole; it was on the banks of the Dee, close by the picturesque old bridge that stretches across the river from the quaint little city of Chester. I had already been carried back into former days, by the antiquities of that venerable place, the examination of which is equal to turning over the pages of a black-letter volume, or gazing on the pictures in Froissart. The May-pole on the margin of that poetic stream completed the illusion. My fancy adorned it with wreaths of flowers, and peopled the green bank with all the dancing revelry of May-day. The mere sight of this May-pole gave a glow to my feelings, and spread a charm over the country for the rest of the day; and as I traversed a part of the fair plains of Cheshire, and the beautiful borders of Wales, and looked from among swelling hills down a long green valley, through which the Dova wound its wizard stream, my imagination turned all into a perfect Arcadia. One can readily imagine what a gay scene it must have been in jolly old London when the doors were decorated with flowering branches; when every hat was decked with hawthorn; and Robin Hood, Friar Tuck, Maid Marian, morris dancers, and all the other fun tastic dancers and revellers were performing their antics about the May pole in every part of the city. I value every custom which tends to infuse poetical feeling into the common people, and to sweeten and soften the rudeness of rustic manners, without destroying their simplicity."

Bavaria has not set parred with her old customs; for in every village is a garlanned May-pole; and so little progress have new lights made in this country, that her peasantry do not yet despise a merry-making.

In Edinburgh, we believe, the old custom of ascending Arthur's Seat at day break, and washing with May dew, is still observed. It was long a common belief that the cosmetic virtues of May dew, when thus gathered, would preserve health and good looks throughout the year; though this was probably an allegory, by which some village Zad attempted to induce the maidens to attend to the wholesome observances of early rising and exercise

A DIALOGUE

"A gallant though exotic compliment!"—Anon.

The other day in CHISWICK's ground
A wanderer from the East was found;—
A silent wonder mark'd his pace,
As, roaming through the floral maze,
On this and that he seem'ed to dwell—
Fearing, as if he could have smelt
In adoration more than once—
When he was waked from his trance
By some one nigh, who ask'd him, What Did please him most in this sweet spot?
"THE FLOWERS," he straight replied.

"But which?
"Although, where all are fair and rich,
"'T is hard to choose,' the querist owns,
"But still one 'bove the rest enthrones,
"Herself the Queen?—say which is she?
"I cannot yet tell which she be—
"I'm almost blind from dazzlery.
"I've never seen such overy'es,
"Or cheeks of such compounded dyes
"Of rose and lily—such soft hair—
"(With which no tendrils can compare)
"Such forms of symmetry and grace,
"Or heart-seen muse from a face!"

"Hold! hold!" the other quack replies,
"I speak not, friend: of lips or eyes,
"Or cheeks whose living, breathing flush
"First caus'd the jealous rose to blush—
"I mean the Flowers—"

"I mean so too—
"'Twas them I came intent to view,
"But finding (what you cannot say
"With whom of the far Malay),‡
"That loveliest, speaking Flowers, were here
"Than those you woo forth once a year,
"The true religion of mine eye
"For them became idolatry,
"And shall remain so till I'm doom'd to die!"

* At first the number of the Muses was but three, viz. MELETE, or Care, and ARCHE, fresh words signifying Meditation, Memory, and Singing: but a certain sculptor of Sicyon according to Varro, having orders to make three statues of the three Muses for the Temple of Apollo, and mistaking his instructions, made three several statues of each of the nine; however, were found so beautiful that they were all set up in the temple, and from that time they began to reckon nine Muses, to whom Hesiod afterwards gave names. It has also been said that when the citizens of Sicyon directed three skilful statuaries to make each of the statues of the three Muses, they were all so well executed that they did not know which to choose, but erected all the nine, and that Hesiod and Homer only gave them names.

† An ancient and oriental figure used long before Byron's application of it.

‡ In the Malayan language the same word expresses women and flowers.

NEWSPAPER HISTORY.

It is not always that great undertakings are crowned with great success. Sometimes they are begun too soon, sometimes too late; sometimes in the wrong place; and sometimes, again, their object is of such a nature as not to claim public sympathy in their success. It is now a twelvemonth since we entered upon our great undertaking—the greatest, without any exception, that has ever been conceived or commenced in the history of the British press. Many were the opinions then offered as to the practicability of such a "novum organum," and many were the prognostications as to its good or bad fortune—the wisest in such matters being inclined, in most instances, to anticipate the latter. Many prudent and worthy persons thought that, although the times were improving, the age of pure taste had not as yet arrived in this favoured land, nor was it likely that for many years to come it would shed its humanizing influence so benignly over the great bulk of the English people so that anything in the shape of a newspaper should be popular with them, and enjoy a large circulation, without being connected with one or other of the contending parties in the state.

"Politics, and not pictures," said they, "are the thing for the people now-a-days." We humbly ventured, however, to think that the time had arrived when a proud and elevated position presented itself to the journalist, from whence he might, besides telling them what was going on in the world, point out to the masses the beauties of the neutral ground, the riches of the moral soil, on which there are pleasant places for all parties to rest, and which no party can exclusively claim its own.

He was a wise and humane trainer of youth who introduced pictures into schoolbooks to induce children to read as well as to fix more strongly that which they read upon their minds. Horace very happily says in his "Art of Poetry":—

Segnius irritant animos demissa per aurem,
Quam quæ sunt oculis subjecta fidelibus, et quæ
Ipse sibi tradit spectator.

This precept of the poet is meant for children of a larger growth, who by that which pleases their eye and challenges their attention are equally amused and instructed.

To succeed in creating at length a national and a catholic taste for the fine arts in this country, by the plan which we have adopted of giving life and complexion to the ordinary occurrences of every-day life, as well as the reminiscences which every day calls forth, is to confer a benefit of the very highest order on a community constituted like our own. In laws and liberties, in the stern and rugged virtues which constitute the bulwark of these our English birthright, we surpass all other nations; but in those arts which adorn and elevate the mind, although making some advances lately, this country is still far behind. It is not unworthy of remark that, in those countries where not alone the body but the soul itself was held in bondage by an accomplished despotism, the cultivation of the fine arts was permitted as the gilding of the chains, or as a small measure of consolation to suffering mankind. Born in early Greece, the product of her classic and freeborn soil, let us hope that those arts may take congenial root in our own, and flourish with all their beautifying influences, as the foliage adorns the Corinthian capital, around the pillars of our free institutions. To doubt the humanizing principle and the elevating powers to which we allude, and which it is our mission to assist in developing, would be to doubt the blessings of civilization.

With such an object in view from the commencement of our career, it can scarcely be said that we did not deserve success; and that we have succeeded so far is placed beyond denial in the fact of our circulation, by far the most extensive that has ever yet been boasted by the most popular British journal. We are everywhere, in town and country; ubiquitous through all shades and grades of society; Whig, Tory, Radical, manufacturer, agriculturist, the divine, the lawyer, the physician, take us in; we are to be seen in the statesman's cabinet and the lady's boudoir; with our instructive and welcome page the newsman knocks at the royal palace and the peasant's home, more agreeably than the great letter-carrier of mortality, who kicks, without favour or affection, at both. There is one feature, too, remarkable above all others of our journal, and which no other in the wide range of the periodical press can boast of, namely, that it is not glanced at and thrown by; it is read and referred to, and bound and preserved, and read and referred to again. Its beauties, unlike those of many a fair and fond one that lingers over them, improve with time; and to the taste and practice of those who collect and preserve them may be applied the observations of Doctor Johnson, in reference to the collectors of choice engravings and drawings—"The pride or the pleasure of making collections, if it be restrained by prudence and morality, produces a pleasing remission after more laborious studies, furnishes an amusement not wholly unprofitable for that part of life—the greater part of many lives—which would otherwise be lost in idleness or vice; it produces a useful traffic between the industry of indigence and the curiosity of wealth; it brings many things to notice that would be neglected; and, by fixing the thoughts upon intellectual pleasures, resists the natural encroachments of sensuality, and maintains the mind in her lawful superiority." That we have created this intellectual appetite is proved, not by our universal circulation, And, to keep pace with this intellectual appetite, it should not be omitted to state, that we have established by our enterprise and exertions such "a useful traffic between the industry of indigence and the curiosity of wealth" as has raised an humble but most useful branch of art, that of engraving on wood, to a pitch of excellence now unequalled by any other country. Altogether in "an age of new inventions," in which the press can show as many as any other estate, calling, or denomination, with its papers for clergymen, papers for medical men, papers for lawyer men, papers for agricultural and gardening men, papers for naval and military men, papers for colonial men, papers for railroad men, it may be said, looking to the extraordinary, the wonderful progress we have made with public opinion, that our invention is the most novel of all, namely, a paper which, if it does not embrace the immediate interests of each, commands the general sympathies of every section and order of men in the community.

So much for our own progress—for the unexampled success of which, whilst we experience a natural feeling of pride and gratification, we owe it to those myriads upon myriads of our fellow-countrymen and fair countrywomen who have cheered us on and supported us to express our deep sense of gratitude to them, and to congratulate them upon this new triumph of the British press—a triumph which, although choice in all its features, and delightful to look upon, is not yet complete, but gives fairest promise of reaching that splendour and usefulness which had never been anticipated by their warmest patriotism and philanthropy.

And if we have made such wonderful strides on the road of improvement, how much has not the order in general—namely, the newspaper press—improved of late years, to which we have the honour to belong?

To form anything like an accurate estimate of the extraordinary advance which the newspaper press has made of late years, it is necessary to know something of its early history. The first newspaper was claimed by England, and for nearly half a century it was a generally-accepted notion that we owed its appearance to the wisdom of Elizabeth and her minister Burleigh. This statement first appeared in 1794, in "Chalmer's Life of Ruddiman," the grammarian, during some portion of his life editor of the Caledonian Mercury. His remarks are as follow:—"After inquiring, in various countries, for the origin of newspapers, I had the satisfaction to find what I sought for in England. It may gratify our national pride to be told that mankind are indebted to the wisdom of Elizabeth and the prudence of Burleigh for the first newspaper. The epoch of the Spanish Armada is also the epoch of a genuine newspaper. In the British Museum there are several newspapers which had been printed while the Spanish fleet was in the English Channel, during the year 1588. It was a wise policy to prevent, during a moment of general anxiety, the danger of false reports, by publishing real information; and the earliest newspaper is entitled the English Mercurie, which, by authority, was imprinted at London by Christopher Barker, her Highnesses printer, 1588." This article of the national belief, however, has been overturned by Mr. Watts, of the British Museum, in a letter on the subject written by him to the keeper of the printed books in that institution. The writer gives, in his letter, several reasons for considering this, "the earliest newspaper," nothing else but an imposture. First, the type, in which there are distinctions between the i's and j's, unknown to the printers of the sixteenth century; second, the orthography, which, in many peculiar words, is that of the eighteenth; third, the style of the composition, which is not that of the date to which it pretends. He gives other reasons, of minor yet sufficient weight; but his last is the crowning one of all, namely, that the paper itself of the English Mercurie, supposed to have made its first appearance in the reign of Elizabeth, bears the water-mark of the royal arms, with the initials G. R.

Whoever the impostor was there is one thing pretty certain, that he made a good hit as to the century, for it appears that the first publication approaching to anything like a newspaper appeared in the sixteenth. The war between Venice and the Ottoman Porte gave rise, in 1563, to publishing the military news, —and, subsequently, commercial news was added—in sheets, which were read in certain places to those who were desirous to hear them, and who paid for the privilege a gazzeta, a coin no longer in use, but the name of which was transferred to the newspaper itself in Italy and France, and, subsequently, in England. We are, fortunately, saved the trouble of investigating the early history of newspapers by an able article on the subject in Mr. C. Knight's "Penny Cyclopædia."

"In the reign of James I.," observes the writer of the article, "packets of news were published in the shape of small quarto pamphlets occasionally. The earliest we have met with, preserved in the second volume of the series of newspapers purchased with Dr. Burney's library (also in the British Museum), is entitled News out of Holland, published in 1619 for N. Newbery, followed by other papers of news from different countries in 1620, 1621, and 1622. There can be no doubt of the genuineness of these. In 1622, when the Thirty Years' War and the exploits of Gustavus Adolphus excited curiosity, these occasional pamphlets were converted into a regular weekly publication, entitled the News of the Present Week, edited by Nathaniel Butler. This seems to have been the first weekly newspaper in England.*

"About this period newspapers began also to be established on the Continent. Their originator at Paris is said to have been one Renaudot, a physician, who had found out that it was conducive to success in his profession to be able to tell his patients the news. Seasons were not always sickly, but his taste for collecting news was always the same, and he began to think that there might be some advantage in printing his intelligence periodically. His scheme succeeded, and he obtained a privilege for publishing news in 1632. It would appear that not long after this time there were more newspapers than one in England.

"Upon the breaking out of the civil war in Charles I.'s time great numbers of newspapers, which had hitherto been chiefly confined to foreign intelligence, were spread abroad by the different parties into which the state was then divided, under the titles of Diurnals, Special Passages, Intelligencers, Mercuries, &c., mostly in the size of small quarto, and treating of domestic matters. Nearly a score are said to have come out in 1643, when the war was at its height."

Amongst these were such quaint titles as the following:—The Parliament Kite, the Scot's Dove, the Secret Owl, Heraclitus Ridens, Democritus Ridens, Mercurius Britannicus, Mercurius Mastix. D'Israeli gives an account, in his "Curiosities of Literature," of the chief newspaper editors who flourished about this time, namely, Marchant Needham and Sir John Berkenhout.

"Marchant Needham," he says, "the great patriarch of newspaper writers, was a man of versatile talents and more versatile politics, a bold adventurer, and most successful because the most profligate of his tribe. From college he came to London; was an usher in Merchant Taylors' school; then an under-clerk in Gray's Inn; at length studied physic and practised chemistry; and, finally, he was a captain, and, in the words of honest Antony à Wood, 'siding with the rout and scum of the people, he made them weekly sport by railing at all that was noble in his intelligence, called Mercurius Britannicus, wherein his endeavours were to sacrifice the fame of some lord, or any person of quality, and of the King himself, to the beast with many heads.'"

The captain "turned and turned, and still went on, and turned again," changing political sides whenever interest or caprice dictated, abusing the Presbyterians one day and the King the next. He was, notwithstanding, deemed an oracle in his way. His brother editor, Sir John seems to have rivalled him in those qualifications which made newspapers saleable at a period when "the times were out of joint," and the tone of public opinion was anything but a wholesome one, namely, boldness and buffoonery.

In 1662 first appeared the Kingdom's Intelligencer, which was a court paper, and warmly espoused the cause of the Crown on all occasions, for which reason its publisher, Roger, was afterwards made Sir Roger L'Estrange. Under his superintendence, also, came out the London Gazette, about two years afterwards. This was a continuation of the Oxford Gazette, published in that city when the court resided there, in 1665.

In the reign of Queen Anne, and the year 1709, the first daily newspaper made its appearance in London, under the title of the Daily Courant, being published every day except Sunday.

"It was about this time that a new species of publication came out, which, although it would scarcely be regarded as belonging to the family of newspapers now, was held to be so then; and, in fact, for a considerable time after it was commenced, it included articles of news along with its other matter. We allude to those admirable publications, the Tatler, Spectator, Guardian, &c., which formed the models of so many subsequent publications of the same kind. The first number of the Tatler was published on the 23rd of April, new style, 1709; and the last on the 2nd of January, 1711. Much space was occupied in each by advertisements, and the price of each number was a penny. The publication of the Spectator began March 1, 1711, at the same price; but, upon the imposition of the halfpenny stamp-duty, which began August 1, 1712, the price was raised to twopence. The halfpenny tax is conjectured to have been the cause of the Spectator being stopped in the beginning of 1813. It was, however, immediately followed by the Guardian, the first number of which appeared on March 2nd, 1713. This paper soon dropped, and was succeeded by the Englishman in October in the same year (professedly political). The Englishman lasted for two years, and was in its turn supplanted by the Freeholder, on December 23rd, 1715; the latter work being almost the sole production of Addison."

By this it is evident that the first stamp duty imposed upon newspapers was in the reign of Queen Anne, and that the Government of the day were induced to propose such a fiscal regulation, not so much to increase the revenue as for the sake of public credit and the peace of society, which were very much endangered by the licentiousness of the press, as appears by a reference to the state transactions of the period. In "Cooke's Life of Bolingbroke" it is stated "Queen Anne, in one of her messages to Parliament, declared that by seditious papers and factious rumours designing men had been able to sink credit, and that the innocent had suffered; and she recommended the house to find a remedy equal to the mischief. In obedience to the Queen's desire, and at the instance of her secretary, the Parliament passed a bill in 1712 imposing a stamp duty upon pamphlets and publications. At its origin the amount of this stamp was a halfpenny; and it is curious to observe what an effect this trifling impost had upon the circulation of the most favourite papers. Many were entirely discontinued, and several of those which survived were generally united into one publication."

Dean Swift makes allusion, after his sarcastic manner, to the passing of this act in a letter to Stella. "Do you know," he says, "that all Grub-street is dead and gone last week?"

The Public Advertiser, in which the celebrated and unrivalled letters of "Junius" appeared, was first published so far back as 1726, under the name of the London Daily Post and General Advertiser; and it merged subsequently, we believe, into the Public Ledger.

"The St. James's Chronicle," says the writer in the "Cyclopædia," "is another of our oldest papers: at its first publication it was an amalgamation of two papers (the St. James's Post and the St. James's Evening Post), both of which began in 1715. The North Briton, edited by Wilkes, first appeared in 1762; and in the same year the Englishman was established. The Englishman attracted much notice about 1763, on account of the insertion of several satirical articles in it by Burke."

The earliest provincial newspaper in England was the Norwich Postman, published in 1706, "at the small charge of one penny, but a halfpenny not refused." The Scottish people were first treated to the intellectual luxury of a newspaper by a party of Cromwell's soldiers who garrisoned Leith in 1652. The Cavaliers would have treated the good citizens and their wives and daughters to feasting, music, and dancing. The Roundheads introduced to their notice the composition of type and the power of the' printing-press. These stern Puritans brought with them one Christopher Higgins and his "materiel," to reprint the London Mercurius Politicus for their amusement and information. The Edinburgh Courant appeared so far back as 1705, and the Caledonian Mercury in 1720.

In Ireland civil commotion also gave rise to newspaper publication. At the breaking out of the rebellion in 1641, the occurrences of the day were printed in a news-sheet, entitled Warranted Tidings from Ireland. From this period until the commencement of the eighteenth century, there is, we believe, no record of any other publication in that country. In 1700 Pue's Occurrences appeared, and flourished for about fifty years. Falkener's Journal was first published in 1728, which merged into Saunders's News Letter, at present, as to circulation and advertisements, at the head of the daily press of Dublin. The first Irish provincial paper was published at Waterford, in 1729, under the title of the Waterford Flying Post. Ramsay's Waterford Chronicle was published in 1766; but the oldest existing newspaper in Ireland is the Belfast News Letter, which has kept its ground, without any change of title, since the year 1737.

With respect to our colonial press, the same article on which we have already drawn so largely observes that "newspapers are now as common in the British dominions abroad as in England; and in British India six gazettes are published in the Bengal language. In Van Diemen's Land no fewer than six papers are published at Hobart's Town, namely, the Hobart Town Gazette, the Hobart Town Courier, True Colonist, the Tasmanian and Austral-Asiatic Review, Colonial Times, and Bent's News and Tasmanian Threepenny Register; and two at Launceston, the Cornwall Chronicle and the Launceston Advertiser. In New South Wales there are five newspapers, published at Sydney. At Perth, in Western Australia, there is now a weekly paper. The South Australian Gazette is published at Adelaide; the first number was printed in England, and carried out, with printing materials, to Australia. It has been followed by another, the South Australian; and a newspaper has been commenced this year (1839) at Port Lincoln. Two newspapers have also been commenced within the present year at Melbourne, in the newly-explored territory of Australia Felix. The first New Zealand colony, which sailed in September, 1839, carried out the materials for printing a newspaper, of which the first number was printed in England."

One more extract—a long but an interesting and useful one—and we shall take our farewell of this portion of the labours of the Encyclopædia to which we are so much indebted:—

"In Germany newspapers originated in the 'Relations,' as they were termed, which sprung up at Augsburg and Vienna in 1524, at Ratisbon in 1528, at Dillingen in 1589, and at Nürnberg in 1571, and which appeared in the form of letters printed, but without date, place, or number. The first German newspaper in numbered sheets was printed in 1612. Of the Italian journals, the Gazzetta di Milano, Gazzetta di Venezia, and Giornale del Regno delle due Sicilie are daily; the Diario di Roma, Gazzetta di Firenze, Giornale di Commercio di Livorno, Gazzetta di Bologna, Gazzetta Piemontese, Gazzetta di Genova, Voce della Verita, of Modena; Gazzetta di Parma, Gazzetta di Lucca, Osservatore Veneziano, and some others, appear two or three times a week, and a much greater number weekly. The whole number of journals in Italy, including all periodicals, political, literary, and scientific, exceeds two hundred. Madrid has its Gaceta; and Lisbon has also a paper for the publication of official documents and communications. In Belgium and Holland there are, in French and Dutch respectively, a considerable number of daily and weekly papers. In 1830, Switzerland had twenty-four weekly papers, and five others which appeared once a fortnight: the number is since increased. Most of them are written in German. Some are in French, one or two in Italian, and one in the Romansh or Grisons language. The first Russian paper was published in 1703, under Peter I. In 1829 the number of papers and periodicals published in the Russian empire was seventy-three; but the only important political journals are the Gazette de St. Petersburg and the Journal de St. Petersburg. In Sweden the newspapers are not much devoted to political discussion. Denmark has about eighty journals, of which twenty-three are devoted to politics and twenty-five to the sciences. The Greeks have several newspapers in their own language. A journal is published at Corfu, one at Athens, and another at Smyrna. The Moniteur Ottoman is published at Constantinople, in French, under the sanction of the Sultan, and the Viceroy of Egypt has his official paper printed in the same language, at Boulak, near Cairo.

"In the United States the increase of newspapers has been more rapid than in England. In the year 1704 the first Anglo-American newspaper, called the Boston News Letter, was published at Boston. In 1719 the first newspaper was published in Pennsylvania; and in 1733 the first newspapers were published in New York and Rhode Island. Now there is hardly a petty town in any of the twenty-six states without its newspaper, and in the large cities, such as New York, several are published daily. In Pennsylvania a considerable number of newspapers are printed in the German language and distributed among the numerous German settlers in that state. One German newspaper at least is also published in Maryland, and perhaps more. In Louisiana some papers are printed both in French and English.

"The largest collection of newspapers in England is in the British Museum. This collection was commenced by a considerable number being sent there, at the time when the Museum was established, with the library of Sir Hans Sloane. Another collection, of itself valued at £1000, was purchased in 1813 with the library of the late Dr. Charles Burney. At the end of two years from the time of publication the commissioners of stamps now transfer to the British Museum, for public use, copies of all the stamped newspapers, both of town and country."

So much for the past as regards the foundation and features of the press in times gone by; in contemplating upon and investigating which, although it may be useful to enable us to form a just idea of the magnitude and importance of the change which has taken place, we can scarcely apply to them the eloquent words made use of by Sir William Blackstone, to encourage the student in law to search highly into the antiquities of our English jurisprudence:—"Nor will these researches be altogether void of rational entertainment as well as use; as, in viewing the majestic ruins of Rome or Athens, of Balbec or Palmyra, it administers both pleasure and instruction to compare them with the draughts of the same edifices in their pristine proportion and splendour."

There would be but little of rational entertainment, we are of opinion, in dwelling on the lucubrations of Needham and Berkenhout, and all that class of writers, who made the press in their days breathe more of Billingsgate or the stews than the pure classic atmosphere of Athens or of Rome; and to exhibit more of the confusion of Babel than the splendour and proportions of Balbec or Palmyra.

What a vast field of contemplation, too vast for newspaper limits, opens upon us in considering the wonderful changes which have taken place in every feature of the press, in its material, its appearance, its extent, and, lastly and chiefly, its tone and influence. The dragon's teeth with which the modern Cadmus sowed the soil were leaden type, from whence sprung the men clad in the armoury of virtue and right, by whom the Thebes of Knowledge and Truth was built; but as the walls of that city sprang up afterwards at the sound of Amphion's lyre, so the refined spirit of the age in which we live has reared up the press of this country to be at once an object of national pride, and amongst the chief bulwarks of our English liberties.

"The profession of the printer," observes a writer in "Chambers' Edinburgh Journal," "has within these few years undergone a most extraordinary revolution. From being limited in importance by the feeble efforts of the hand-press, it has, under the magical influence of steam and machinery, expanded into gigantic proportions, and promises soon to become, by the increasing appetite for its products, one of the largest branches of manufacturing industry. At no distant date printing was on a most antediluvian scale. A dingy 'office,' consisting of two or three apartments on the first or second floor of some faded genteel tenement in a faded part of the town—half-a-dozen lads, and a few old men with Dutch spectacles on nose, planted at so many composing frames, and laboriously setting dark well-worn types—adjoining, a couple of wooden or partially improved iron presses, wrought with a world of toil, and wheezing and groaning as if in the pangs of dissolution as every impression was pulled. Such was the printing-office of the early ages of mankind—that is to say, about thirty or forty years ago; for since these primitive times the printer's profession has advanced in the ratio of a hundred to one as compared with most other handicrafts; and we now look back to the eighteen hundred and ones and twos, as we should do to the era of Tubal Cain, the flood of Noah, or thereabouts."

Now, look at the steam-press—behold its herculean labours—inking itself, feeding itself, delivering itself of whole showers of sheets in an instant. In place of a confined and squalid-looking second or third floor, led up to by a rickety narrow staircase, a printing-office is now a spacious factory. Printing, instead of being designated by the small name of a handicraft, may now take rank in regard to the capital it requires and the labour it employs amongst the first productions of our English skill and enterprise, and may be called in reality a manufacture. Let the curious reader enter for the purpose of business or curiosity the printing establishment of one of the great leviathans of the trade, and the feelings of wonder and delight which he must experience cannot fail to leave a lasting impression on his memory. One of these immense establishments, the first in this country we believe, that of the Messrs. Clowes, on the Surrey side of the Thames, was admirably described a few years back by a writer in the "Quarterly Review." The length to which our observations have already gone precludes the possibility of quoting as largely as we could wish from the passages of his description. There is one remark of his, however, which we cannot deny ourselves the pleasure of quoting:—

"It is impossible to contemplate a team of sixty literary labourers steadily working together in one room without immediately acknowledging the important service they are rendering to the civilized world."

And this naturally leads us to the chief point of consideration, namely, the change which has come over the spirit of the press. Of this it may be said, that the improved tone of society has tended to improve the tone of the press as much as the improved tone of the press has tended to improve, in its turn, the tone of society, in the same ratio towards each other as may be said that the taste for reading has improved printing as much as improved printing has increased the taste for reading. The moral force of the press is one of the most striking features of the times in which we live; but we have not as yet arrived at the days of its moral triumph. These terms are not one and the same. The moral force of which we speak can write down any man or set of men, no matter how powerful and how virtuous soever he or they may be. The apostle of a sublime principle may be laughed into insignificance, and the minister of the hour shall find his majority a rope of sand. This is not the moral triumph of the press. A leading newspaper, by "keeping the fire up" on one or two particular points of policy, has exhibited this moral force in writing down administrations, Whig or Tory, as it chose, and it can do so again. The reason is that few people think for themselves, and fewer still know how to think. In the present leading articles of the daily press, for instance, there is, certainly, a great display of profound political knowledge and scholar-like attainments in the true sense of the term, a sterling English style, and a gentlemanly feeling breathing throughout—which last-mentioned quality used not to be observable until very lately. Still, however, the true philosophic spirit is wanted in all questions where "party" is concerned. And this deficiency is equally discernible in the leading columns of nearly all the London press. And it must ever be the case until national education, a question which is advocated by the wise and the good of all parties, shall have spread its benign and blessed influence over the length and breadth of the land, and clad our soil with the choicer bounties of Heaven. Then the great body of the press will find it profitable to appeal to the highest motives of which a nation can be capable. Have we, as humble solitary pioneers pointing out and clearing the obstruction from this glorious way, arisen too early on our march and begun before our time? Let the undeniable success that has attended these, our first efforts, answer. And it may be well remarked, and looked upon with triumph, that our circulation—the test of success—has advanced with a rapidity and to an extent unrivalled on the press. If we can decrease the dissemination of the vilest immorality of the police-courts, and of the blasphemous tirades against religion, by creating a new and better appetite, we may well claim sympathy in our success from those who wish well to their race.

As we have begun so shall we continue, and we hope to be enabled each succeeding anniversary to inform our friends and the public that we have arrived still nearer to the grand moral point which it is our object and mission to achieve.

* Before the introduction of printed newspapers it appears that great families had a sort of gazetteers in London who transmitted to them the news of the day in written letters. This custom accounts for the following memorandum preserved in the Clifford family:—"To Captain Robinson, by my lord's command, for writing letters of news to his lordship for half a year, five pounds."—Whitaker's Hist. of Craven.

HOPE FLUNG HER RAINBOW O'ER OUR DEWY SKIES,

COMPLETION OF COLOGNE CATHEDRAL.

Amidst the noble architectural works which are in progress throughout Europe, the completion of the Cathedral of Cologne must rank pre-eminent, either as regards the extent and cost of the labour, or its elaborate richness and beauty, or the masterly skill which its consummation must call into exercise. Hitherto, tourists have lingered in the splendid choir, with its surrounding chapels, and its superb painted glass windows; and the edifice has been yet more worthy of notice from the pilgrim of romance than the searcher after antiquity, for here, behind the grand altar, is the tomb of the three kings of Cologne, with the relics of which legend has raised a thousand tales. Behind the tomb three Gothic windows cast their "dim religious light" over the tesselated pavement and along the Ionic pillars. The bones of the Magi are still supposed to consecrate the tomb, and on the higher part of the monument the artist has delineated their adoration to the Infant Saviour.
